PREFATORY NOTE

The prefatory note to the first volume of the Proceedings and Debates leaves little to be said by way of introduction to the second. The work, it will be seen, extends considerably beyond the limit of fifteen hundred pages contemplated in the contract with the printer.

The appendix to this volume is self-explanatory. It contains a list of the members of the convention similar to the one on pages one and two of the first volume, with the addition of the country and date of birth of each member. These items have been taken from the biographical sketches compiled by Captain N. W. Evans, delegate from Scioto County and historian and reference librarian of the Convention. These sketches, together with the photographs of all the members of the Convention, have been transferred, in compliance with Resolution No. 162, to the library of the Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, as have also the itemized account of all expenditures, duplicate copies of bills and vouchers, the original manuscript journal and other documents in the office of the secretary of the convention.

The constitution of Ohio, followed by the facsimile signatures, has been compiled from the best texts available. A few very obvious omissions or inaccuracies have been indicated by the proper word or letters in brackets. The date of adoption of all amendments prior to those submitted at the special election September 3, 1912, is given in every instance in order that the reader may determine what provisions are now in force. The Convention did not essay the task of eliminating all portions of the constitution of 1851 that had been superseded, modified or repealed by amendment.

The proposals introduced in the Convention were all printed, some of them more than once in amended form. These are available in libraries. The printed journal of the Convention contains the full text of the constitutions of Ohio of 1802 and 1851 respectively, and the constitution proposed for the state by the convention of 1873-74, with references from the sections of each to corresponding sections of the other.

Much has been written and more will doubtless yet be written of the work of the Constitutional Convention of 1912. A list of references to published articles was prepared for the appendix, but it has been omitted because it would soon be incomplete and for the further reason that such a list corrected to date may be found in many libraries of the state. While a number of these are well supplied with printed matter relating to the subject, the most complete collection will be found in the library of the Ohio State University. This collection, with the documents transferred to the library of the Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, located on the university grounds, brings within easy reach of the students of that institution and others interested practically all of the available source material on the Constitutional Convention and its work.

In these days, when the light of publicity shines upon all public events, great and small, it is needless to say that there will be found abundant source materials for the study of the Fourth Constitutional Convention and its work.

The index with which this volume closes, it is believed, will be found a comprehensive and satisfactory guide to the Proceedings and Debates.

FIFTY-SECOND DAY

(LEGISLATIVE DAY OF APRIL 2)

EVENING SESSION.

MONDAY, April 8, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to recess, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. W. C. Stevenson, of Columbus, Ohio.

The president recognized the delegate from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. KNIGHT: Will the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] yield for a motion to suspend consideration of the present business for five minutes so seven or eight proposals can be referred to the committees?

Mr. ANDERSON: I will yield.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that the pending discussion be suspended for five minutes.

The motion was carried.

Mr. KNIGHT: I now move that the rules be suspended in order that we may make a reference of proposals to the committees.

The motion was carried.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposals were read the second time by their titles and referred as follows:

Proposal No. 322 — Mr. Bowdle. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

Proposal No. 323 — Mr. Hoffman. To the committee on Equal Suffrage and Elective Franchise.

Proposal No. 324 — Mr. Antrim. To the committee on Taxation.

Proposal No. 325 — Mr. Anderson. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

Proposal No. 326 — Mr. Anderson. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

Proposal No. 327 — Mr. Beatty, of Wood. To the committee on Legislative and Executive Departments.

Proposal No. 328 — Mr. Woods. To the committee on Corporations other than Municipal.

Proposal No. 329 — Mr. Knight. To the committee on Education.

Mr. PIERCE: I would ask the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] to yield that I may ask unanimous consent of the Convention to introduce a resolution.

The delegate from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] yielded and the gentleman from Butler [Mr. PIERCE] offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 99:

WHEREAS, This Convention has been in session for practically three months, and,

WHEREAS, The work so far accomplished is but a small fraction of the whole work to be done, and,

WHEREAS, It is now necessary to take up much time with committee work, and,

WHEREAS, Many of its members are engaged in agricultural pursuits who feel their services are required at home, and,

WHEREAS, If due weight and consideration are given to all proposals submitted, and that may be submitted hereafter, it will require much time to dispose of them, and,

WHEREAS, It should be the policy of this Convention to give every proposal careful attention without being hurried in its closing days, therefore,

Be it resolved, That it shall be the policy of this Convention to hold three sessions a day, except Monday, from 9:30 to 12:00 o'clock a. m.; 1:30 to 5:00 o'clock p. m., and from 7:00 to 10:00 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of each week until the Convention has fully completed its labors.

Be it further resolved, That this Convention shall adjourn after the session on Friday night of each week until the following Monday evening at 7:00 o'clock.

Be it further resolved, That the chairman and minority chairman, if any, of any committee shall not speak longer than one hour consecutively on any subject, and that no other member shall speak longer than thirty minutes, without the unanimous consent of this Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. KNIGHT: I now move that the discussion of the pending proposal be resumed.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Will the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] yield to me just a minute?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I introduced last Monday night an amendment to the Anderson proposal. I was asked by the vice president at that time to withdraw the resolution. I wanted to yield at the time, but my object in introducing it was to get it in the journal and printed so that every member could see what it is. During the last week, as some of you noticed, those members of the Convention who think the way to stamp out the evils in the liquor traffic is by a restricted license met and their conclusion was it would not be well at this time and in this Convention to inject another discussion on that proposal. You gentlemen know that I did not discuss the liquor proposition when it was up. It is a matter that does not touch me much personally, but I represent a constituency largely interested, and I want, with your permission, to make a motion now to indefinitely postpone Resolution No. 92 so it will not come up at this time. I want, before putting that motion, on behalf of the large wholesale interests, amounting to millions of dollars, in Cincinnati, to give due notice to all of you gentlemen, so you may know exactly what you are asked to do, that an amendment will be offered to the liquor license proposal when it comes up for its third reading. With that explanation I move to indefinitely postpone my resolution offered last Monday night.

Change in Judicial System.

The motion was carried.

On motion of Mr. Knight the consideration of the pending matter was then resumed and the chair recognized the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON: Gentlemen of the Convention: In the beginning, I wish to say that I do not expect to read from any books except those in front of me [referring to a number of Ohio State Reports], and in reality I have not these books here for that purpose, but I have them here so that if I am challenged I shall be able to prove by the supreme court reports that the statements I make are true.

Mr. DOTY: We would rather take your word for it.

Mr. ANDERSON: The only way I could get you to take my word would be to have the evidence in front of me.

Now take this Proposal No. 184. I believe that this is the most important proposal that has been before this body or will come before this body. If it becomes a law, it will produce the most immediate good to the largest number of people; and the greatest good I see in it is that it makes, in many questions, the circuit court the court of final determination. Judge Worthington has one thing in his amendment to which I very much object, and that is that all questions where the interpretation of a statute is concerned may be taken to the supreme court. That, in effect, would be the same as it is at the present time. You gain next to nothing, therefore, by the Peck proposal. I also object to the amendment suggested by the member from Fayette [Mr. JONES], for under his proposed amendment if the circuit court disagrees on questions of law and fact it would permit the case to go to the supreme court. It must be understood by you who are not attorneys that at the present time the supreme court does not review questions of fact, and that the amendment offered by the member from Fayette, instead of diminishing the amount of work of the supreme court, would increase it.

The object of the Peck proposal, as I understand it, is to effect a speedy and economical determination of the rights of litigants. In other words, it is for the purpose, if the litigant be right, of permitting him speedily and economically to obtain that which is his, and if he be not right, of permitting that fact to be determined quickly and cheaply. We all know the great hardships that are caused by the law's delay. There is not a writer in any magazine or a writer of text books, who in any way touches upon the subject, that does not speak in emphatic terms of the great hardship occasioned to the poor people by reason of the law's delay.

Let us analyze the proposal so you who are not lawyers may understand. Say, for instance, my friend, Mr. Watson, while upon the train coming to this Convention, by reason of a derailment, has suffered injury. By reason of his becoming a passenger the company agreed to carry him to his destination safely. The company, of course, is not an insurer, but by its contract it impliedly agreed to exercise the highest degree of care. Shortly after the accident the claim agent of the company goes to see Mr. Watson for the purpose of attempting to make a settlement, in which he fails. The next thing and the only thing left for Mr. Watson is to employ an attorney. The attorney draws a petition, Mr. Watson signs and swears to it and it is filed in the clerk's office and a summons issues. The railroad company is notified, through a deputy sheriff, that it has been sued. The summons is taken to the office of the corporation lawyers. The corporation, through its attorneys, for the sake of delay, files a demurrer or some motion. After the motion or demurrer is disposed of in Mr. Watson's favor, the railroad company, through its attorney, files an answer and in the answer it will probably set up contributory negligence on Mr. Watson's part, as he may have been standing in the aisle, or may have been attempting to walk through the car, or may have been on the platform at the time of the derailment. By reason of the claim of contributory negligence it will be necessary for Mr. Watson to file his reply. The filing and disposing of these papers in court will take at least six months. Then a jury is impaneled and at the end of the plaintiff's testimony a motion is made by the defendant's counsel to direct a verdict for the defendant. That motion is addressed to the learned man on the bench. The relationship of carrier and passenger existing between the railroad company and Mr. Watson, the motion will be denied. Then the defendant corporation puts in its evidence, and at the end of all the evidence the attorney for the defendant renews its motion to direct the verdict for the defendant, and that again is directed to and passed upon by the learned judge. Then upon the part of the railroad company comes a request to charge before argument and the charge is given provided it is the law. Then comes the argument of counsel to the jury, by the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant. After the arguments of counsel the judge charges the jury on what he believes to be the law, and in the charge he will especially caution the jury not to be influenced by prejudice or passion or sympathy in favor of the injured party. After considerable deliberation the jury brings in its verdict for Mr. Watson. Within three days the attorney for the defendant corporation files a motion for a new trial. That motion is heard by the judge and he reviews the evidence and the law, and if he finds the law and evidence both in favor of Mr. Watson he then renders a judgment on the verdict, and that ends the trial of the case in the common pleas court.

The next step taken by the railroad company is to get out a record and bill of exceptions. This is done by the official stenographer, and the bill of exceptions and record is in typewritten form; then the case is taken to the circuit court, composed of three men learned in the law, and those three men carefully and conscientiously review the law and the evidence, and if the evidence is in Mr. Watson's favor, and the trial judge has made no mistake in his charge to the jury before or after argument, and if he has made no mistake in overruling motions or demurrers, and if he has made no mistakes in the introduction or exclusion of evidence, then the circuit court will decide the controversy in Mr. Watson's favor. At least a year and one-half have elapsed from the time of the receiving of the injury and the time of the final determination by the circuit court, and hundreds of dollars have been spent in the way of attorney's fees, court costs and costs of records and briefs. The railroad company, through its attorneys, wishing to delay the payment of the judgment as long as possible, then takes the case to the supreme court, but before it can be taken to the supreme court the typewritten record on which it was tried in the circuit court must be printed, and the briefs of all parties must also be printed, all of which means an expenditure of a considerable amount of money. In about two years from the time that the circuit court found in favor of Mr. Watson the case would be heard and determined by the supreme court, consisting of six judges, and say, for the sake of argument, that the supreme court might find some technical, prejudicial error of the trial court in the introduction or exclusion of evidence or in its charge to the jury, that error would cause a reversal of the case and would necessitate Mr. Watson's starting again in the common pleas court, to all intents and purposes as if the case had never been tried.

The Peck proposal, provided it had been the organic law, would have stopped that case in the circuit court cheaply and quickly, and if the money was legally due Mr. Watson at all it was his at the time he was negligently injured, and if Mr. Watson were wrong in his contention, and there was no money legally coming to him, he ought to have found it out long before it was necessary to go to the supreme court. No one can claim that under the Peck proposal the corporation would not be entirely and completely protected in all things that honestly demand that protection should be extended.

The law today is not the poor man's law. The poor and the wealthy do not stand equally before the law. But some one may urge that the rich should have full opportunity to defend against any claim, but we insist that we give full opportunity to the wealthy to defend. Let us analyze it. Under the Peck proposal the petition, the demurrers, motions, answers, the motions to direct verdicts, the charging of the law before and after argument, the motion for a new trial, the trial of the case in the circuit court, or, if the Peck proposal is adopted, the court of appeals, are all addressed to learned judges, and surely after not only the jury has found in favor of the injured party, but all matters that the judges have a right to speak on are also determined in the plaintiff's favor, no one can claim that the corporation has not been properly protected and all of its rights conserved. It is a notorious fact that considerable attention of the railroad companies' attorneys is given to a study of determining how best a final determination of a claim against a railroad company can be delayed. A lawyer for a corporation is paid as much for causing delay as he is paid for actual work in the trial of a case.

Mr. ELSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Certainly.

Mr. ELSON: If I understand the Peck proposal it provides if a case involves a constitutional point it may be carried up to the supreme court; is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: Could not almost any corporation lawyer inject some kind of a constitutional point in the average case?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I do not think so. He could inject an interpretation of a statute in very nearly every case, but not a constitutional question, for the reason that practically every constitutional question that can be made, where a master is on one side and the servant on the other, or an individual on one side and a corporation on the other, has been determined. The corporations for so many years have been trying to escape liability through the avenue of the unconstitutionality of statutes that there is practically nothing left undecided.

It must be understood that we are trying to get the Peck proposal through, not as a protection to the lawyers, because if we were legislating in our organic law for the lawyer we would create a higher court, which would be over the supreme court, and we would probably, if we did our full duty toward the attorneys, not stop there, because every court in which a case can be reviewed, of necessity, means additional fees to the lawyer.

Mr. KRAMER: How much more do the attorneys who take damage suits against railroad companies get, if the cases go to the supreme court than if they stop in the circuit court?

Mr. ANDERSON: No more, as a rule, and for this reason: Unfortunately the men who have causes for wrongful injury, or a widow who has a cause of action for the wrongful death of her husband, have no money to pay the attorney a retainer or pay him his fees, because, with very few exceptions, it is the man who has to work around dangerous machinery or in dangerous occupation for his day's wage that is injured or killed, and, although we claim that we have great prosperity in the United States, it has required all the money he could possibly make by day's wage to take care of his family. Therefore, by reason of the poverty of the litigant the attorney has to take such case upon a contingent fee, and if it were not for the fact that some "damage lawyer" is willing to take the case upon a contingent fee the corporation would go acquit, and that is one reason why, through corporate influence, so many harsh and abusive things have been said concerning lawyers who take cases upon a contingent fee.

But let me again state we are not legislating with an eye single to the benefit to the lawyers, and therefore we claim that we should not be compelled to try our cases in the same old way. You know that the lawyer, other than the "damage lawyer," charges a big fee for taking a case to the supreme court. He assumes an air of importance and tells his client that he is taking it to the "supreme court of Ohio;" that he is getting out a printed record and brief, and by repeatedly mentioning the "supreme court" and producing a feeling of awe in his client he succeeds in charging a larger fee than it is worth, for it is easier to try a case in the supreme court than it is in the common pleas or circuit courts. An attorney should charge less, but he always charges more. Therefore, if we were legislating for the lawyers, we would add another court instead of reducing it by one. Nor are we legislating here for the benefit of the supreme court.

Speakers told us the other day—several of them—that if the Peck proposal prevailed the supreme court would not have much, if anything, to do, and the speakers' conclusions were, because the supreme court would not have anything to do, we must put that great burden and charge on the poor people to the end that the supreme court would be kept reasonably busy.

Let me again say we are not legislating with an eye single for attorneys and the supreme court; we are trying to legislate for the whole people of the state of Ohio, including the attorneys and the members of the supreme court. I admit that it is difficult to discuss this question without doing that which the newspapers may say is making an attack upon the supreme court, but I am not trying to do that. It is far from my intention. I have practiced law before a great many judges, both federal and state. I do not believe I ever practiced law before a corrupt judge; consequently, I am not trying to make an attack upon any judge or any set of judges, and that is one of the reasons I have here before me these many books which contain the opinions of the supreme court. I have a right to refer to what there is contained in these books. I am not in any way responsible for the record therein contained, and if it may be said that I criticise the supreme court such claim must be predicated upon the fact that the decisions which the court has made seem to create hardships.

Change in Judicial System.

The people who suffer most by reason of the law's delay are the persons of little or no wealth. The poor people who have to go into court to try to get that which is legally coming to them are those who while in the employ of some corporation have received an injury, or the representatives of those who while employed by a corporation were negligently killed.

Judge Taft, in speaking of this class of litigants, said:

No one can have sat upon the federal bench as I did for eight or nine years and not realize how defective the administration of justice in these cases must have seemed to the defeated plaintiff, whether he was the legless or armless employe himself or his personal representative. A non-resident railway corporation has removed the case which had been brought in the local court of the county in which the injured employe lived to the federal court, held, it may be, at a town forty or one hundred miles away. To this place, at great expense, the plaintiff was obliged to carry his witnesses. The case came on for trial, the evidence was produced and under the strict federal rule as to contributory negligence or as to the non-liability for the negligence of the fellow servant, the judge was obliged to direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

* * * How could a litigant thus defeated, after incurring the heavy expenses incident to litigation in the federal court, with nothing to show for it, have any other feeling than that the federal courts were instruments of injustice and not justice, and that they were organized to defend corporations and not help the poor to their rights?

You will notice that Judge Taft was describing the procedure in a federal court. For twenty years I have been practicing law and where it was possible I have taken my cases into the federal court instead of the state court. I did it because the federal courts of this part of the United States, notwithstanding the description of Judge Taft (himself, for years, a federal judge), were preferable to the state courts.

Let me read what another judge has said, a man of national reputation, and I especially desire to call your attention to the criticism made upon the floor of this Convention of the Peck proposal, in reference to that paragraph which, upon constitutional questions, holds that all of the judges of the supreme court must concur before they can hold an enactment of the general assembly unconstitutional. The writers upon constitutional law and the judges themselves, in their opinions, state that before an act can be declared unconstitutional its unconstitutionality must clearly appear. In fact, some writers claim that the rule is the same as in criminal cases, and the unconstitutionality must appear beyond the question of a reasonable doubt, and before a court can declare a law unconstitutional it is its duty to do everything within reason to so interpret the law in question as to render it constitutional. Since that is the rule, how can a court of nine, five one way, and four another, declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional? Is there not a doubt where four out of nine, all equally learned, hold an act to be unconstitutional?

Mr. JONES: Is it not the duty of every judge to give a case that comes before him his individual best judgment, and if the individual and best judgment of that court is that the law is unconstitutional is there as to that majority any reason for doubt?

Mr. ANDERSON: That is just the point. If the five were there by themselves constituting the court it would be all right, but there are four other men who are supposed to be equally learned, equally honest and equally conscientious, who do not agree with them. Does not that put the decision in the domain of doubt?

Mr. JONES: Is not there too much in your argument? If it proves anything in regard to the constitution does it not prove something in favor of the point I make?

Mr. ANDERSON: No.

Mr. JONES: In other words, the rule of a majority of the court determining the question does not apply?

Mr. ANDERSON: I will explain that. You remember I opposed the less-than-unanimous verdict in criminal cases because the rule in criminal cases differs entirely from that in civil cases. In criminal cases you have to find the accused guilty beyond the question of a reasonable doubt, but in civil cases all you need is probability. And our supreme court, in 80 O. S., there lays down the rule of probability. Where there are probabilities at stake, and only that, then it would be proper for the deciding court to render a verdict on probabilities, and that was the reason why I favored the passage of the Elson proposal, requiring less than a unanimous verdict in civil cases. But where the rule is that before an act can be declared unconstitutional it must be clearly and beyond a doubt so found, then a majority of one does not take such question out of the realm of doubt. Have I answered you?

Mr. JONES: Would it not be possible with that rule to put the judgment of one man against eight or nine?

Mr. ANDERSON: You don't want minority rule?

Mr. JONES: Suppose you have a case in the common pleas court where the common pleas judge holds the law unconstitutional, and the court of appeals also holds it unconstitutional. Now you go to the supreme court of six judges, and five of them declare it unconstitutional. Do you think it the right thing to let that one man man in the supreme court defeat the judgment of the five members of the supreme court, the three circuit judges and the common pleas judge?

Mr. ANDERSON: You didn't start back far enough. Where did the act come from?

Mr. JONES: Do you think it right to let one member of the supreme court, by his individual judgment, defeat the judgment of the other nine judges that the law was unconstitutional?

Mr. ANDERSON: You didn't start back far enough. In the first place, take the house of representatives. We presume there are a number of lawyers elected to the house, and we presume they are moderately well posted in the law, as well, say, as the average lawyers on this floor. It may be a violent presumption, but we will presume for the sake of argument that they are, and those lawyers give their best efforts to framing the law. Then from the house of representatives the act goes to the senate, and we will presume the senate has a like proportion of lawyers, who give their best attention to the consideration of the proposed law. And the house and senate pass it and then it goes to the governor—I hope in the future the governor will be a lawyer, and generally he has been a lawyer—and then we will presume that the governor, after careful consideration, does not veto it but approves it, and of course if there is any question concerning the constitutionality of the law he will ask the advice of his attorney general. Then we will say, later, in the court of common pleas the constitutionality of the act is questioned, but that the judge of the court of common pleas holds it to be constitutional; from there the case is taken into the circuit court and two circuit judges say it is unconstitutional and one says it is constitutional; from there the case is taken to the supreme court, composed of six learned men, and they divide equally three to three, and that by reason of the circuit court, divided though it was, holding the law unconstitutional, would cause the act of the legislature to be declared null and void. What have you in favor of the constitutionality of the act? The house of representatives, the senate, the attorney general, the governor, the common pleas judge, one of the circuit court judges and three of the supreme court judges. But as against them you have two circuit judges and three supreme court judges. So that, after all, you have, under my hypothetical statement, minority rule, and in reference to that which all law writers declare must be found unconstitutional beyond the question of a reasonable doubt.

Now let me read to you what this ex-judge, this man of national reputation, Mayor Gaynor, has said on this question:

Nothing is more distressing than to see a bench of judges, old men as a rule, set themselves against the manifest and enlightened will of the community in matters of social, economic or commercial progress.

The same rule is true in matters of moral and religious growth. Jesus, Socrates, and many who came after them, age after age, fell victims to judicial narrowmindedness.

Let me cite some of the recent judicial decisions which are planted right in the path of economic and social progress.

The tenement house tobacco case was decided by the court of appeals of this state in 1885.

Good men and women found tobacco being manufactured into its various products in tenements. They found little children born and brought up there in the unwholesome fumes of tobacco. They applied to the legislature and had a law passed forbidding the manufacture of tobacco in such tenements.

The courts held it was "unconstitutional." They professed to find this constitutional provision latent in the general provision in our state constitution that no one shall be deprived of "life, liberty or property without due process of law."

The court has said that the tenant has the right, under the constitution, to do what he liked in the way of lawful business in his tenement.

Some years later good and intelligent influences brought about the enactment of a statute for the sanitary regulation of underground bakeries. It prescribed a list of sanitary safeguards, and also that the employes should not work more than ten hours a day.

The supreme court of the United States declared this ten-hour requirement to be unconstitutional, as depriving workmen, without due process of law, of the "liberty" to work as long hours as they saw fit in underground bakeries.

The learned court stood five to four. Notwithstanding a rule which is often repeated by the courts that they will declare a statute unconstitutional only in a case free from doubt, they declared this statute unconstitutional. What is five to four but a state of doubt?

In 1893 the legislature passed a statute that women should not work in factories between the hours of 9 at night and 6 in the morning. This statute was intended to protect the health of women, and hence of their offspring.

It is almost inconceivable that the gentlemen then composing the court of appeals of this state found in this humane and benevolent law an infringement of the "liberty" of women.

It is not at all to be wondered at that such decisions should provoke a widespread dissatisfaction with the courts. These decisions so exasperated the people of this state that they swept them all out of existence.

Who is to be the judge of legislation as to whether it tends to general health, comfort, safety and welfare? The legislature, representing the community? No. The judges took that unto themselves. They judge, therefore, over the heads of the legislators and declare legislation unconstitutional which exceeds their opinion of what is economically or socially wise or beneficial.

No such power was ever given to the courts. They have simply taken it away from the legislative department of government. They have set themselves up as "protectors" of society against the lawmaking power, safeguarded as it is by the consent of two houses and the executive veto.

They do not seem to consider who is to protect us against them in their judicial legislation.

Mr. WATSON: Do you think that decision is rendered in the light of the Declaration of Independence?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I think it was in the "light" of big interests. I have no doubt all of you who are attorneys have in your library "Words and Phrases". Let me read from volume 3, page 2096:

The most odious and dangerous of all laws would be those depending on the discretion of judges.

Lord Camden, one of the greatest and purest of English judges, said:

The discretion of a judge is the law of tyrants; it is always unknown; it is different in different men; it is casual, and depends on constitution, temper and passion. At best it is often caprice. In the worst it is every vice, folly and passion to which human nature can be liable.

What is the definition of judge-made law? What do we mean by judge-made law? It very largely springs from the common law. The common law is supposed to be present wherever there are communities. As soon as you have a territory you have common law, and always within the borders of the state common law is present, and it differs in different states, because of the personality of the judges, because of the environment of the judges, because of the habit of thought of judges. Take Pennsylvania and Ohio. On the one side of the line you have one kind of common law and on the other side another and entirely different and distinct kind of common law. The rights of the people, so far as outlined by the common law, may be largely protected on one side, and just on the other side of the imaginary line dividing the states by reason of this same common law the rights of the corporation and "big business" may be supreme. Judge-made law very largely depends upon the condition of the liver of the judge at the time of its making.

Now you hear much of assumed risk. Assumed risk has been defined as the legal right given through judge-made law to a corporation to kill and maim without any legal responsibility on its part. Let me repeat it. The common law right given to the corporation to kill and maim its servants without any legal responsibility is known as the doctrine of "assumption of risk." In England away back in 1837, in what was known as the Presley case, the doctrine of assumed risk was first enunciated. It was not such bad law then, because few men were working together, each knew the other, each knew whether the other men employed were careless or drunken, and consequently they could be vigilant and guard against any negligence. This doctrine of the Presley case appeared in Massachusetts in 1844, in the Farwell case. It was like the English sparrow, insignificant when it arrived from England, but it has multiplied greatly. The assumption of risk has been used by the corporation lawyers, inducing judges to add a little in this case and a little more in some other case, always growing in the direction that causes the rights of the individual to be decreased, until it has taken upon itself such proportions that it is stronger than the rights of the individual; yes, even stronger than the acts of the legislature.

Another judge-made law is known as the "fellow servant rule." It was first enunciated in England, and it had its first application where not to exceed fifteen men were employed in a common enterprise. The doctrine of fellow servant was then based upon good logic and justice—that where each man worked so near to every other, and so few men are employed that each, in the exercise of ordinary care, can protect himself against the carelessness of his neighbor, then under the law, if he is injured by reason of the act of a co-employee, his master does not have to respond in damages. This judge-made defense has been ad'led to by innumerable judges, and the addition meant the diminishing of the rights of the individual, so that today the reason and logic of the rule have long ceased to exist. Take our big mills at Youngstown, where there are six or eight thousand men engaged in each mill. There is no opportunity for one of the men so employed to keep any supervision over any other, because, with the complicated machinery there used, the servant who may cause injury may be a long distance removed from the place at which the accident occurred. Yet if one of these men is injured by reason of the negligent act of any other the judge-made law exonerates the corporation. It must be understood that I am not in any way referring to the statutory law, but to the common law. Apply this doctrine of the fellow-servant to steam railroads. A telegraph operator, by reason of his inexperience—and no set of men, considering the responsibility resting upon them, are paid so poorly as telegraph operators—may cause injury to some brakeman who lives hundreds of miles from the place of work of the telegraph operator, but the judges hold that the negligence of the telegraph operator is the negligence of a "fellow servant" and the railroad company is innocent of any blame.

No judge-made law was ever repealed by any other judge-made law. Consequently, to try to escape from the rigors of the common law relief was sought through the lawmaking body instead of the law-interpreting body, and the result was that a number of protective acts were passed. I believe that the number in Ohio is from thirty to thirty-five. When a remedy, therefore, is sought by an individual against corporate interests, if you permit the interpretation of these protective statutes to be lodged in the court of last resort then you permit the statutory laws that take the place of the judge-made law to be interpreted by those who have applied the judge-made laws to the same conditions that are sought to be remedied by the statutes, and that is just what is accomplished under the Worthington amendment. It is urged that no statute would go to the court of last resort upon interpretation more than once, but the national safety appliance act has been taken to the federal courts for interpretation more than fifty times. Consequently, if the Worthington amendment becomes a part of this proposal it in a very large measure nullifies it.

I have here some reported cases that I looked up this afternoon and I believe they will be interesting to you. If there is any question as to any of them I have the Supreme Court Reports in front of me to prove the statements I am about to make. I was desirous of knowing the number of cases where the individual interest came in conflict with the corporation to determine to what extent a different result would have been had provided the Peck proposal had been the law for the last ten or fifteen years. When a case goes to the supreme court it is decided with or without report. In other words, if it is decided without report it is disposed of in very few words, the court stating whether the plaintiff in error or the defendant in error wins. If it is reported, then one of the judges writes the opinion. It is published in the Supreme Court Reports, and that becomes, on the particular legal question involved, the determining factor in other cases of the same nature. Consequently the great importance of reported cases will at once be seen. I understand that within two or three years past a law was enacted stating that the supreme court should give written reasons in all cases whether the case was affirmed or reversed, but the supreme court, not being in the same department with the lawmaking power, did not see fit to obey the law. I do not want any mistake made in reference to just what I mean, for I have only examined the reported cases where the individual was on one side and the corporation on the other, and where the circuit court was reversed by the supreme court. They are as follows:

- Railroad Company vs. Ehlert, Admr., 63 O. S. 320.

It will be noticed that I started with 63 O. S. and end with 84 O. S., the 84th being the last volume. I made this examination of these cases with the object in view of finding the cases that had been won by the individual in the circuit court and where, if the Peck proposal had been in effect, those cases would have ended and I find that of these reported cases thirty-three which would have ended in the circuit court in favor of the individual were reversed by the supreme court and reported. These cases, because they were reported, make the standard by which all inferior courts in the state of Ohio are to be guided—not only guided, but controlled. Therefore, it is quite important to those interested to have the law determined in their favor, because not only does the establishing of law control the lower courts in like cases, but when a similar case is brought into an attorney's office and he is consulted concerning it, he, in examining the Supreme Court Reports, will be compelled to advise his client in accordance therewith. There are thirty-three cases in those fourteen books [pointing to the books on the desk] which were won by the individual in the circuit court, but all of them, except those where judgment was rendered against the individual, were reversed and sent back to the common pleas court, compelling the individual to start his litigation all over again. In every one of these he had to wait for some years before a reversal was had in the supreme court, and it means, therefore, that he will have to wait an additional number of years before the case will again reach the supreme court, and in many instances the litigants were surrounded by abject poverty. The thing that is demonstrated by the examination of these reports is the fact that of the cases such as I have described, where the legal rights of the individual and of the corporation were in conflict, and where the circuit court was reversed by the supreme court and the cases reported, that one of such cases, within the fourteen volumes mentioned, was where the decision of the circuit court was in favor of the individual against the corporation. It means, therefore, that thirty-three cases were determined and established in favor of the corporation and one in favor of the individual. So there can be no mistake about the importance of reported cases and their far-reaching effect, let me give you another illustration: For many years it was held that where a railroad company owned a turntable and children were in the habit of congregating about the turntable and playing with it, it was the duty of the railroad company to exercise ordinary care to the end that the children should not, by reason of their playful instincts, receive injury. But we find, in 77 O. S., p. 235, in Railroad Company vs. Harvey, that the railroad company is not liable to an infant who is injured while playing with a turntable. The circuit court had held that the railroad company was responsible, and this is one of the cases among the thirty-three mentioned. This reported case being controlling upon all accidents of a like nature that would happen after its determination, it means that for all time, no matter how many children may be injured by the lack of ordinary care on the part of the railroad company in and about its turntable, yet no recovery can be had. This is the judge-made law in Ohio. The courts of the United States, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas, Iowa, California, Washington, Tennessee, Illinois, South Carolina, Georgia and Texas hold that where a railroad company failed to exercise ordinary care it would have to respond in damages. The one case of the thirty-four where law was made for the individual is McGarvey vs. Railway Company, 83 O. S. 73.

Mr. WATSON: May I here make one suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. WATSON: You will have no objection if I use that later on for the recall of judges?

Mr. ANDERSON: No I am not in favor of the recall of judges, nor am I in favor of the recall of decisions, but I do want to recall the court back to the people, and you do recall the court back to the people with this Peck proposal, for then you will have an opportunity of personally knowing all of the judges. The judges will be in closer contact with the people and the people with the judges; for judges who are nominated and elected in the state as a unit must be, of necessity, unknown at the time of the nomination and election to over ninety-five per cent of the voters. I am not one who believes that a judge suddenly becomes greatly more learned upon being transported from the common pleas or circuit bench to the supreme court. I do not believe that any judge on the supreme bench is any better qualified than such men as Judge King, Judge Norris and Judge Taggart. I would trust them with all great questions as willingly as I would the judges of the supreme court.

Mr. KRAMER: I want to understand you—

Mr. ANDERSON: I am trying to explain to men who are not lawyers.

Mr. KRAMER: Well, I want to understand too. Do you mean for us to infer that the supreme court was wrong in those thirty-three cases that were appealed from the circuit court and won by the railroads?

Mr. ANDERSON: Well, they are not always right are they?

Mr. KRAMER: How do you know?

Mr. ANDERSON: I have read some of the cases and I believe I can prove it to you. I have some of them here.

Mr. ROEHM: You have not included hundreds of cases that have gone unreported where the supreme court reversed similar cases.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I could not do that. I did not have time and it would mean the examination of more than a thousand cases, and not only the examination in the supreme court, but you would have to go back, because they are unreported, to the court below.

Let me suggest this to you: That certainly the rights of the individual had as much reason to be safeguarded by the supreme court as had the rights of the corporation. Then how can you in any way explain that in thirty-three out of thirty-four cases, where the circuit court was reversed and the cases reported, only one such case was favorable to the individual and thirty-three in favor of the corporation when it is understood that the reporting of a case means that the law which controls is thereby made?

Mr. HALFHILL: Were there any more cases carried up by the individual than the one you referred to?

Mr. ANDERSON: I have tried to make that plain. I only had time this afternoon to find these cases. I suppose I could have found a great many more by hunting longer. These are the cases the supreme court reported where its action is different from the circuit court and where it reversed and found in favor of the corporations.

Mr. TALLMAN: Is it not a fact that the circuit court deciding against the individual often report their cases?

Mr. ANDERSON: The circuit court?

Mr. TALLMAN: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Nobody pays any attention to those decisions.

Mr. TALLMAN: Don't they often report cases in favor of corporations?

Mr. ANDERSON: They certainly ought to and also in favor of the individual.

Mr. TALLMAN: Now if they decide any cases in favor of the corporation and the case is reported and then it goes up to the supreme court and the case is affirmed, does not that make the law as announced by the circuit court the decision of the supreme court?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I wish it did, but it does not—a non-reported case does not.

Mr. TALLMAN: It does to a number of bars.

Mr. ANDERSON: It does not to courts before which I practice.

Mr. TALLMAN: If the circuit court decides a case and reports a case, and that case goes to the supreme court and is affirmed, doesn't that adopt the opinion of the circuit court?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; the supreme court has made that very plain and has decided that in no way do they adopt as part of their findings that which the lower court reported. Ex-President Roosevelt, when he was here, said that which seemed very familiar to me, and I am afraid he did not use quotation marks. I will read from the case and tell you where he obtained it and I will read the whole paragraph. This is found in Railway Company vs. Taylor, 210 U. S. 295:

When applied to the case at bar the argument of hardship is plausible only when the attention is directed to the material interests of the employer to the exclusion of the interests of the employee and of the public.

Where an injury happens through the absence of a safe drawbar there must be hardship. Such an injury must be an irreparable misfortune to some one. If it must be borne entirely by him who suffers it, that is a hardship to him. If its burden is transferred, as far as it is capable of transfer, to the employer, it is a hardship to him. It is quite conceivable that congress, contemplating the inevitable hardship of such injuries, and hoping to diminish the economic loss to the community resulting from them, should deem it wise to impose their burdens upon those who would measurably control the causes, instead of upon those who are, in the main, helpless in that regard.

Now keeping that decision in 210 U. S. in mind, I want to call your attention to what the supreme court has held, and I read from the case of 49 O. S. 607:

The servant, in order to recover for defects in the appliances of the business, is called on to establish three propositions: 1, That the appliance was defective; 2, That the master had notice thereof, or knowledge, or ought to have had; 3, That the servant did not know of the defect, and had not equal means of knowing with the master.

Change in Judicial System.

An employe injured by reason of defective machinery has to establish, before he can recover, that he did not have equal means of knowing with the master. In other words, if he had equal means of knowing with the master then that would be a complete bar. In answer to this judge-made law I want to again quote from a decision by Judge Taft:

But the degrees of care in the use of a place in which work is to be done, or in the use of other instrumentalities for its performance, required of the master and servant in a particular case, may be, and generally are, widely different. Each is required to exercise that degree of care in the performance of his duty which a reasonably prudent person would use under like circumstances; but the circumstances in which the master is placed are generally so widely different from those surrounding the servant, and the primary duty of using care to furnish a reasonably safe place for others is so much higher than the duty of the servant to use reasonable care to protect himself in a case where the primary duty of providing a safe place or safe machinery rests on the master, that a reasonably prudent person would ordinarily use a higher degree of care to keep the place of work reasonably safe, if placed in the position of the master who furnishes it, than if placed in that of the servant who occupies it.

But in Ohio not only must the injured servant establish that he did not have equal means of knowing with the master, but this Ohio judge-made law states that the servant must further establish that he, the servant, did not know, nor in the exercise of ordinary care could he have known, of the defective machinery, but where a defect in the machinery or appliances caused the death of the servant, yet, under this judge-made law, the widow suing as administratrix must establish that her dead husband, before she can recover damages for herself and children, did not know, or in the exercise of ordinary care could not have known, that the machinery was defective.

Since the language used by one of the common pleas judges, in passing upon this holding, is stronger than any language that I would care to use, I will quote it:

I undertake to say that in a case like that of Clark, where a dead man is called upon to prove that he did not know a certain thing, that it is a substantial foreclosure of his cause of action. How is he going to prove that fact, that he himself had due notice or knowledge? * * *

Taking the 49 O. S., and have this man prove that he did not know of that existence, when he was in his grave, it simply bars him from the right of action. You can't do it; you might as well save your paper and pen in drawing that petition.—6 Nisi Prius. N. S. 451.

Mr. HALFHILL: Would you have the Convention believe that the legislature could not change it?

Mr. ANDERSON: Certainly they can change it, and they did do it in the Norris law, which I helped to pass and which I drafted.

Mr. HALFHILL: Didn't your law simply construe the law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Where do you find that?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is the common law you are speaking about, is it not?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; I am talking about the common law or judge-made law.

Mr. HALFHILL: Does not the judge apply the rule of the common law in all proceedings unless a statute changes it?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, but the judges make the common law.

Mr. HALFHILL: That is what I understand your proposal is for.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is it exactly.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then you can consistently criticize the judge if he is not furnished with the law by the legislature and the rule of evidence and substantive law is not changed by the legislature? That is the question I want to get at.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am afraid I put it awkwardly, my friend. The point I am trying to emphasize is this: I am trying to draw a distinction between the judge-made common law and legislative enactment, and I am trying to show the foolishness, as in the Worthington amendment, of putting up to the judge who makes the judge-made law (that kind of judge-made law that makes you go down into the grave to get evidence before you can recover) the right to interpret the legislative enactment which is supposed to take the place of his judge-made law.

Mr. HALFHILL: In the case in the United States court that you referred to there was a decision under the federal safety appliance act?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, a drawbar.

Mr. HALFHILL: There was no set act under consideration by the supreme court of Ohio, was there?

Mr. ANDERSON: Section 8 of the federal safety appliance act was written into it as an inhibition against assumption of risk as a defense.

Mr. HALFHILL: But in these cases in the supreme court of Ohio, which you criticize, the supreme court was not passing on legislative acts?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir.

Mr. HALFHILL: They were announcing the rule of the common law?

Mr. ANDERSON: That is their common law because it does not exist as statutory law.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not that a rule of common law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Of the judge who made it. It never was the statutory law and never will be.

Mr. HALFHILL: Let me ask you a question: Instead of attempting by fundamental law to control the supreme court in those matters of personal injury, is it not a fact that the best economic thought today teaches us that we should pass some laws that would distribute on the employer the burden?

Mr. ANDERSON: Workmen's compensation laws?

Mr. HALFHILL: Something of that kind, instead of leaving it to the court that we ought to get out of it by passing a proper workmen's compensation law; is not that the burden of the argument today, rather than put it into the fundamental law as you are arguing here?

Mr. ANDERSON: That is beside the particular question we are now discussing, but let me answer it, for

Change in Judicial System.

I have had some experience along that line. For some years my efforts have been directed toward just such an act as you suggest—workmen's compensation. I do not care how much it reduces my business. I am heartily in favor of it, because no crippled man or widow, where her husband has been wrongfully killed, ought to be compelled to employ a lawyer and pay him a contingent fee of a fourth or a third to obtain money which is honestly and legally due, but because of the practice that now exists, and for which the corporation is entirely responsible, such amount must be paid as contingent fees. I do not believe the so-called "damage lawyer" is to blame, for he certainly ought not to be expected to try the case without compensation, but the corporation, with its extremely able attorneys and active co-operation of many claim agents, is to blame. The individual certainly needs some legal assistance, and if individuals cannot employ attorneys upon a contingent fee, then, by reason of their poverty, they would be denied the right of being represented by counsel. But let us examine the history of workmen's compensation in Ohio, and see whether the corporations are in favor of it.

Some years ago we introduced the so-called Norris law, defining employer's liability, in the house of representatives and you, Mr. Halfhill, are familiar with it, and you know that it has worked no hardships, but it has been an extremely just law, and you further know that what the Norris law did was to correct the abuses that had grown up under judge-made laws. Remember that the corporations had never suggested that they wanted a workmen's compensation law, but when we began to have some success in the lawmaking body with the Norris act—thanks to the Ohio Federation of Labor—then the corporations developed a great friendship and interest for and in the workmen's compensation act, so much so that Mr. Brenner, of Springfield, who, by the way, failed of election for his second term, drew a substitute for the Norris bill. He and Mr. Cobb, who also failed of being elected for his second term, wished this substitute looking toward the establishment of workmen's compensation law to take the place of the proposed Norris law, and this substitute providing for a committee to be appointed to examine into workmen's compensation law was substituted in the house and such substitute was then sent to the senate, where Senator Matthews, of Cleveland, there had substituted the original Norris bill for the substitute sent over from the house. Then upon the Norris bill coming back to the house, it carried by practically a unanimous vote. It was indeed a little hard on the corporations, for in their attempt to escape from the liability law they had succeeded in getting started a demand for workmen's compensation, and we have it today by reason of the fact that they tried to kill all laws which would supersede the judge-made law.

And let me ask you this, Mr. Halfhill: If the corporations are so much interested in workmen's compensation, why do they not take advantage of the law now on our statute books?

Mr. TALLMAN: Don't you agree that all the crudities and injustices arising out of the extension of the rules of the common law which pertain to property and necessarily, under the advance of civilization, from the original common law of England where every employe associated with the man he worked with—the law of fellow servant—cannot all of those crudities and injustices be remedied by legislation, clear, plain and simple, that would be absolutely binding on the courts?

Mr. ANDERSON: I have a lot of matter that later on will answer that question.

Mr. TALLMAN: Do you agree with that?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I can prove just the opposite.

Mr. TALLMAN: If the judges go according to the intent of the legislative enactment, won't that be the result if a legislative enactment is sensibly drawn?

Mr. ANDERSON: Well—

Mr. TALLMAN: Answer yes or no.

Mr. ANDERSON: I will answer you. If the judges interpret according to the intent of the law that would produce the desired result, but unfortunately they seldom have done that.

Mr. TALLMAN: They are supposed to do it.

Mr. ANDERSON: But the supposition is in many cases wrong.

Mr. TALLMAN: You say you are not casting any reflections on the supreme court when you say that; aren't you casting reflections?

Mr. ANDERSON: If the statutes were not interpreted as their spirit indicated then let that fact be a reflection. I have the proof.

Mr. TALLMAN: Men may go wrong—

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't say they go wrong. I will read these cases and let you decide.

Mr. TALLMAN: If the legislature could remedy that and a legislative act goes to the supreme court for interpretation, have we not then with the interpretation of that statute one general rule applicable to all counties and districts of the state which everybody knows?

Mr. ANDERSON: Hypothetically it is true. That has to be true because your statement makes it such.

Mr. TALLMAN: If the case stops in the circuit court and there is no review by the supreme court, haven't we as many different rules of law, or may we not have, as there are circuit courts?

Mr. ANDERSON: Have you read the Peck proposal?

Mr. TALLMAN: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: You can get the answer in it.

Mr. TALLMAN: I would like to have you answer.

Mr. ANDERSON: The Peck proposal answers it.

Mr. TALLMAN: But I want you to answer it.

Mr. ANDERSON: There is a rule in the Peck proposal that those decisions can be made uniform.

Mr. TALLMAN: How about the poor fellow going there—he has to go to the supreme court to get uniformity?

Mr. ANDERSON: But there will be only one "poor fellow" to go, not hundreds as under the present system.

Mr. TALLMAN: The short route is to remedy by legislation.

Mr. ANDERSON: But legislation does not remedy it.

Mr. TALLMAN: That is with the legislature.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; it is not.

Mr. TALLMAN: Then we ought to have a referendum applied to these laws.

Mr. ANDERSON: Well, we can have it. Let me answer the gentleman. I did not intend to take this up at this time. Your position is this: Go to the legislature and get the legislature to pass certain laws, clear and distinct, and that will be such a check and control upon the supreme court that it will have to do the decent thing and quit making so-called judge-made laws. That is your statement, is it not? That is, you would correct the evil of judge-made laws because the judges do not correct it themselves, and because from year to year the judge-made defenses of contributory negligence, assumed risk and fellow servant are becoming more and more in favor of the corporation—you would correct them through the legislature?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. TALLMAN: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then you are saying more severe things against the supreme court than I.

Mr. THOMAS: Is it not a fact that it kept the labor organizations of Ohio busy amending the safety laws to meet the misconstruction placed upon them by the supreme court of Ohio?

Mr. ANDERSON: It seems that I cannot make that which might be called a speech. I will have to make myself understood through the medium of answering questions.

To illustrate what I mean, in stating that you can obtain the proper remedy through legislative made laws, I wish to call your attention to a number of cases. A man by the name of Naramore was working in the railroad yards at Cincinnati, if I remember correctly, and he was coupling and uncoupling cars in the night time, and although the rules of the company provide that a brakeman must not go between the cars while they are moving, yet the employe would be discharged if he insisted upon obeying the rules. The coupling or uncoupling has to be made while the cars are moving, and in 1884 or 1885 the legislature of Ohio did as Mr. Tallman suggested. It passed a law so clear, so far as construction is concerned, that there could not be any mistake about it, stating to the railroad companies that they had to block their frogs and guard rails, because railroad employes walking between the cars in the night season, busily engaged, under the old link-and-pin system, in attempting to uncouple cars, might step into the unblocked frog or guard rail and be caught, and these unguarded frogs and guard rails were largely of the same nature as traps that we as boys used to use to catch muskrats. They would hold a foot and when a foot was fastened the moving cars would cause the brakeman thus held to be injured for life or he would have his life crushed out. The legislature, therefore, to guard against this destruction of life and limb, passed a law requiring the railroad companies to block the frogs and guard rails. Naramore's foot was caught in one of these unguarded places and his foot was cut off. He started his suit in the state court and by reason of diverse citizenship and the amount involved being more than $2000, the railroad company removed it to the United States court at Columbus or Cincinnati and the case was there tried. The United States circuit court held that Naramore assumed the risk of the unblocked frogs and guard rails and could not recover. The case was then taken to the United States circuit court of appeals, composed of Judges Taft, Lurton and Severance, one of the ablest courts that ever rendered a decision. Judge Taft in his opinion said—

Mr. TALLMAN: Judge Taft held otherwise?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, and he was right. So that men who are not lawyers may understand this allow me to explain that assumption of risk grows out of contract, express or implied, and cannot arise in any other way. In other words, it is part of a contract of employment based upon the supposition that the man remains in the service of the master after he knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care might have known, of the dangers incident to the employment. The assumption of risk always sounds in contract, express or implied. Judge Taft said:

If, then, the doctrine of the assumption of risk rests really upon contract, the only question remaining is whether the courts will enforce or recognize as against the servant an agreement, express or implied, on his part to waive the performance of a statutory duty of the master imposed for the protection of the servant, and in the interests of the public, and enforceable by criminal prosecution. We do not think they will. To do so would be to nullify the object of the statute.

The only ground for passing such a statute is found in the inequality of terms upon which the railway company and its servant deal in regard to the danger of their employment. The manifest legislative purpose was to protect the servant by positive law, because he had not previously shown himself capable of protecting himself by contract; and it would entirely defeat this purpose thus to admit the servant to contract the master out of the statute. It would certainly be novel for a court to recognize as valid an agreement between two persons that one should violate a criminal statute; and yet, if the assumption of risk is the term of a contract, then the application of it in the case at bar is to do just that.—37 C. C. A. 502 (opinion by Taft, circuit judge).

That is a good, commonsense, humane and confidence-inspiring opinion, is it not?

Mr. TALLMAN: I thoroughly agree with just what he said there and if the statutes had added that failing to put in that guard they would be liable for damages, or if they had made the act something similar to employers' liability, the court could not have made the decision they did.

Mr. ANDERSON: You are getting in a little too far. You apparently are not familiar with what our supreme court did later. A man named Johns, in the night season, in the railroad yards in Cuyahoga county got his foot caught in an unguarded guard rail and the moving cars crushed his life out. I suppose the lawyers for the widow knew about the Naramore case. She as administratrix brought suit against the railroad company for illegally killing her husband. The corporation, in attempting to save a few dimes, was a wilful lawbreaker, subject under the laws of Ohio to a fine, and by reason of its failure to spend a few dimes the head and support of the Johns family was taken away. The corporation and the servant being citizens of the same state, the case could not be removed to the federal court. There being no diverse citizenship there could be no right predicated on the federal statutes, and it had to remain in the state court and the supreme court held that as a complete defense to the widow's right to recovery the railroad company could set up the doctrine of assumption of risk.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. TALLMAN: That was before the passage of the switch-block law.

Mr. ANDERSON: It certainly was not before the passage of that law. You are not familiar with it. I will give you the case. The accident happened after 1885.

Mr. TALLMAN: Did that take place while the employers' liability act was in force?

Mr. ANDERSON: It was under exactly the same circumstances and the same statute as applied in the Naramore case where Judge Taft held that recovery could be had. In other words, the United States circuit court of appeals held that where the master was a lawbreaker and the lawbreaking propensity proximately caused the injury to the servant, then in a suit by the servant for damages the corporation could not set up as a defense assumption of risk.

Mr. TALLMAN: I fully understand you and fully agree with you.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then you do not agree with the supreme court?

Mr. TALLMAN: But no decision could be made under the employers' liability as passed—

Mr. ANDERSON: You mean the Norris law?

Mr. TALLMAN: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I took care of that when I drew it, but the point I am making—

Mr. TALLMAN: If there were equal care in the passage of laws by the legislature could not that remedy all the ills of which you complain?

Mr. ANDERSON: I am not advancing the argument for that purpose. Your position is that the lawmaking body, the legislature, must say to the lawinterpreting body, the supreme court, that it must not continue in using judge-made laws.

Mr. ROCKEL: How will the Peck proposal prevent the supreme court in the future from rendering such decisions?

Mr. ANDERSON: It will not if Judge Worthington's amendment prevails, for if upon interpretation of the statute it would then go up to the supreme court we would have the same conditions. I am trying to make it plain to those who are not lawyers—and I think I will have less trouble with them than with the lawyers—to show them the necessity of killing the Worthington amendment.

Mr. TAGGART: You find no such difficulty in the substitute I offered for the Worthington amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I am thoroughly satisfied in that respect with yours. Mr. Halfhill and Mr. Tallman have been anxious to know, judging from their questions, whether the harm arising from judge-made law cannot be minimized by acts of the legislature, or, in other words, have the statutory law take the place of judge-made law, but it has been demonstrated that the great trouble is that the judges, by interpretation, practically nullify the statutory law which was made to nullify judge-made law, as the following will demonstrate:

The coal miners of the state, being compelled to work under ground, where to a large extent they are unable to protect themselves, and such work being extremely dangerous, the legislature, believing that some protection was needed, enacted a law, but this protective law was not enacted until after years of hard work upon the part of the miners' organizations. This very just and humane law provided that mines should have proper outlets—cages should be fitted with safety appliances; should have proper ventilation; that working places should not be driven more than sixty feet in advance; that such working places should be examined every morning; that safety appliances should be supplied; have covers over the hoods of cages; that boilers should not be nearer than sixty feet to shaft or slope and that safety lamps should be provided. Then to enforce the law it was further provided:

For any injury to persons or property occasioned by any violation of this act, or any wilful failure to comply with its provisions by any owner, agent or manager of any mine, a right of action shall accrue to the party injured for any direct damage he may have sustained thereby; and, in any case of loss of life, by reason of such wilful neglect or failure, as aforesaid, a right of action shall accrue to the widow and lineal heirs of the person whose life shall be lost, for like recovery of damages for the injury they shall have sustained. Sections 298 to 301, inclusive.

Thousands of miners in Ohio, after they caused this law to be placed on the statute books, believed, and rightly so, that they had obtained something of substance; something that provided, if a mine owner should become a lawbreaker and by reason of such disregard to the law the miner received injuries, that he would receive reasonable compensation for such injuries, or if by reason of the disregard of the law by such mine owner his life would be crushed out, that his family would receive damages for illegally causing his death, but the judge-made law and the statutory law came in conflict, and this conflict was resolved in favor of the judge-made law. For we find in 53 O. S., at page 26, in the case of Krause vs. Morgan, the following, which was the decision of the supreme court in that case:

One who voluntarily assumes a risk thereby waives the provisions of a statute made for his protection. And where a statute does not otherwise provide, the rule requiring the plaintiff in an accident for negligence to be free from fault contributing to his injury is the same, whether the action is brought under a statute or at common law.

It seems that it would be impossible to state in plainer and more forcible language than was stated in this statute that a right of recovery shall accrue to the injured person, yet the supreme court, in this decision, by reason of the judge-made defense of assumption of risk, so far as any benefit to the thousands of miners in Ohio was concerned, wiped the statute from the books.

Mr. TALLMAN: That decision was made long before the passage of the mining act, the section of which you just read.

Mr. ANDERSON: Certainly not. The supreme court in this case refers to this particular law in their decision. Will one of the pages please take this book to the gentleman [giving to the page the 53 Ohio State Report]? I advise him for his own information to read it.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. TALLMAN: This was decided in 1890, and the mining act or section to which you refer was passed in the revision of the act later than that.

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir. The code was passed some time ago, but the law upon which this decision was predicated was the same before the passage of the so-called miners' code. It is in sections 203 and 204. If you will consume some of the time in reading the decision that I have sent you instead of devoting so much time to questions you will find that I have correctly informed you. Laws of this same nature have been passed for the protection of children, and every father ought to be interested in these laws. Our legislature, some years ago passed a law on this subject and the same kind of a law was enacted in Pennsylvania and New York and is today the law in those states. Pennsylvania is supposed to be corporation-ridden. In fact, one of the law writers in Pennsylvania employs this language:

The law-interpreting and the law-creating power of Pennsylvania are run by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company with as much regularity as the trains on its tracks.

It has recently been said that when the lawmaking body of Pennsylvania was about to adjourn a member arose and said: "Mr. President, if the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has nothing further for us to do, I move we do now adjourn." But this supposedly corporation-ridden state of Pennsylvania has this law in reference to children, stating to the corporations that they must not employ in and around dangerous machinery children under fourteen or sixteen years of age. Let me read to you a decision of the courts of Pennsylvania, growing out of the disobedience of the law, and where a child, by reason of its immature age, not being able to protect itself, was injured:

It is within the power of the legislature to fix an age limit below which children shall not be employed in dangerous kinds of work, and an employer who violates the law by engaging a child under the statutory age does so at his own risk, and in an action of trespass for personal injuries sustained in such employment, the master cannot set up as a defense either the assumption of risk or the contributory negligence of the child servant. — Stehle vs. Automatic Machine Co., 220 Pa. St. 617.

Then let us see what the corporation-ridden state of New York has done upon this same subject:

Laws of 1897, c. 415, sec. 70, prohibiting the employment of a child under the age of fourteen years in any factory, is a determination, in effect, that a child of that age does not possess the judgment and discretion necessary for the pursuit of a dangerous work, and is not, as a matter of law, chargeable with contributory negligence or with the assumption of any risk of the employment. — Marino vs. Lehmaier, Court of Appeals, N. Y. 66 N. E. 572.

You notice that in these states the supreme court, instead of attempting to put up judge-made laws in opposition to the express will of the legislature, assisted in enforcing, to its very letter, the law as passed. Let us find out what the courts of Ohio hold in similar cases. It must be remembered that all of these states — Pennsylvania, New York and Ohio — upon this question of employment of children have in all respects the same statutory law, and so that the harm that the Worthington amendment will work, if adopted, may be fully understood, I now read to you from 67 Ohio State, p. 76:

The employment of the plaintiff, when he was under sixteen years of age, was not the proximate cause of the injury, and it could not in any degree tend to show that the defendant was negligent in not giving or causing to be given, to the plaintiff, proper instructions as to operating the machine.

Mr. ROCKEL: I understand that you believe the circuit court is better able to interpret laws than the supreme court?

Mr. ANDERSON: The circuit court does not make judge-made law.

Mr. ROCKEL: Why could it not, and why would it not just as likely do that as the supreme court?

Mr. ANDERSON: It could, but does not and I will tell you why.

Mr. ROCKEL: Well, I want to know why.

Mr. ANDERSON: Because you have recalled the courts back to the people. The courts are not now close to the people, for not five per cent of the voters of Ohio know the candidates for judge of the supreme court at the time of the nomination and election.

Mr. ROCKEL: You said a moment ago you believed the members of the supreme court were honest.

Mr. ANDERSON: I do. Do you mean to say that what I have read indicates that they are not?

Mr. ROCKEL: If they are honest in their opinions the circuit court might render the same kind of an opinion.

Mr. ANDERSON: They might.

Mr. ROCKEL: I don't know about that.

Mr. ANDERSON: I do.

Mr. ROCKEL: Do you mean to say that the supreme court is influenced in some way?

Mr. ANDERSON: I certainly do not mean to say that they are affected in any way by any outside influence, but I do want to say — for if I do not answer you it might be said that I could not — I have represented individuals for twenty years, in all kinds of courts, and in ninety per cent of such cases I have been on the side of the individual, fighting corporations. I do not deserve any credit for it; I got paid for it. My environment has necessarily caused a habit of thought and I admit that I am prejudiced. It could not be otherwise, and I could not divest myself of that habit of thought or that prejudice by being elected judge and going upon the bench. I would be inclined to see all of the circumstances in a favorable light to the plaintiff's interest, or in trying to be fair, knowing my prejudice, I would lean too far the other way. But I believe, notwithstanding my habit of thought and my prejudice, notwithstanding my over twenty years of service on the side of the individual, I could be as fair on the bench as any man who had twenty years or more training on the side of the corporation.

Mr. ROCKEL: Then we have put the wrong kind of man on the supreme bench?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. ANDERSON: If you agree with me that I would be the wrong kind of a man to be placed on the bench, then you must agree that men of long corporation training, men who have specialized in favor of corporations, are also the wrong kind of men to place on the bench.

I have spoken from the money standpoint, or as to recovery of money damages that ought to be received by the individual in cases of this nature, but there is a bigger and better side to it, for just as soon as we commence making corporations obey the law, just so soon you will largely prevent accidents, and that is the big thing to be accomplished—make the corporations responsible in damages every time that they disobey the law which is passed for the protection of the individual, and the corporations, through their officers, will commence to obey the law, but so long as the corporation can save itself through the defense of fellow servant, contributory negligence or assumption of risk—the judge-made defenses—it will not obey the law. Take the laws I have mentioned, which were passed for the protection of children. If the corporation does not have to respond in damages the corporation will pay no attention to obedience of the law, for only a small fine is imposed. A child is employed around dangerous machinery by a lawbreaking corporation, and if it is crippled the corporation pays a fine of $25. But if you say to a corporation that if it becomes a deliberate law-breaker then it will have to pay thousands of dollars to that child so that the child can be educated, so that he can make a living by the use of brain instead of brawn, that corporation will quit employing children under the age limit.

William H. Tolman, the director of the museum of safety and sanitation, New York, in representing the United States Steel Company, in a lecture before the chamber of commerce at the city of Youngstown, in January, 1910, said:

The most conservative estimate of the loss, in cash, to the wealth of the United States through preventable accidents in the various industries is $125,000,000 a year.

It is worth while for employers of American labor to adopt the safeguards which shall preserve to the nation the lives and limbs of the 500,000 workers now annually incapacitated or killed, whose wage-earning capacity, estimated at the low average of $500 apiece, means a loss to the country of $250,000,000 each year.

Here I have a statement from Mr. Davis, the factory inspector of Illinois, and I call your attention to this because the law to which Mr. Davis refers is like our factory act, passed in 1900, which through judge-made law and judge-made interpretation, has been very largely nullified. Mr. Davis said:

This danger device could be recast into a safety device for thirty-five cents; the projecting top of the set screw could be sunk flush with the rest of the whirling shaft, and then no sleeve could be caught by it, no human body could be swung or thrown by it, no father or mother could be made to grieve for a son, no woman could be widowed by it.

What remote consequence of long and lonely years may be in a quarter and a dime! More than once it must have happened that a widow had her rent paid by a charity society to which yellow-backed bills were contributed by a manufacturer who could have prevented her from being a widow by the proper expenditure of a quarter and a dime.

From these statements it will be seen that no hardship whatever rests upon the corporation if it be made to obey the law and the preventable accidents will be largely done away with.

For the purpose of demonstrating that the enforcement of laws will compel the corporations to obey, and by obeying greatly reduce the number of injured and killed, I wish to read from a report made by Mr. Mosely, secretary of the United States interstate commerce commission, page 57 of the report of 1902:

The gratifying results of the law of 1893, requiring the use of automatic car couplers and of power brakes, were spoken of in the Fifteenth Annual Report. The benefits of the law have been increasingly evident during the last year in particular. The number of persons killed and injured in coupling and uncoupling cars during the year ending June 30, 1912—the first entire year reported since the law went into full effect—shows a diminution as compared with 1893, the year in which the law was passed, of 68 per cent in the number killed and 81 per cent in the number injured.

Mr. TALLMAN: That was a statute?

Mr. ANDERSON: A federal statute.

Mr. TALLMAN: And a good one.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes. The courts of Ohio practically nullified a similar state statute, until in 1906 it was amended, in reference to assumption of risk and contributory negligence.

Mr. LAMPSON: Was not a similar statute passed in Ohio before that?

Mr. ANDERSON: Not containing assumption of risk and contributory negligence clauses. That statute was passed in 1906.

Mr. LAMPSON: It was introduced by myself in the senate and became a law before that.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; that was the law. But recently in reference to a safety-appliance clause, where a locomotive crane was involved, the supreme court, even with a statute containing the assumption-of-risk and the contributory-negligence clause, held it to be null and void, and this case came up from your county, Mr. Lampson.

I wish to say a few words in conclusion in reference to the proposed amendment by the delegate from Fayette [Mr. JONES]. If this amendment carries it permits all cases where there is a disagreement in reference to the law or the facts in the circuit court, or in the new court of appeals, to go to the supreme court. It is my opinion that the court of appeals ought to be required, before they reverse a case coming from the common pleas court on questions of fact, to be unanimous. I am not so sure that this would be the just rule on questions of law. I at one-time had a case where a man by the name of Alburn had a son injured. The injured son was a brother of Assistant Attorney General Alburn. The young man was injured while driving a wagon in the country across the tracks of the Pennsylvania Company, which were constructed at grade, and before we finished the case it was tried before eighty-four jurors, and all of the eighty-four jurors held that the company was guilty of negligence, that Alburn was free of contributory negligence and should recover damages. Yet the judge set his judgment up—upon purely questions of fact, and denied a recovery, where it is supposed that the average juror is as good, if not a better, judge of fact than the judge himself—against the judgment of the eighty-four jurors. The supreme court of the United States has given a beautiful description of the jury and its duties. This is taken from the 17th Wallace, 657:

Certain facts we may suppose to be clearly established, from which one sensible, impartial man would infer that proper care had not been used and that negligence existed. Another man, equally sensible and equally impartial, would infer that proper care had been used, and that there was no negligence. It is this class of cases and those akin to it that the law commits to the decision of a jury. Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and men of little education; men of learning and men whose learning consists only in what they themselves have seen and heard; the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer; these sit together, consult, apply their separate experience of the affairs of life to the facts proven and draw a unanimous conclusion. The average judgment thus given, it is the great effort of the law to obtain. It is assumed that twelve men know more of the common affairs of life than does one man; that they can draw wiser and safer conclusions from admitted facts; thus occurring, than can a single judge.

One more quotation and I have finished, and since this is from a certain ex-president of the United States, I especially request the attention of Mr. Fackler:

The special pleaders for business dishonesty, in denouncing the present administration for enforcing the law against the huge and corrupt corporations which have defied the law, also denounce it for endeavoring to secure sadly needed labor legislation such as a far-reaching law, making employers liable for injuries to their employees. It is meet and fit that the apologists for corrupt wealth would oppose every effort to relieve weak and helpless people from crushing misfortune brought upon them by injury in the business from which they gain a bare livelihood. The burden should be distributed. It is hypocritical baseness to speak of a girl who works in a factory where the dangerous machinery is unprotected as having the "right" freely to contract to expose herself to dangers to life and limb. She has no alternative but to suffer want or else expose herself to such dangers, and when she loses a hand, or is otherwise maimed or disfigured for life, it is a moral wrong that the whole burden of the risk necessarily incident to the business should be placed with crushing weight upon her shoulders, and all who profit by her work escape scot-free.

Let us take the courts back to the people. Let us have speedy and inexpensive trials in the ascertainment of the rights of the individual. Let us make the poor man understand that he, in the courts, can get justice. Let us make him understand that they will afford him full legal protection. I say to you that you can accomplish this by passing this Peck proposal.

The president recognized the delegate from Noble.

Mr. THOMAS: Will the gentleman yield for an amendment?

Mr. TAGGART: There cannot be any more amendments to the Peck proposal. Mr. Worthington's substitute strikes out all of the previous amendments, and it has to be an amendment offered to my amendment.

Mr. THOMAS: I have it drafted that way.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend by striking out the of Taggart proposal the words "adopted by the general assembly" in line 25, also the words "except by the concurrence of the five judges of the supreme court." Place a period after the word "court" in line 26.

Mr. THOMAS: I want to explain that so that the members can understand it. It simply means that no statute can be held unconstitutional and void by any proceedings of this court.

Mr. WATSON: I want to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM [Mr. Dory]: The chair would like to acquaint himself with the parliamentary status.

[After being informed by the secretary] The chair will rule three amendments are now pending and that is all we can have under the rules. The member from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] will withhold his amendment.

The chair recognized the delegate from Noble.

The delegate from Noble yielded to a motion to recess until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock, which was carried.

FIFTY-THIRD DAY

(LEGISLATIVE DAY OF APRIL 2)

MORNING SESSION.

TUESDAY, April 9, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to recess, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. T. L. Lowe, of Columbus, Ohio.

The gentleman from Noble [Mr. OKEY] was recognized.

Mr. OKEY: I shall endeavor to make my remarks on this subject brief.

I am in favor of the Peck proposal, with some of the amendments that have been offered. It has been the sincere desire of your committee to correct by this proposal some of the objectionable features of our present judicial system. I believe that this proposal, if adopted, would be beneficial to the people and remove some of the evils that now exist in our judicial procedure. There is much complaint about the law's delay and it does not require one of deep discernment to see that such complaint is well founded. The end of all judicial investigation is the ascertainment of truth and the wise and just determination of the rights between litigants. Long delays are not conducive to the correct determination of the legal rights of parties, nor are the number of courts through which parties must pass in order to have their rights finally and authoritatively adjudicated a criterion of justice. Neither is the number of courts an evidence that the legal rights of parties will be better or more accurately determined than if there was only a designated number of courts to pass on the same question.

In passing on a proposition of this character, we should consider what will best subserve the interest of the people as a whole, and not what will best please a class. It is doubtless true that there are some in the legal profession who look with jealousy upon any attempt to adopt an innovation in our legal procedure or to limit the jurisdiction of any court. But if by adopting a change in our courts we can best meet the ends of justice and at the same time have the rights of litigants determined more expeditiously and reach a finality quicker, then all true lawyers who want to exalt the profession and ennoble the calling will hail such a change with delight. It is only those who look upon the profession of the law as a purely financial business and not as a high calling, and who look upon a trial for the adjudication of right as a trick, who will oppose measures tending to correct defects and evils in our judiciary. The more courts through which they can drag their clients, the more fees.

Is the financial question the governing question in determining whether we will adopt a change in our judicial system? What is the best system for the people? What will correct the delay in the trial of cases and prevent litigants being dragged from court to court before the matter is finally determined? These are matters that we ought to wisely consider. It is necessary that there be a court of last resort and it would seem that the sooner parties can reach that tribunal the better. It is designed by the proposal before us to bring a court of last resort down close to the people and clothe it with the powers of a court of last resort, except as to certain expressly excepted matters. Under the proposal now under consideration, we will have a trial court, and one court of review, called a court of appeals, with power to hear cases on appeal or upon the evidence de novo as amended.

It seems to me that this proposal would be of great benefit to the people in our smaller counties, where a great majority of the cases involve a small amount. While the rights involved in this class of cases are just as sacred as when large amounts are involved, yet the burden in this class of cases is too great on the litigants if they can be taken from court to court in order to get a final determination of the rights of the parties. The great bulk of the litigation among the people is of such character that it ought to be finally determined in two courts. The people would be satisfied with this and the ends of justice would be better subserved than they now are. As soon as the people would know that there was one court only above the trial court clothed with power to finally adjudicate their rights that court would meet with favor among the people, because they would then see an end to litigation. The circuit court as now constituted is a court through which every one must pass in order to get to the supreme court, the court of last resort.

The people in general would be satisfied with the court of appeals as is provided for in the proposal. They are not asking for more courts; they are asking that justice may be administered more expeditiously. Now what would be the situation if this proposal were adopted and become a part of the organic law of this state? There would be two courts for the trial of cases. In the trial court we would have a judge and twelve men who would hear the evidence and pass upon the law and facts; the jury to pass upon the facts, and the court to announce the law. We would have in this case in effect the judgment of thirteen men upon the controversy in question. If the case should go to the court of appeals it would there be heard by the three judges. So that before the case would be finally determined it would have been passed upon by sixteen men. It would seem that every phase of any case would be sufficiently considered after it has passed in review and been heard and considered by four judges learned in the law and the twelve laymen. Litigation ought to stop there; there must be a limit somewhere to the end that delays in litigation may be reduced to the minimum.

As a matter of fact seventy-five per cent of the cases stop in the circuit court even under our present system. This shows that the people as a rule are content to stop at this intermediate court, although it is not a court of last resort. And a very large per cent of the cases that go to the supreme court are affirmed in that court. If we would take the time to examine the class of cases that are taken to the supreme court we will find that a large majority of the cases concern corporate rights and big interests and the questions involved do not concern or grow out of the common transaction of the people in common life.

It seems that there are some bar associations who do not indorse this proposal. However, I take it that we have not met here to please a bar association, but to adopt a judicial system that will be beneficial to the whole people. Our present judicial system has existed, with slight modifications, for sixty years. Conditions then were different from what they now are. The world has moved since then and new conditions exist today, but our judicial system has remained the same. The people demand that our system of court procedure be changed to meet the new order of things, and if the bar is not willing to move, the people will. Seventy-five years ago the farmer reaped his grain with the sickle, later on he cut it with the cradle, but today he reaps it with the reaper. The farmer has accepted the improved machinery and has utilized it in his business.

Is the bar to be a barnacle upon the body politic? I take it that this does not meet the approval of the great body of the legal profession in this state. I believe that the great bulk of lawyers in this state are in favor of a reform in our judicial system.

Now we come to one more phase of the proposition that I wish to discuss before I close. This proposal provides that no statute adopted by the general assembly shall be held unconstitutional and void except by the concurrence of all the judges of the supreme court sitting in the case. To this provision there seems to be some objection. I am in favor of this provision of the proposal for the reason that a court in declaring a law unconstitutional is nullifying a legislative act that presumably expresses the will of the people acting through their chosen representatives. The effect is to defeat the will of the people.

Another reason for favoring the concurrence of all the judges in declaring a law unconstitutional is that a court in so doing is exercising an assumed power and one that has not been given to it by the constitution.

Let me remark that there is not a civilized country upon earth that ever permitted its judiciary to declare a legislative act unconstitutional, and yet we, the boasted nation of freedom, where we say the government rests upon the consent of the governed, have permitted our courts to exercise and assume power that was never given them under the constitution.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is not the constitution a higher expression of the will of the people than an act of the legislature?

Mr. OKEY: I think it is. I think that is true.

Mr. NYE: Suppose the legislature, both senate and house, pass a law by a bare majority of one in each body; does it give the law any more authority than simply of that bare majority and why should not the supreme court by a majority declare it unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: I will touch on that as I go on.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you think the reasoning in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, has ever been answered by anybody who opposes or sustains the position you take?

Mr. OKEY: I will admit that it is a great argument; as to whether it has ever been answered would, of course, be a mere matter of opinion.

Mr. FACKLER: What would be the purpose of a written constitution if acts of the general assembly could not, under any circumstances be set aside?

Mr. OKEY: I would not see any use for it.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is it not one of the very highest functions of a court to sustain the will of the people as proposed in their constitution?

Mr. OKEY: I think it is. Personally I do not believe a court has the right, and I am quite sure it has no inherent right, to declare an act of the legislature null and void, but if the assumed power is to be retained by our courts it ought to be guarded as much as possible. You know they have told us here, some of them, when we ask that the people be given a right to govern themselves, that that right ought to be safeguarded. Now, if we are to give the supreme court of our state authority to declare a statute null and void, I believe that the same right, the same guarding of power, should be imposed upon the court that they ask to be imposed upon the people, and for that reason—that the exercise of the power may be guarded—I want a unanimous decision before they can say that an act of the legislature is null and void.

Even after John Marshall had assumed the power—that is where they got it—John Marshall was the first judicial legislator in this country—

Mr. FACKLER: Is it not a fact that Alexander Hamilton was arguing in the Federalist directly for the existence of this power, that it must be lodged some place, with somebody to declare that something passed by the legislature was against the constitution, and the place to lodge it was with the judiciary? Was not that Hamilton's original position and argument?

Mr. OKEY: He may have been the originator, but John Marshall is the judge who was the first to exercise that power. I say even after John Marshall had assumed the power to nullify legislative acts, great judges and jurists regarded the annihilation of a law as an exceedingly grave act. Justice Chase in 1796 said:

If the courts have such power I am free to declare that I will never exercise it but in a very clear case.

Mr. NORRIS: Is not that the rule now?

Mr. OKEY: It ought to be the rule, but I think there have been many decisions made without observing that rule. I do not believe they have given the benefit of doubt to the law.

Justice Waite in 1878 said:

Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a reasonable doubt.

That is the rule, is it? It ought to be, but the question is, is it observed? One branch of the government can not encroach upon the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule. Listen to the voice of the great jurist of modern time, Justice Harlan, who in 1905 said:

If there be doubt as to the validity of the statute that doubt must therefore be resolved in favor of its validity, and the courts must keep their hands off, leaving the legislature to meet the responsibility for unwise legislation.

Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to a Mr. Jarvis in 1820, said:

You seem to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions, a very dangerous doctrine indeed, and one that would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy.

The courts have gone too far in declaring laws unconstitutional.

Now these are the opinions of some of the great jurists in this country upon the question we have been considering.

Mr. NORRIS: I understand that you oppose anything but the unanimous opinion of the court on constitutional questions?.

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. NORRIS: If there are six judges of the supreme court and five of them want to declare a statute unconstitutional, you would have it so that the five could not declare it unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: I would.

Mr. NORRIS: Then the tyrant you speak of is the sixth man, is he not?

Mr. OKEY: No, sir; not at all: The reason for my position —

Mr. NORRIS: The opinion of the sixth judge outweighs the opinion of the other five, and he is in fact arbitrary.

Mr. OKEY: No; that is not true.

Mr. PECK: Behind that sixth judge, do you not have the general assembly and the governor and all the other officers?

Mr. OKEY: Yes; we have that law considered by a great number of men before it comes up to the court of last resort. I was going to say that my reason for insisting on unanimity is that I believe there has never been any man who has been able to explain why the court declares a law unconstitutional unless it has assumed power; and they all admit it. Justice Marshall admitted it himself, and I say, therefore, you have one department of government legislating — a judicial body nullifying the laws, having the same effect as if the legislature were to repeal the law. It is repealing a law that has been enacted by the legislature, whose sole function was to enact the law — a repeal of that law by another branch of the government.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it not true that no enactment of the legislature is law unless it is in accordance with the constitution under which that legislature is proceeding?

Mr. OKEY: That is true.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then it is not the law if it is in conflict with the constitution?

Mr. OKEY: It is the law until declared unconstitutional.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it not true that the judges are nullifying something which is not and cannot be the law if it is not in accordance with the constitution?

Mr. OKEY: It is a law until it is otherwise declared. Every law provides that an act of the legislature shall take effect at a certain time and if it has taken effect, the people act under it and it is a law whether it is in accordance with the constitution or not.

Mr. PECK: Does not the presumption of validity always accompany every law?

Mr. OKEY: Yes, the assumption of validity accompanies every law.

Mr. KNIGHT: I grant that, but if there be a conflict between a statutory law and the constitution is it not evident that somewhere in every constitutional government there must be a power lodged to reconcile that conflict or to declare the inferiority of the statute law?

Mr. OKEY: Yes, but we are not trying to take away that power under the proposal.

Mr. KNIGHT: But haven't you said "nullify the law."

Mr. OKEY: They do.

Mr. KNIGHT: No; they simply declare that certain so-called enactments are things which the legislative body had no right to enact to start with. Is not that true?

Mr. OKEY: No.

Mr. KNIGHT: Why not?

Mr. OKEY: You are assuming the law was nullified from the beginning.

Mr. ELSON: Is it not true that the men who make the laws are possibly as familiar with the constitution as the judges who sit in judgment on the law?

Mr. OKEY: They may be.

Mr. ELSON: Is it not true that this is the only country in the world in which the highest court can pronounce a law unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: That is right.

Mr. ELSON: And it did not originate with John Marshall and Alexander Hamilton, but in the colonial courts presided over by British judges?

Mr. OKEY: I did not know it went back that far.

Mr. DWYER: But the court is vested with the authority now to declare the law unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The practice in criminal cases is that a man is arraigned on a criminal charge and his innocence is presumed until he is proved guilty?

Mr. OKEY: That is the law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Then the presumption of innocence does not make him innocent any more than the presumption of the validity of the law makes it valid.

Mr. OKEY: No.

Mr. PECK: But the presumption must be beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. FACKLER: Would you give the court power in case of conflicting laws to decide which one should prevail?

Mr. OKEY: In case of conflicting laws — what do you mean by that?

Mr. FACKLER: Suppose there are several laws passed by the general assembly and one conflicts with another, what we call conflicting laws, or conflict of laws. Would you give the supreme court authority to decide which law applied in cases of conflict of law?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. FACKLER: Then you give that authority to the court in case of a conflict of laws, but you would not give it in case of a conflict between a law and a constitutional provision?

Mr. OKEY: I might not.

Mr. WATSON: Suppose that the supreme court of the United States had been held down by the unanimity rule, would we have had fastened on us the legality of the patent cases?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. OKEY: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: Does not the history of the acts, where they have been declared unconstitutional, prove beyond any doubt that if all of the judges had been required to agree before an act of congress or an act of the legislature should be declared unconstitutional that the whole country would have been away ahead of where we are now in progress? As a matter of fact has not progress been stopped along the lines of humanity and along the lines of individuals by reason of a divided court declaring acts of congress and of the legislature unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: I think that is right. You will notice, as I believe Mr. Thomas, the gentleman from Cuyahoga, showed me last night, that the supreme court of Ohio in the last seven years has declared fourteen statutes unconstitutional. And the sad part of the whole thing is that many of those decisions related to matters that primarily affect the people, and those laws might have been beneficial to the people had not the judiciary, growing with that power, encroached, as it has continued to encroach, on the right of the people. As Thomas Jefferson said, it moves like gravity, a little here today and a little there tomorrow, and it would go noiselessly and noiselessly as the tread of a thief at midnight until it was spread all over the fields of jurisdiction, and that is so with our courts at the present hour.

Now I believe in courts. I believe in the dignity of courts. I am not one of those who want to rail out against courts, but I only want courts so constituted that the high and the low can approach those tribunals on an equal footing, but I do not want them so constituted that the great common people can not approach them as the rich approach them. I want justice handed out from them in the same way and with the same degree of equality that it is handed out to corporations of this country, and I believe that this proposal that Judge Peck and this committee have considered and now present to this body will be the means, as Mr. Anderson has said, of bringing the supreme court down to the people's door, and then the people will have their rights adjudicated at home and in that way the rights of the people will be subserved better than they are now subserved.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose that some selfish interest — some powerful corporate influence — should secure the passage of a law which nullifies some important provision of the constitution. Would it not be much easier for the same influence to control one member of the supreme court than to control a majority and thus maintain the unconstitutional provision?

Mr. OKEY: Well, of course, you are putting an assumed case —

Mr. LAMPSON: I am putting the other side of the case.

Mr. OKEY: Yes, on the other side.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not this the fact, that every constitutional provision in every constitution — the federal constitution and every state constitution — is in favor of the people as drawn and put in, and have they not been made against the people by the interpretation of some court, some times a divided court?

Mr. OKEY: Yes, a judicial construction.

Mr. ANDERSON: And does not that answer the question of the delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON]?

Mr. HALFHILL: If I understand you correctly, you said this was the only country in the world where the supreme court had the right to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional. Did you make that statement?

Mr. OKEY: As I understand it, that is so.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not know that the British North American act, which permitted the creation of the federation of Canada as a constitutional branch of the English parliament — that the high court of Great Britain can and does declare unconstitutional any act of the Canadian parliament which conflicts with the British North American act?

Mr. OKEY: I did not know that. I am not disputing it; I simply do not know.

Mr. HALFHILL: I will say that is the fact. Now do you not know that from the very theory of the creation of written constitutions, in which this country undoubtedly excels, it is a necessary power to reside somewhere to declare laws unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: Personally I do not think so. Of course this proposal allows them to declare laws unconstitutional, but personally, I do not favor such a power. I do not think there is any written constitution in all the governments of the world where they have permitted courts to assume legislative powers.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then where would the restrictive powers of a constitution be, and what would be the prime purpose and function of a constitution as fundamental law if there were not powers somewhere in the government to declare unconstitutional statutes and legislative acts which transgress the constitution?

Mr. OKEY: The constitution is to prescribe the limitations upon legislative bodies.

Mr. HALFHILL: That being so, is it not true and does it not follow as a logical consequence that there must be some power in the government which can say when the legislature does transcend the constitution?

Mr. OKEY: No, sir; it amounts to this: The way we have it under our present system we have the legislature enacting a law, that is, the people enacting a law through their representatives, and after that law is enacted the people say "Here is our law." The supreme court comes along and says "That is not your law. It is not a law at all. You don't know what you are doing. Your chosen representatives can not enact such a law and they never did enact such a law. It was null and void from the beginning."

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not the fundamental law of the constitution the highest expression of the people's will?

Mr. OKEY: Undoubtedly it expresses the will of the people.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to ask if the gentleman will permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL]?

The PRESIDENT: Does the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] yield to a question from the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON]?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not true that practically every law before the passage of the so-called Norris law that was passed for the protection of the individual was nullified by the interpretation of our supreme court?

Mr. HALFHILL: It is not true.

Mr. ANDERSON: Name one.

Mr. HALFHILL: I can not name you one now, but I know your statement is not true.

Mr. ANDERSON: You are very radical.

Mr. HALFHILL: I know by the records of the supreme court that your statement is not true.

Mr. ANDERSON: I hate such statements as "not true."

Mr. HALFHILL: Oh, I merely used that word because you used it in your question.

Mr. ANDERSON: I will challenge you to produce one that I can not show has been nullified by the supreme court.

Mr. HALFHILL: I only used that word "not true" because you used it in your question, and my belief is that the supreme court of Ohio has decided those questions in accordance with the law, and if there were anything wrong with the law the legislature or the people should rectify it.

Mr. KNIGHT: If the governors have gotten through with their discussion I would like to ask the speaker a question, perhaps a series of questions, and the first is this: Does not the constitution of every state stand as the highest expression of the people of the state as to their government?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Did you not make the statement a moment ago that the people in framing that constitution put in it certain limitations upon the power of their own legislature?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Now if the legislature oversteps those limitations which the people have put there, what are you going to do about it according to your theory?

Mr. OKEY: Would you have a court that did not enact that law tell the people the legislature overstepped the boundary?

Mr. KNIGHT: Did not the people elect the court?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Did not they put them there for that purpose?

Mr. OKEY: Did the people elect the court as judicial officers or legislators?

Mr. KNIGHT: They elected them to decide when the administration of any other department oversteps the power given to that department.

Mr. OKEY: Did they not elect them to do a little interpreting once in a while themselves?

Mr. KNIGHT: That is what they are doing when they declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional—they have to declare that the legislature oversteps a constitutional limit.

Mr. ELSON: I want to ask a question of the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT].

Mr. KNIGHT: The member from Franklin is himself only questioning. He has not the floor.

Now I want to ask the speaker a question, if I may, and it is this: Ought you not, to be perfectly consistent, to require that the legislature in enacting a statute should enact it by a unanimous vote?

Mr. OKEY: No, sir.

Mr. KNIGHT: It often happens; does it not, that a minority, amounting almost to a majority of the legislature, vote against a proposed measure because in the judgment of that minority it is unconstitutional?

Mr. OKEY: It sometimes happens.

Mr. KNIGHT: The record of congress shows that over and over again. Therefore, you have a divided legislature on questions of constitutionality to start with.

Mr. OKEY: That is true.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then is it proper to say that you have the whole legislature behind you affirming the constitutionality of a measure when it may have been passed by a mere majority?

Mr. OKEY: No, sir; and nobody is claiming that.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not a fact that the province of a court is to apply the law to adjudicated cases?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not a fact that the constitution is applied to the general assembly in the enactment of law? Is not that for their guidance rather than for a court overturning what a legislature may do?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. NYE: If this Constitutional Convention proposes a constitution to be submitted to the people and the constitution submitted to the people is adopted by the people, is it not of more force than a legislative act?

Mr. OKEY: Oh, yes; it is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. NYE: Is there any qualification for a member of the legislature as to his legal ability or any other ability?

Mr. OKEY: None that I know of.

Mr. NYE: Then would you not say that a law passed by the legislature was inferior to a constitutional provision adopted by a constitutional convention and passed upon by the people?

Mr. OKEY: I think so.

Mr. NYE: What tribunal is to determine those questions if it is not the supreme court?

Mr. PECK: Will you let me ask you a question, Judge Nye?

Mr. NYE: Yes.

Mr. PECK: I think this whole discussion is academic. This bill does not provide for anything of the kind suggested. It provides a mode of passing on constitutional questions and does not forbid the court from passing upon them. But to come to your question, To whom shall the question be left? Suppose your supreme court decides wrong? "Quis custodiet ipsas custodes?" Who will guard the guardians? Who will take care of the supreme court?

Mr. NYE: If the supreme court elected by the people for their supposed ability and legal learning—

Mr. KING: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] will state his point of order.

Mr. KING: The gentleman from Noble [Mr. OKEY] has the floor, and this discussion between two members not on the floor is out of order.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is sustained.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. PECK: I think this whole discussion is off of the proposal under consideration.

Mr. THOMAS: Will the gentleman from Noble [Mr. OKEY] yield for me to ask a question of Judge Nye?

The PRESIDENT: Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OKEY: One more time.

Mr. THOMAS: I want to ask—

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: What is your point?

Mr. DOTY: The president just ruled on a point that this same thing was out of order, that the member from Noble [Mr. OKEY] has the floor.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is not well taken. The president did not so rule.

Mr. DOTY: You ought to have so ruled then.

Mr. THOMAS: I want to ask Judge Nye a question.

Mr. FESS: I would like to ask the speaker as to a matter before the Convention. It seems to me that none of these questions that have been asked are in order. All the questions seem to be that the supreme court has no right to pass upon the constitutionality of a law. Is that question before the Convention?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes.

Mr. FESS: I didn't ask you, but the speaker.

Mr. OKEY: It was not before the Convention until Mr. Thomas offered an amendment to that effect.

Mr. THOMAS: The last amendment was an amendment offered by me of that character and that is the subject before the house.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Cuyahoga has been recognized to ask a question.

Mr. THOMAS: I want to ask a question of Judge Nye.

Mr. DOTY: I ask a ruling on the point of order as to whether this cross controversy is to be allowed or are we to have a regular debate by the man at the desk? I think we are a little off of the subject under discussion.

Mr. OKEY: We are somewhat off of the subject, I admit.

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule that this is the way we have been doing and the speaker has yielded to the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] to ask a question of the member from Lorain [Mr. NYE] and the question is in order and the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] will put his question.

Mr. THOMAS: Is there any legal requirement now for the election of judges of the supreme court?

Mr. NYE: There is not, but it is in the power of the people to elect the judges if they choose and it has been the universal custom to elect judges upon the supreme court who are learned in the law, and it is up to the people of Ohio to elect men distinguished in their profession and that has been the practice in Ohio.

The PRESIDENT: Now the member from Noble [Mr. OKEY] will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS: Mr. Kramer, of Cleveland—

Mr. OKEY: Gentlemen, I want to close. There has been a good deal of outside discussion.

Mr. ROCKEL: Will the gentleman yield to let me ask him one question?

Mr. OKEY: No, no more. I just want to say in conclusion that the courts of this country have gone entirely too far in declaring laws and statutes of the legislature null and void, and for that reason I want to see the matter guarded well, as is done in this proposal. If you will examine the decisions of the supreme court you will find that very frequently courts have nullified laws for the alleged reason that the laws were in conflict with some provision of the constitution, but that was not the real reason that caused them to declare for the unconstitutionality. The real reason was that they didn't like the policy of the law and were not bold enough to come out and say they didn't like the policy of the law and they found an easier way by simply saying it conflicts with certain provisions of the constitution. That thing has gone entirely too far, and it has given far too much power to the court to nullify an act of the legislature, and therefore I hope the proposal of the eminent jurist from Cincinnati, Judge Peck, will be adopted with such amendments as will be necessary to make it suit a majority of the delegates to this Convention.

Mr. DOTY: I move that discussion during the remainder of the time be limited to ten minutes on each substitute and five minutes on each amendment.

The motion was carried.

The chair recognized the gentleman from Erie.

Mr. KING: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: This proposal has been so ably discussed that at one period in the discussion I thought I would best serve my position here by remaining quiet, for I am in accord with most of the provisions of the proposal, but I was not able in committee nor am I now able to agree that it shall require a unanimous decision of all the judges of the supreme court of Ohio to declare that an act of the general assembly is in conflict with a provision of the state constitution, nor am I able to agree with the proposition that a case appealed from the trial to a reviewing court must receive the assent of all the judges of the reviewing court in order to reverse or modify the judgment of the trial court. Still these objections of mine would not have been deemed by me important enough to break silence in this discussion had it not been for some of the notions expressed, which are peculiar to this day and age and based, I believe, on woefully false premises, and I believe I shall not have performed the duty which devolves upon me as a delegate if I do not express my emphatic protest against these arguments. More particularly I refer to the speech of the gentleman from Cincinnati that in his judgment the judicial authority of the state or nation had no power to decide that an act of the legislature was in violation of the supreme law of the land. That statement has been made repeatedly in this Convention by gentlemen who have been invited to express their views upon constitution making. Some of these gentlemen are very able; for instance, I recognize the ability as a scholar and lawyer of the distinguished mayor of the great city of Cleveland, and he gave forth the opinion that courts could not interfere to determine whether the constitution or a law of the general assembly should prevail where the two were in direct conflict. I can not understand the education or environment that produced that kind of state of mind in an educated lawyer. I do not believe that the history of this country for more than one hundred and ten years has all been at fault, and yet it is grievously at fault if the statements of these gentlemen are to be taken as sound argument. The gentleman from Hamilton county made the statement that courts had usurped the right to decide upon these questions. The most efficient argument that has ever been made upon this subject and the most efficient answer that can be made to the remarks of the gentleman from Hamilton county are found in a quotation which I shall make from the opinion of the greatest judge and chief justice of the supreme court of the United States when and where he asserted the existence of this power.

Change in Judicial System.

A gentleman has been nominated by the president of the United States and his appointment made by that president by and with the advice and consent of the senate to an office provided by law, which, under the provisions of the federal constitution, it was the duty of the president to fill. His commission had been prepared and signed and executed by the president, so that all steps had been taken to give the office except the delivery of the commission, when the secretary of state of the United States, an executive officer appointed by a president of the United States, refused to deliver the commission in question and suit was brought in the supreme court of the United States to compel the delivery of this commission. This is the preliminary statement of the great case of Marbury vs. Madison, decided in February, 1803, and reported in 1 Cranch, page 137. Chief Justice Marshall decided the case and he held that the questions to be decided were:

First, Has the applicant a right to the commission he demands?

Second, If he has a right and that right has been violated, do the laws of his country afford him a remedy?

Third, If they do afford him a remedy, is it a mandamus issuing from this court?

Having found the first two in favor of the plaintiff, he said that there remained the question of whether he was entitled to the remedy which he sought, and this he said depended upon, first, the nature of the writ applied for, and second, the power of the court. The court squarely decided that the case was one for mandamus, either to order the delivery of the commission or a copy of it from the records, and that there only remained to be decided whether it could issue from the supreme court; and having further discussed the question, they found that the act of congress establishing the judicial courts of the United States provided the power in such courts to issue writs of mandamus to public officers, but that the authority was not given by the constitution to the supreme court to issue such a writ, and the question arose whether the act of congress conferring jurisdiction upon the supreme court was sufficient to authorize the supreme court to issue such a writ notwithstanding that the provision of the constitution as to jurisdiction provided that "the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases affecting ambassadors or other public ministers and consuls and those in which a state shall be a party. In all other cases the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction." So that the question appeared in this way: The constitution had defined the original jurisdiction of the supreme court and had also gone further and said that in all other cases its jurisdiction should be appellate. The definition of its original jurisdiction excluded writs of mandamus and congress had undertaken to provide that all federal courts should have the right to issue writs of mandamus, and upon this Chief Justice Marshall gave forth his great decision, which has never been disputed or denied authoritatively, but has been followed by both federal and state courts since its utterance, in the following language:

The question, whether an act, repugnant to the constitution, can become the law of the land, is a question deeply interesting to the United States; but happily, not of an intricacy proportioned to its interest. It seems only necessary to recognize certain principles, supposed to have been long and well established, to decide it.

That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it, nor ought it, to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority from which they proceed is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designated to be permanent.

This original and supreme will organizes the government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here, or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

The government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the constitution is written. To what purpose are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may, at any time, be passed by those interested to be restrained? The distinction between a government with limited and unlimited powers is abolished, if those limits do not confine the persons on whom they are imposed, and if acts prohibited and acts allowed, are of equal obligation. It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or, that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary act.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. The constitution is either a superior paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means, or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and, like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it.

If the former part of the alternative is true, then a legislative act contrary to the constitution is not law; if the latter part be true, then written constitutions are absurd attempts, on the part of the people, to limit a power in its own nature illimitable.

Certainly all those who have framed written constitutions contemplate them as forming the fundamental and paramount law of the nation.

Change in Judicial System.

and, consequently, the theory of every such government must be, that an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void.

This theory is essentially attached to a written constitution, and, is consequently, to be considered, by this court, as one of the fundamental principles of our society. It is not therefore to be lost sight of in the further consideration of this subject.

If an act of the legislature, repugnant to the constitution, is void, does it, notwithstanding its invalidity, bind the courts, and oblige them to give it effect? Or, in other words, though it be not law, does it constitute a rule as operative as if it was a law? This would be to overthrow in fact what was established in theory; and would seem, at first view, an absurdity too gross to be insisted on. It shall, however, receive a more attentive consideration.

It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases, must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each.

So if a law be in opposition to the constitution; if both the law and the constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the constitution; or conformably to the constitution, disregarding the law; the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.

If, then, the courts are to regard the constitution, and the constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the legislature, the constitution, and not such ordinary act, must govern the case to which they both apply.

Those, then, who controvert the principle that the constitution is to be considered, in court, as a paramount law, are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the constitution, and see only the law.

This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act which, according to the principles and theory of our government, is entirely void, is yet, in practice, completely obligatory. It would declare that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden, such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be giving to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits, and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions, a written constitution, would of itself be sufficient, in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. But the peculiar expressions of the constitution of the United States furnish additional arguments in favor of its rejection.

The judicial power of the United States is extended to all cases arising under the constitution.

Could it be the intention of those who gave this power, to say that in using it the constitution should not be looked into? That a case arising under the constitution should be decided without examining the instrument under which it arises?

That is too extravagant to be maintained.

In some cases, then, the constitution must be looked into by the judges. And if they can open it at all, what part of it are they forbidden to read or to obey?

There are many other parts of the constitution which serve to illustrate this subject.

It is declared that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." Suppose a duty on the export of cotton, of tobacco, or of flour; and a suit instituted to recover it. Ought judgment to be rendered in such a case? Ought the judges to close their eyes on the constitution, and only see the law?

The constitution declares "that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

If, however, such a bill be passed, and a person should be prosecuted under it; must the court condemn to death those victims whom the constitution endeavors to preserve?

"No person," says the constitution, "shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

Here the language of the constitution is addressed especially to the courts. It prescribes, directly for them, a rule of evidence not to be departed from. If the legislature should change that rule, and declare one witness, or a confession out of court, sufficient for conviction, must the constitutional principle yield to the legislative act?

From these, and many other selections which might be made, it is apparent, that the framers of the constitution contemplated that instrument as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature.

Why otherwise does it direct the judges to take an oath to support it? This oath certainly applies in an especial manner, to their conduct in their official character. How immoral to impose it on them, if they were to be used as the instruments, and the knowing instruments, for violating what they swear to support!

The oath of office, too, imposed by the legislature, is completely demonstrative of the legislative opinion on this subject. It is in these words: "I do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons, and the equal right to the poor and to the rich; and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge all the duties incumbent on me as . . . according to the best of my abilities and understanding agreeably to the constitution and laws of the United States."

Why does a judge swear to discharge his duties agreeably to the constitution of the United States, if that constitution forms no rule for his government? If it is closed upon him, and cannot be inspected by him?

Change in Judicial System.

If such be the real state of things, this is worse than solemn mockery. To prescribe, or to take this oath, becomes equally a crime.

It is also not entirely unworthy of observation, that in declaring what shall be the supreme law of the land, the constitution itself is first mentioned; and not the laws of the United States generally, but those only which shall be made in pursuance of the constitution, have that rank.

Thus, the particular phraseology of the constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the constitution is void; and that courts, as well as other departments, are bound by that instrument.

The rule must be discharged.

It is not true that the foregoing decision was the first utterance of a court upon this subject, for the same doctrine was enunciated in Van Horn vs. Dorance, 2 Dallas 304, in 1795, and Chief Justice Marshall mentions in his opinion in the foregoing case, page 171, that the circuit courts had held an act of congress unconstitutional in 1792, and it is laid down in every work on constitutional law to which I have had access, without question or limitation, that the right and duty of the judiciary to take jurisdiction and decide cases when constitutional questions are presented, are both imperative and inseparable. I presume a thousand cases can be cited in the different courts of the United States and of the various states of this Union unqualifiedly supporting that doctrine, and I make the assertion that no well-considered case can be found to the contrary. I therefore deny that it was a usurpation. It arose from the very nature of litigation, as the sacredness of the legislative power is not greater than that of the executive. The three departments of the government are in some respects independent of each other and in other respects interdependent, but if the governor of a state shall violate a plain constitutional provision shall not the court be called upon to decide the question where one's rights have been impaired in an unconstitutional manner, determine whether the act of the governor was constitutional or not? For instance, by section 2 of article III the governor is authorized to grant a pardon for all crimes and offenses except treason and cases of impeachment. Suppose that in a case of impeachment he grants a pardon and that act is called in question and it reaches a court for determination as to the validity of the pardon. Must the court dodge and refuse to decide because it involves a decision by the judiciary upon an act of the executive? But it is more a limitation of legislative power than it is of executive power. The provisions in relation to executive power are affirmative mainly; in other words, the powers of the governor are defined, but all through the constitution is written the limitation upon legislative power. Take the bill of rights; nearly all of its twenty sections are in some respect limitations upon legislative power. All kinds of cases might be imagined and cited as instances wherein the question would arise as to the conflict between a law and the constitution.

Suppose that the general assembly should provide that a certain offense, perchance not greater than a misdemeanor, should not be bailable when the constitution provides that all offenses shall be bailable except capital offenses in certain cases. A man is arrested for the commission of the particular offense defined in the statute and demands that he be given an opportunity to secure bail, tenders sufficient surety, and objection is made that the act of the general assembly prohibits bail; the accused makes up the formal parts of his case and brings an action in mandamus to compel the proper authority to accept his bail. Here is a very fundamental right which belongs to every citizen — whether he can be indefinitely confined in a prison before he is tried without an opportunity to give bail. This is the very fundamental principle of a despotism, or they shall provide for imprisonment for failure to pay a civil debt in plain violation of a section of the bill of rights, or, being unjustly imprisoned, one applies for a writ of habeas corpus which has been refused by an act of the general assembly. These are strong cases, but they only illustrate by their strength the proposition that these questions must necessarily arise in courts, where there is put the question whether the provision of the constitution or the provision of the state law shall prevail when the two are in direct conflict. It is, therefore, as true now as it was in the beginning of constitutional government in the United States that the determination of that is vested somewhere and that it is vested in the courts, because the courts are provided for the determination of private rights as well as the enforcement of public duties. A court would be no longer a court that would refuse to determine that question when properly presented before it, and I am astounded that any citizen of the United States, and doubly so that any lawyer presumed by the nature of his profession to have an education upon the principles of law, should assert that the legislative power and authority created by this constitution is higher than the constitution which created it, and that it can, in violation of the terms of the very charter which produced it, ignore it and violate it with impunity and there be no method by which an individual thereby injured orderly and in due course of law can have his remedy in the courts which that constitution provides "shall be open and that every person for an injury done him in his land, goods, person or reputation, shall have a remedy by due course of law." This being so, what legal or constitutional reason exists here when a court is created composed of more than two judges that their opinion on such a question shall be unanimous when not required to be unanimous on any other question? What is the ground of the distinction? No person discussing this question in this Convention has yet seen fit to tell us why this distinction should now for the first time be engrafted in the fundamental law of our state. It is not even argument, but a mere statement of a fundamental legal principle, that all acts of public authority, whether executive or legislative, are presumed to be regular and constitutional. It is but another axiomatic statement to say that they should not be held to be unconstitutional unless clearly shown to be such, or, as some courts have expressed it, shown beyond a reasonable doubt, which simply means that the conflict shall appear plainly and distinctly, in which event no court should hesitate to declare the fact of the conflict, which is all that a decision of unconstitutionality means. So again when a case, involving any question of constitutional or other law is carried to an appellate court, consisting of three or more judges, for the review of the decision of a single judge in another forum, what reason exists for saying that the court, before it may even modify the judgment of the inferior of trial court, must be unanimous in its conclusion?

These arguments and these declarations which are proposed to be established in our amendment to the constitution are not based upon any legal reason in my judgment, and I shall not support them.

There is the direct grant of authority and no conflict as to the propositions, and that the conflict between the law and the constitution must be clear, must be plain, let me use the language of the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], as has been said in a number of well considered cases, it must be beyond reasonable doubt. All of those things mean practically the same thing, as very well suggested by a gentleman on the floor asking the question this morning. It is true that a man charged with an offense, from the stealing of a yellow dog up to the commission of murder, is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty and his guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and that presumption of innocence surrounds him until finally the jury has brought in its verdict. So that same presumption protects the law and surrounds the law as it progresses. After all the English language is not so hard to understand that an ordinary individual may not determine this conflict, unless the legal principle is so deeply involved that it is not readily seen. You have to trust somebody to determine whether that conflict exists. If it is the courts, then it is the opinion and judgment of one man at least that determines that. I do not mean if a court is composed of seven or eight men that one could render judgment, but it rests upon the opinion of each individual judge. It ought not be true at least that one judge with somewhere in his mind a lesion, I might call it, that does not enable him to logically pursue an argument, should control the court and prevent a proper decision, where the conflict is plain and beyond a reasonable doubt.

As to the appellate court, there is no use arguing how many judges decided it before. That is an absolutely independent tribunal. If it goes to your appellate court and your constitution prescribes that that appellate court shall consist of three judges, no reason in the world exists why that court shall not act as all courts have hitherto acted in this country, by a majority, nor that two out of the three, constituting a majority, should not be entitled to render any decision, I care not what.

I have made this argument based only upon the proposition found in one or the other of these proposals, more particularly the Taggart amendment, which I am in favor of. I am willing to concede that for the argument in favor of clearness or plainness I would permit or require a decision of the unconstitutionality of a statute should be by a five out of six or seven vote of the court. I would not let one man determine its constitutionality alone in a court consisting of six or seven men. I said before the committee, without undertaking to find fault with this provision, and I still think, that there ought to be a loophole to let out our one crank on the court whose mind might not work right, but if five men agree as to the unconstitutionality there is no reason in law or morals why that judgment should not go into effect as the judgment of the court.

Mr. BOWDLE: I would like to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT: The time of the gentleman was extended to finish his speech, and in view of the limit and that others desire to speak I do not think that would cover questions to be propounded to him.

Mr. KING: I have finished, but with this appeal, that this Convention shall not from a desire for mere novelty overturn established judicial principles that have always and everywhere been recognized.

The delegate from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] was recognized.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Before speaking the few words that I intend to say upon this subject I would ask indulgence of the Convention to obtain indefinite leave of absence for Judge Worthington, who is detained at home on account of illness.

The leave was granted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I shall say a few words to you on this subject from the view point of a layman. You have heard much from the lawyers and it might be interesting to you to know what the merchants think of the Peck proposal.

In the last month whenever I have gone home I have made it a point to ask the merchants what they think of the proposal, and I am glad to report that I do not find a single banker or business man who takes any exception to the fundamental proposition of Judge Peck's proposal, namely, that the circuit courts shall be made courts of appeal, courts of final jurisdiction.

There has been considerable difference of opinion as to the advisability of compelling a unanimous decision of the court of appeals in overruling a decision of the lower court, and there was also considerable opposition to the demand that the supreme court of the state shall be unanimous to declare unconstitutional a law passed by the legislature.

With the first proposition I am in hearty accord, and I believe it will be the experience of this Convention that business men—the average man on the street—will accept the fundamental principle of Judge Peck's proposal, because it will expedite justice and it will lessen the cost of securing justice.

With the second proposition, and I am now addressing only the laymen of the Convention and I can speak only in lay terms to them, I disagree entirely.

We are supreme within the walls of this Convention, but, gentlemen, the moment we step beyond these walls we cease to be supreme. We are dependent on the point of view that the people outside of the walls of this Convention take, and I believe it is a safe proposition to say that the people outside of the walls of this Convention will be exceedingly slow to accept such a fundamental and radical change in the administration of the civil law as requiring a full court to overrule a lower court. Is not that contrary to our theory of higher courts? It may be a violent presumption, but nevertheless it is a presumption, that the higher court represents a higher degree of intelligence than the lower court. Therefore, when you say that you demand a unanimous decision of the circuit court to overrule one of the judges of the common pleas court—because if you do not do so, it leaves two judges on the circuit court disagreeing with one of the circuit court judges and one of the common pleas judges—it seems to me the scales are not evenly balanced, because those two judges of the circuit court are supposed to have more learning proportionally than the judge of the common pleas court plus the one judge of the circuit court, just as the judges of the supreme court are supposedly picked out by reason of their superior knowledge and training in the law.

Now it is a serious matter to us laymen when you make us think that somehow or another you are depriving us of our civil rights under the law. A lawyer, with his trained legal mind, of course may quickly determine that there is no material hardship, that the scales are finally equally balanced, but you have not to do with the lawyers, you have to do with the average man in the street and the average man on the farm, and the moment he begins to think that the lawyers have proposed something which takes away some of his rights (and one of his rights is that it shall only require a majority of the upper court to determine the justice or injustice of his cause), you are arousing suspicion and distrust. I concede that the average business man will be governed by the advice of his lawyer, but it is the vast mass of people who will not come in contact with their lawyers who, in my judgment, will question the wisdom of this proposition.

In reference to requiring a unanimous supreme court to override a statute, I must think that is fraught with great danger. We are all here agreed that no special interest would attempt to get anything through a constitutional convention if for no other reason than that the work of the convention must be submitted to the people as a whole, and the people are Argus-eyed when they have an opportunity to use their eyes. Therefore you will never find special legislation secured through a constitutional convention any more than you will ever find special legislation secured through the initiative and referendum. Where will special legislation be secured? You do not dream for a moment that any action of this Convention will change human nature. You do not suppose for one moment that the special interests will become virtuous merely by laws or proposed fundamental laws suggested by this Convention. The fight will go on between the special interests and the public interests hundreds of years after the youngest member of this Convention has been buried and has been forgotten. Where can the special interests secure their advantage? The question answers itself. In the legislature. There you may expect to find special legislation. There you will find it. Now this provision requiring a unanimous supreme court to override a legislative statute gives "special interests" all the advantage, and it has been so clearly explained by other speakers who have preceded me that it is not necessary for me further to detail it. One judge out of the seven, I will not say corrupt, but with a "lesion in his brain" as Judge King calls it, can declare some special act constitutional by refusing to agree with the other six judges. That I consider an element of great danger. I cannot see why you want to give such sanctity to a legislative act when the whole theory of what you have done in the last few weeks is against trusting the legislature. If you trust the legislature you do not need the initiative and referendum. The whole theory of the initiative and referendum is based on mistrust of the legislature. Now to show you how strongly that is the opinion of some of our greatest authorities on the subject I am going to read you a few lines from Dr. Borgeaud's remarkable work "Formation and Amendments of Constitutions," edited by Professor Vincent, of Johns-Hopkins University. Ordinarily you would not find a professor of law in Johns-Hopkins University charged with ultra radicalism, but listen to what Professor Vincent said in 1896 in editing this book:

Dr. Borgeaud might have pointed to the state constitutions of the American Union as eminent examples of the mixture of statute fundamental law. The reasons for this will not be found in European influences, but in the gradual resumption by the people of powers formerly delegated to the legislative or executive branches of the governments. The people have become afraid of their legislatures. The full representative functions, which in earlier times were granted to the delegate, have been little by little withdrawn. Legislatures no longer elect the executive and judicial officers, but are even restricted in legislative duties, for many states fix in the constitutions the earliest possible date for adjournment.

To counteract the mistakes of the lawmakers the governor has been given the power to arrest temporarily the progress of legislation by means of the veto, and the people obtain indirectly an opportunity to express their opinion.

In the original proposition requiring a unanimous court to override or overrule statutory law you ride right in the teeth of Professor Vincent's wise observations.

The time of the delegate here expired and on motion of Mr. Halfhill was extended.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: You ride right in the teeth of this declaration, and, as I have said before, right in the teeth of that principle which you adopted here two weeks ago by a vote of 97 to 21, or something like that, in which you declared for the principles of the initiative and referendum, which are based mainly on distrust of the legislature. In my judgment the benefit of the doubt in every instance should be given to the courts that construe an act of the legislature. I recognize the fact, however, that if we want to succeed outside of the walls of this state house when we go to the people we must take into consideration the mental attitude of those people, and, rightfully or wrongfully, I am not able to determine which, the people generally have a prejudice against "four to three" decisions that affect their political rights. It does not seem to affect them when only their civil or personal rights are concerned, but the conviction seems to be firmly fixed in their minds that a greater number of the supreme court should unite in a decision overturning statutory law than in a decision affecting purely personal rights, and in deference to that feeling I accept the amendment of Judge Taggart requiring five members of the supreme court out of seven to unite in declaring a statute unconstitutional, and I call the attention of the lay members of the Convention to the fact that if you vote away your sacred rights by demanding a unanimous decision of the supreme court to overturn a statutory law, you may be chaining yourselves and your posterity to something you do not dream of now. It is not difficult to foresee that in the not far distant future some particular sect may be dominant in the legislature and may secure the enactment of a statute which deprives all other sects of certain rights or burdens them, and yet by this original proposal you would make it impossible, unless you were strong enough to get a constitutional amendment by means of the initiative and referendum, to shake off those fetters. That point of view has not been carefully considered and you ought to consider it. You ought to know whether or not you are possibly forging chains for yourselves and your children.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. BOWDLE: I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: State the point.

Mr. DOTY: The gentleman's time was extended for him to conclude his remarks.

The PRESIDENT: As the time has been fixed to vote upon this matter and as the gentleman's time was extended to conclude his remarks the point is well taken.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: In view of the short time left for further discussion and in recognition of the rights of others I shall finish my remarks now. I thank you.

Mr. EARNHART: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: May I presume to speak for the farmers of the state of Ohio? It is well that lawyers shall take the lead in this matter because they are better able to determine rights, but at the same time I believe that the farmers of the country, being amenable to the laws, should have some opportunity at least to give consideration to what they believe is right in the matter.

In the first place permit me to say I believe there should be a greater affinity between all classes. Now I have no objections to the lawyers whatever. I am glad to know that the difference is fast passing away between persons of different vocations. I believe that cases should be determined upon right and justice and not so much upon the ability of counsel to take advantage of and enforce technicalities of a complex law. That being the case, laws should be made more plain by the legislature and more simple, so that the courts would not differ so much in their interpretation of them. Most cases should be settled in the common pleas court. If judges are incompetent to determine the rights of the people we should elect better judges. That in my opinion would diminish litigation, because it would eliminate technicalities and would engender a greater respect for the court. It is a lamentable fact that the most of the people do not hold the court in as high esteem as they should because there have been cases where individuals have not secured their rights. The whole trouble is with the great corporations. Individuals are intimidated by the corporations sometimes and will not sue for damages. It is a well known fact that farmers having animals killed on the railroad often conclude that they had best not enter suit at all because of the delay and of the many questions that corporations every now and then are able to interpose and the corporation will wear them out before they can ever get a judgment. That is altogether wrong. The citizen should have his rights inviolate. I believe the courts should have more respect for legislative enactment. That is, I am in full accord with the Peck proposal that no legislative enactment should be declared unconstitutional by less than the unanimous consent of all the judges. The argument may be produced in the case of an individual who has carried a case up to the highest court that one judge may be corrupt and now and then the individual not get his rights, but taking the whole matter and all the cases the argument certainly holds good, and a unanimous decision should be had at all times. I am in full accord with the Peck proposal to allow the court of appeals to settle matters finally and not go on to the supreme court. I believe it will simplify matters and it will insure justice, and, as the venerable judge said, if a man cannot get justice in the appellate court he never will get it anywhere.

I have no objection to the supreme court deciding upon the constitutionality of acts of the legislature; that is their province, and I do not think anybody here has even by inference attempted to show that they should never do that, but I want them to go slowly and carefully so that justice may prevail between individuals at variance in the courts. I think we can safely depart from the old rule because of new conditions that have taken place in the last few years.

Therefore, I want to say in conclusion, and I intend to be brief on everything, that it is my firm conviction that this is a long step in the right direction, and I ask every farmer in the Convention to take the matter seriously and see if he cannot reconcile his views with those that I have expressed in the matter.

Mr. DOTY: A matter of business. If we recess until one o'clock there is only one hour left for consideration. There are four or five members yet to speak and there is no desire to crowd anybody out, and I move that the time for voting upon this proposal and pending amendments shall begin at half-past three instead of two o'clock.

The motion was carried.

Mr. ANDERSON: I suggest that we commence to vote on the amendments at two o'clock and pass on those. Of course nobody is trying to take advantage of anybody else in this matter. There is not very much disagreement. For instance, Judge King is in favor of the Taggart amendment. So am I. I believe that the whole thing can be worked out in a friendly way to the satisfaction of everyone so that there won't be ten votes registered against it, and that is an end to be desired, but it cannot be done under parliamentary usages as it is now.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning wants the time to be two o'clock to begin voting on the amendments and three o'clock on the proposal.

Mr. ANDERSON: And that half an hour be given for the discussion of each amendment offered after that.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] and I are trying to arrive at the same results. I think if you will let the discussion go on and let those who desire to talk, speak until three-thirty that we can then handle the matter.

Mr. ANDERSON: I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DOTY: It is merely a matter of getting some place where we will start on the finish. I think three-thirty will accommodate everybody.

Change in Judicial System.

The motion of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] was carried.

The member from Auglaize was recognized by the president and yielded to a motion by Mr. Doty.

Mr. Doty moved to recess until one o'clock.

The motion was carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the president.

On motion of Mr. Knight a recess was taken until 1:15 o'clock p. m., at which time the Convention again met and was called to order by the president.

Mr. HOSKINS: I demand a call of the house.

The PRESIDENT: A call of the house has been demanded and the secretary will call the roll and the sergeant-at-arms will close the door.

The roll was called; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Antrim,	Hahn,	Norris,
Brown, Lucas,	Halfhill,	Partington,
Cassidy,	Henderson,	Peck,
Cody,	Jones,	Price,
Crites,	Keller,	Rorick,
Doty,	King,	Stewart,
Eby,	Kramer,	Wagner,
Evans,	Kunkel,	Walker,
Fackler,	Leslie,	Weybrecht,
Fluke,	Marriott,	Worthington.
Fox,	Mauck,

The president announced that eighty-seven members had answered to their names.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HOSKINS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: What I want to say upon this proposition I can say in a very few minutes and it is just upon one or two phases of the proposition.

Before talking upon the questions that have already been discussed I want to state that at the proper time; on my own initiative and at the suggestion of several other members, I am going to offer an amendment to strike out of section 1 the words "justices of peace." While that probably is not an important matter in connection with general principles involved in the proposition, I would like to explain to the members of the Convention—I presume all will understand it, but it will bear repetition, at least—that the office of justice of peace has been since 1852 a constitutional office. There is a general demand for the abolition of this office over the state. I think it is fair to assume that in many counties the office of justice of peace, as it now exists, is considered more or less of a nuisance. By offering this amendment and striking it out of the constitution, it would not have the effect thereby of instantly dispensing with the office in the state. The office would remain, but it would be taken out of the constitution, so that future legislatures may hold or create an inferior court or keep the present system if they so desire, but they would not be compelled to keep it because it is a constitutional office. The office itself, or a court of that description, can be created by the legislature under the provisions of section 2, that provide for the creation of inferior courts. A great many persons practicing law believe instead of having this system of justices over the state divided, two or three to a township, and many of those elected being persons not well qualified to administer the provisions of the office, that the jurisdiction should be given to some other court either to the probate court in the country counties or by the creation of a county judge, or something of that sort. I have no proposition along that line, but I desire to take this out of the constitution and let the legislature create an inferior court of that kind in which this jurisdiction may lodge. In more than half the counties in the state this jurisdiction could be lodged in the probate court and in more than half the country counties that would be the proper place to lodge this jurisdiction.

Now upon the main proposition, I think this is the most important proposition that this Convention has probably had before it. Some have assumed that I am opposed to the proposal. I am not opposed to it, but there are some changes in the original proposition that I feel ought to be made in the interest of making this constitutional provision a workable provision. I want, however, in the face of all this denunciation, more or less severe of the processes of the court to say this: That many of the evils complained of in the administration of justice, and particularly in personal injury suits, have been and are gradually being cured by the law. We all know that the law of assumed risk and of contributory negligence and the rules of evidence relating to them have been changed so that the old arbitrary rules of the courts defeating actions for personal injury upon the ground of contributory negligence no longer prevail. The question of damages, etc., is a matter for the jury. Just that much in passing.

Now one other proposition on the question of the delay. Much complaint has been made about the delays, but that has been cured by the statutes in the last three years by which all of these personal injury cases in the supreme court are, upon motion, advanced for hearing and they don't await their regular call or turn upon the docket as they did in former years. So that to a very great extent that will cure the complaint about the long delays of the court.

I do not believe, gentlemen of the Convention, that we ought to dispose of this proposition from the standpoint of the personal injury cases alone, or from the standpoint of delays that may have occurred in personal injury cases. In most counties of the state personal injury suits are the very smallest percentage. We do not have two of them per year in the county from which I come. The great mass of litigation is between individuals, although once in a great while someone is injured upon a railroad passing through a county or some one is injured in a manufacturing establishment, and we have a personal injury suit, but that is an exception and not the rule. I do not think we ought to approach this proposition and judge it from a standpoint that may have heretofore prevailed in the personal injury suits and which difficulties I think have already been very largely removed.

The question for consideration here is, what should be the jurisdiction of this appellate court? I feel that we must preserve to litigants the present powers of what we call the circuit court in this appellate court, and I mean by that we must preserve the right of trial in an equity suit de novo in that court of appeals.

What is the situation? I bring an action to set aside a conveyance of real estate on the ground of fraud, or for some other reason that invokes the jurisdiction of an equity judge. That case is tried by the common pleas judge. We have no right to have a jury pass on it. Only one man passes on it, the common pleas judge. He passes upon the fact and he makes his decision and it may be unsatisfactory to one or the other party. Most surely it will be unsatisfactory to one side. The person aggrieved by the decision of the common pleas judge has a right to appeal to the circuit court by which he can have that case tried upon its merits in the circuit court, and that is a right we exercise in all the country circuits. It was exercised during all the years that Judge Norris was judge. The aggrieved party exercises his right to appeal to the circuit court and there is a trial of that equity case de novo in that court, but here that right is taken away. Now we want the right to bring witnesses into that court upon the hearing of an equity case and have that heard as an original proposition in that court, and we want that trial not upon the cold transcript, not by that court as a reviewing court, but as a trial court, to decide the merits of that case from hearing the witnesses if the litigant so desires.

It is a well known fact, and I think one that will not be disputed by any one, that no man, be he judge or juror, can be a competent judge of facts unless he comes in contact with the witnesses, unless he observes their demeanor and is able to judge of their character from the statements they make. Some witnesses might be able to make a smooth statement that would read well in print, and yet if you heard the story from their lips you would not believe it for a minute, and we have a right, owing to the fact that we can not have a jury pass upon the fact in our common pleas court in equity cases, to insist on the right to have a trial de novo in the court of appeals.

I favor the provisions of Judge Taggart's proposition, and I favor the provision that says the court shall have such other jurisdiction as may be conferred by law. There is not a single thing in the Peck proposal, I believe, that could not be enacted into law now by the legislature. It is a mistake for this Convention to believe or to assume all future legislatures are going to be controlled by improper motives. We have no right to assume that. If we must assume such a proposition as that, our representative government is a failure. We ought not to presume it and we ought not to tie up the jurisdiction of our courts and fix the jurisdiction by any hard and fast rule.

I have no objection to the final jurisdiction of this appellate court in the ordinary cases if you will open the door wide enough, as provided in the Peck proposal, that exceptional cases may be taken care of and if these cases and some others I would like to suggest are incorporated in it I will agree to it.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The PRESIDENT: We have not been allowing questions under this limited debate.

Mr. FESS: I want to echo what the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] has said, that this is one of the most important questions that has come up before us for consideration.

I believe that this Convention will do nothing that will bring a warmer support to the work that it is doing for the general public than the reform of the judiciary. I notice when I have been in conversation with different people there seems to be a universal demand that something be done that will expedite a final ending of disputes in the courts and it has been suggested if that could be done it will meet with almost universal favor. I deplore that someone has read into this proposal an attack upon the judiciary. It certainly is not such. It certainly does not reflect upon the personnel of the courts. This proposal, as I read it, is simply to cure a bad system, to eliminate the faults that have made it impossible under our practice today for a litigant to see the end of a lawsuit, whether in two or twenty years. There is not anything today so certain as the uncertainty of the time of the ending of a suit and the expense of it. This proposal is not an attack upon the principle of the adjudication of cases, but simply to remedy the faults of our present system so we can see the end of a dispute or of a lawsuit. I would be the last man in this Convention to deny the right of the judicial department to sit upon the constitutionality of a legislative enactment, and if it finds that the enactment is not in keeping with the constitution to pronounce it unconstitutional.

I wonder whether you have noted that the one distinction between our own government and the governments of all the remainder of the world lies in the position we give the judiciary. It is not in the fact that our government has three departments and other governments have not, because all governments have three departments. All governments, whether they be monarchies, despotisms or limited monarchies, or whether they be republican or pure democratic—all governments recognize the three functions, intelligence to make the laws, good will to interpret the laws and power to enforce the laws. And in that respect we are not different from Turkey; we are not different from England. But wherein we differ from all the governments of the world is that we recognize the three departments as interdependent and yet in a degree independent. That is the difference between our government and any government in the world up to the time ours began. And we do not want to destroy that. We want to hold to that unique feature, and when a statute comes from the legislative department and there is a question of doubt as to its constitutionality in the opinion of someone suffering from its operation, that man should be permitted to take it to the court for final decision, and that court ought to be absolutely independent, sitting upon the case, to speak as to its constitutionality. The only point of difference is, should that decision be unanimous or may it be by a divided court?

So far as I am concerned I will vote for this proposal that it shall be unanimous rather than see the proposal defeated. I would much prefer a decision of five to one if I could have my own way about it.

It is not quite right to say it is one department setting aside another, because every law that comes from the legislative department is by a divided vote. It is not unanimous. And so when it goes to the supreme court it may be divided up there. It would be a divided court passing upon the legality of a law that has been passed by a divided legislature, and it is not one department divided overcoming another department united.

Change in Judicial System.

I will vote for the Peck proposal requiring a unanimous concurrence rather than see it defeated, but if we keep the court as it is now I would rather have it five to one.

Now, in regard to the purpose of this proposal, I know you will all admit that we need something to prevent delays. There is nothing so abominable in our system as to allow a case to be drawn out until there is absolutely no end to it. That means that the poor man who has a case has no chance to fight it to the ultimate limit. He will simply be impoverished by a system that admits of delay made possible by appeals and writs of error and various motions of all sorts until he can see no chance of ending the thing. What we want today is to give to the least prominent individual citizen in our state just as much right to adjust his differences with another as it gives to the richest man or to the corporation, and you can not reach that until you make it possible for him not to be impoverished by continuances of his case that keep him in court until he is worn out by sheer force of not having enough money to keep on. Why can't the legal fraternity see that if you make it impossible for unlimited delays in cases that the lawsuits would be multiplied, for men then will not be afraid to go into court? As it is now men are afraid to go into court because they can not see the end of the litigation. What we want is to make even the common pleas courts' decisions final in some things. I do not feel that my friend from Auglaize has raised a question that is serious. If I had my way there would be a certain class of cases that never would go beyond the common pleas court. That court should be final in some litigation, and when we come to the court of appeals we must make its decision final in many cases. We don't want to abolish the circuit court, for that would make every man who has a case to be heard in the higher court come to Columbus, under heavy expense, to sit and hear all sorts of motions for delays and never know when his case can be heard. That would be unfair to him as much as the other. We want to supersede the system of circuit courts by a system of appellate courts which will have final jurisdiction, and which will sit not in Columbus, but at the door of the litigant, so that he can see the finality of his lawsuit right near his home. I have been told if this proposal passes at least forty per cent of the cases that now reach the supreme court will stop in the circuit court, and some say more than forty per cent.

What objection is there to such a plan, making the circuit court or its substitute, the court of appeals, final in certain matters? Some people say it will reduce the supreme court, it will leave them nothing to do and that court will be reduced in dignity and service. It certainly will not do either. The supreme court has an open door in this proposal and one that I was afraid of, until certain members assured me that there is no danger. That door is by writ of certiorari, by which the supreme court can order the record sent up from the court of appeals on certain cases for the review of the cases in the supreme court. I am sure there is a door that will open up to the supreme court much work.

Now I am a little afraid of the provision in Judge Taggart's plan, where it says "And such other appellate jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law." Gentlemen of the Convention, that is the proposition that in general terms I would support, but what we are trying to do in this Convention and in this proposal is to make that one thing impossible, viz., to increase unlimitedly appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court. What is the limit under this wording, and what will prevent the lawyers in the legislature from providing a law to send up all sorts of cases? My only plea is that we shall make it possible to stop cases near home; that we shall have final jurisdiction near home, instead of having to go to the supreme court except in cases involving constitutional law, cases arising under the constitution and the other cases defined as felony.

I would hesitate a long time to vote upon the proposition that gives to the supreme court jurisdiction of questions involving the interpretation of statutes. How many cases would not, and how many lawyers here could not convince the lower court that the case did involve the construction of a statute? If we are here to make it possible that a litigant without money can have a final hearing without having to go to the expense of trials without limit in the supreme court, why should we question the feasibility of giving this court of appeals or appellate court final jurisdiction? It seems to me that here is the most important measure that we shall have before us. I now recapitulate because my time is up.

I want to say in the first place, in my judgment, here is the most popular measure that the Convention will give to the people of Ohio.

Secondly, it is not an attack upon the judiciary. If it were I would vote against it, for I recognize the necessity of lodging that power in somebody. It is not an attack upon the personnel of the courts. It is simply trying to cure the faults of a bad system that are not corrected under our present system; and if we want to retain the respect of our judiciary which we must maintain if we hope to ever have the dignity in the law respected; if we want to maintain that respect, we must remove these faults and make it possible for the court to adjudicate cases without so much unnecessary expense. This proposal is not in the interest of a particular class. It is wrong to hold out that it is in the interest of any class or against the interest of attorneys. I respect the opinion of attorneys here in the Convention, because they have studied the technicalities of the law, but hear me, gentlemen of the Convention, it is the undue importance that is placed upon the technicalities of the law, rather than going to the merits of the case, that has brought us into disrepute. Is it not possible to make laws so free of technicalities that more importance and value may be placed upon the merits of a case? Then if that can be done I am sure this proposal will not hurt any lawyer, and it will not make it impossible for a litigant to have a case adjudicated fairly and with expedition.

I hope this proposal, with a few minor changes Judge Peck will offer, that have already been suggested and that do not especially go to the merits, will pass this Convention by almost a unanimous vote. It will mean so much when it comes to the people that we are trying to place before them a measure that they should and will approve. Gentlemen, let us make every man equal under the law, and make it absolutely impossible that the poor man shall be under any disadvantage when he is trying to redress his grievances against a man of great power; and if we do that you will have the approval of the citizenship when we go to the people this fall.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have received a telegram that I believe by reason of the standing of the gentleman who has sent it ought to be made part of the record. The gentleman is an ex-judge of Cincinnati. The telegram reads:

Cincinnati, Ohio, April 9, 1912.

D. F. Anderson, Esq.,

Constitutional Convention, Columbus Ohio.

I congratulate you upon your demand for justice to the poor man. Although the lawyers favor making it easy for courts of error to reverse, the people are against it. Except in extreme cases the legislative enactments should stand and the verdicts of juries should stand. Keep up the good fight.

WM. LITTLEFORD.

The delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] was here recognized.

Mr. THOMAS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: Coming from that class of citizenship of Ohio, the working class, which has suffered chiefly from the delay of the courts, from among the poor people who have been mentioned here so much in the discussion of this proposal, I will say on behalf of the workers and laboring men who are in this Convention that we are giving our hearty approval to Judge Peck's proposal for reform in our judiciary system. We believe that with the adoption of this proposal there will be an opportunity at least for getting justice for the poor man within a reasonable time. I am of the opinion that there is no necessity of increasing the supreme court to seven instead of six judges. Now that the work of the court has been cut down about one-half, it seems to me instead of increasing the number we should lessen the number to five, and if, as Judge Taggart and some of the other speakers suggested, we need a chief justice to have charge of the work of the supreme court, we are satisfied to vote for a chief justice.

Judge Nye, in answering my question a short time ago in reference to the qualifications necessary for a supreme judge pointed out the fact that these judges were elected by the people because of their legal attainments and qualifications and because of their exceeding ability to deal out justice from the supreme bench. The workers of Ohio have been in somewhat of a Rip VanWinkle sleep on that subject for about a quarter of a century, imagining really that our old party conventions were selecting judges because of the facts stated by Judge Nye, but we came to the conclusion some three or four years ago that instead of being selected because of their legal attainments they were picked by the corporate interests of this state who went to the conventions for the particular purpose of selecting judges who would serve them. And they have served them well, particularly in cases of personal injury, where the poor cripple or the widow and orphans have had no opportunity to contest with them because of the delay of the courts. And the reason we are in favor of this judicial reform is because of the impossibility now and in the past of the workers securing justice, because we have been unable to carry our cases up or present them properly in most of the appeals that have been made. We have had to depend upon that class of lawyers who out of their generosity to the workers and the poor men, if you like, were willing to take our cases on a percentage and maintain our widows and orphans and the cripples themselves, occasionally, during the periods when those cases were going through the courts, and where it has been impossible for attorneys to do these things for us our widows and orphans and cripples have had to stay in the poor house while trying to secure justice.

The delegate from Mahoning made reference in one of his answers to questions to the fact that the Ohio supreme court, previous to the passage of the Norris and Metzger acts, practically nullified every safety law made for the protection of the workers in this state by their decisions on assumed risk, contributory negligence and fellow-servant rule. As a verification of his answer all you have to do is to refer to the nullification of the Sanford act, passed in 1890, by the decision of the supreme court on the fellow-servant rule; the Dunlap law on assumed risk, that was practically nullified in the same manner; the provision of the miners' safety law referred to; the miners' right of action where laws are not complied with by the company, section 3365; the guarding of rails and frog safety laws; providing guards for machinery in factories and workshops; the Norman case; the law that no child can be employed around dangerous machinery; the Jacobs case.

In reference to other laws passed for the benefit of the workers it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that the eight-hour law for public work was declared unconstitutional, the ten-hour law for train men declared unconstitutional, the law passed to regulate the sale of convict-made goods declared unconstitutional, the right of the poor litigant to attorney fees in appealed cases declared unconstitutional, the law weighing coal before screening for the coal miners; and the mechanic's lien law.

A bulletin recently issued by the New York state library shows that four hundred and sixty-eight statutes have been declared unconstitutional by supreme courts of various states in this country, fourteen of them in Ohio. Among those in Ohio were the ones I have just enumerated. In the campaign that the organized workers of Ohio undertook against some of the members of the supreme court—some of whom we didn't think fit to serve any more were defeated—we showed that there were some twenty-four personal injury cases that had been passed upon by the supreme court where the decisions had been secured by the individual in the circuit court and had been reversed in the higher court. There were also some eighty-seven unreported similar cases, within a period of a few years, that our investigators found in going over the record.

Mr. SHAFFER: How many of those were affirmed?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. THOMAS: Our record does not show that. It simply shows the number of cases that were passed upon unfavorably.

My amendment provides that the supreme court shall have no right to pass upon questions of constitutionality of statutes enacted by the legislature, and it is the opinion of the workers that each department of government should be responsible for its own act, and that no department of the government should overlap or override the work of the other. We have provided in this Convention for the the initiative and referendum as a means whereby legislative acts that may be in contravention of the constitution shall be passed upon by the people, and no other power should have the right to determine that question other than the people themselves. The people elect the supreme court, the people elect the legislature, and in the legislature we have judiciary committees supposed to be composed of the best legal minds in those bodies, as we have them in this Convention, and I do not think any one here believes for a moment that there is any better legal ability on the supreme court than we have right here in this Convention to determine whether the work we are doing is within our powers or not. The same thing applies to legislative bodies.

Judge Wanamaker, of Akron, I understand a candidate for the supreme bench, according to his announcement in the papers, had this to say in a speech made not long ago in the city of Akron:

There is too much judge-made law these days. When judges rightly understand and faithfully observe the law as it is, giving rightful force and effect to the plain, clear and complete terms and provisions of the act, in accordance, not merely within the letter, but the spirit of the law, they will add much to confidence in the courts, the safety of society and security of the state.

Let them leave lawmaking, law-modifying and law-repealing to the legislative bodies, which are sworn to support the same constitution and laws the judges are sworn to support.

Abraham Lincoln said:

If the policy of the government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the supreme court, the instant they are made the people will have ceased to be their own rulers; having to that extent practically resigned the government into the hands of the eminent tribunal.

It seems to me that we have done just as Abraham Lincoln predicted, and it is time we were going back to those fundamental principles of our government in establishing three departments to do our governmental work.

Judge Taggart's amendment and both proposals submitted, for the first time in Ohio, in my opinion, and I think I am correct, write into the constitution of Ohio the right of the supreme court to pass upon the constitutionality of a law and it seems to me that the members should stop and consider that phase of the proposition, that you are giving rights now never given before by any constitutional convention.

The delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] was here recognized.

Mr. KNIGHT: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I am in a peculiar position with reference to the pending subject. Perhaps I may properly be classed as a layman who has had the advantage of a legal training; or as a lawyer who has never been a practitioner. At any rate I am one who has been a teacher of constitutional law for a decade and a half, attempting to train students, not as special pleaders, but to know the relationship of constitutions, state and national, to statutory law, and the proper functions of judiciary, legislature and people; above all I have always tried to inculcate in their minds the fact that the judicial department is one of the co-ordinate departments of government. It does not seem to me to be serving the people of the state or our own purposes here to bring into this question, directly or indirectly, attacks upon the judiciary. All such attacks in the last analysis come down to this, that we are making an attack upon human nature. No one supposes for a moment that judges placed upon the bench cease to be human beings. They are liable to error as the rest of us are. I do not know that we should impute it to our courts as a crime to commit an error which in the rest of us would be merely an error of judgment. No one for a moment supposes that our courts are omniscient or omnipotent. It seems to me that we shall best serve the people of this state by making such modifications in the judicial system as shall reduce to a minimum the liability to errors of judgment on the part of the court that work to the disadvantage or detriment of the rest of the people. That, it seems to me, is the real problem.

Now the pending proposal and the substitutes have many good features. In the main the Peck proposal is excellent, and this fact is recognized by the two substitutes, for each of them accepts the frame work of the Peck proposal and modifies that proposal in a few particulars. I may say parenthetically that the Franklin bar, at a meeting which I understand unofficially was not attended by more than a small percentage of the membership, resolved against the Peck proposal, but as the fifteen or twenty men who attended the meeting are only a small minority, I beg leave to represent the majority of this county and I am in favor of the Peck proposal with modifications.

The important features upon which there is division and upon which I wish to speak are—

1. What shall be the constitution of the supreme court? Shall it consist of five, six or seven judges?

It seems to me there is a decided advantages in an odd number, and a decided advantage in having a chief justice elected as such for the entire term for which he is elected. On this point I am distinctly in favor of the modifications contained in both the Taggart and the Worthington substitute providing for a supreme court of seven with a chief justice elected as such. I do not regard the fact that it requires one additional judge above the number now constituting the court as an objection that should have weight if thereby we make a more valuable court, and one whose opinions will command the respect which seemingly in the minds of some of us it does not now.

2. Shall the supreme court have authority to declare laws unconstitutional? Yes, emphatically, unless we are to break down the barrier between statutes and constitution. The constitution is the supreme law of the state. Under it we have the legislature and the courts and the executive department. It is a rule of conduct by which we are to live together and by which we are to know what each of our agents has a right to do. By that same organic law we put in the hands of the judiciary the power to act as umpire and hold the rest of us to our duties. I am distinctly opposed to taking from the courts that power.

Change in Judicial System.

3. If the supreme court has the power to declare a law unconstitutional, by what proportion of its membership shall this be done?

It seems to me that all purposes and all interests, personal and individual, large and small, are sufficiently conserved by a provision, having a court of seven, that no law shall be declared unconstitutional by less than five of those seven judges. I do not think it is wise to require the unanimous opinion of the court upon this subject, for reasons that have been more than once explained here in the last few days.

4. What should be the general jurisdiction of the supreme court? It seems to me that this ought to be fixed absolutely in the constitution. Therefore, I am distinctly opposed to the provisions of lines 18 and 19 of the Taggart substitute which add "such other appellate jurisdiction as may be conferred by law." If there comes a time when we are obviously at a disadvantage because the supreme court has no jurisdiction in some matter, we have a way of amending the constitution; and there are few cases that are so vital that we, for the sake of those few cases, should leave the door as wide open as it is now so that the legislature may confer all jurisdiction on the supreme court. If the emergency arises we can handle the situation in two ways, by the initiative and referendum, and, second, through the legislature, for I apprehend an easier way will be provided for us to amend the constitution without resort to the initiative and referendum. It seems to me that the Taggart substitute takes us back and holds us where we are on that point.

5. As to revisory jurisdiction of the proceedings of administrative officers, it seems to me that this should be added, and in this regard the Worthington amendment, lines 17 and 19, is distinctly wise, that the supreme court should have such revisory jurisdiction of the proceedings of administrative officers as may be conferred by law. The public utilities commission and other commissions now undertake to make rates on matters under their control. Those bodies are not courts, and therefore the legislature can not under the present constitution, nor can it under this proposal unless we provide it here, confer appellate jurisdiction on the supreme court over what is not a judicial body. Therefore, the provision must be inserted here so the supreme court can have that jurisdiction and that we may have speedy decisions of matters promulgated and announced by these administrative officers.

6. In the next place, line 27 of the Worthington substitute proposes that the supreme court may have jurisdiction in cases involving the construction of a statute. I am distinctly opposed to that. That is another door by which we shall get back to the situation where we now are. Under this the supreme court would acquire appellate jurisdiction over almost every subject, for there are very few cases that can not be made to involve the construction of a statute.

7. As to the appellate court it seems to me to be wiser to keep the number of districts at eight rather than to increase to nine, as provided for by the Taggart substitute, as that would necessitate a rearrangement of the districts and would add one more court, perhaps necessary and perhaps unnecessary; but the same thing would be accomplished by giving to the legislature power to increase the number of districts if it becomes necessary rather than fix it by the constitution. As to the jurisdiction of the appellate court, it seems to me, at present at any rate, that the reversal of the decision of the common pleas court should be allowed by a majority vote of the court rather than that it should require unanimity of the court.

8. Lastly, I am very strongly of the opinion that an amendment should be introduced somewhere into these proposals before one is finally adopted, requiring that every case heard in court, both supreme court and court of appeals, shall be reported. That can not be left to the legislature because if the legislature were to undertake to enact a statute upon that subject the court would rightly say it was an invasion of the territory of the court, whereas if in the constitution we confer the power upon the legislature to order that cases shall be reported such objection can not be raised, and we shall have a proper provision on that subject. I wish to offer an amendment when the time comes that the decisions in all cases of the supreme court and court of appeals shall be reported, together with the reasons therefor.

It seems to me we are in a situation where neither proposal is exactly right and therefore it may be necessary for us to override our technical rules a little to whip one of these proposals into such form as to embody the best in all, and I agree most heartily that there should not be, and I do not believe there will be, any difficulty in the way of our getting together and giving practically an unanimous vote in this body on the main principles on which the report is based, of which the substitutes are merely modifications.

Mr. SHAFFER: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: It is with extreme diffidence that I arise to address you on this proposal. Because of the learned jurists who are present and who have spoken upon and who have lent a hand in the making of this proposal and the amendments thereto I feel that I speak as a layman. However that may be, I desire to raise my voice in favor of the general principles and the ideas that are embodied in this Peck proposal. I take this position without casting any reflections on the past history of the courts of Ohio, and without finding any fault with the decisions of the courts or with the courts themselves. In the development and progress of civilization there comes a time when all minds meet on the proposition that there should be a change. We live in such an age of evolution and development. While the principles of justice and righteousness are eternal and remain always, the application of those principles must meet the requirements of our present environment. All agree that there is too much technicality in the administration of justice. All of us realize this. All agree that there is too much delay in the administration of justice. We all realize this. And to that end this representative body is practically of one mind, that the judiciary system of Ohio should be changed, and it should be changed in such a way that while the principles of justice and equity shall remain the same as they always have been, courts should be so provided by this Constitutional Convention that they can administer those principles with celerity and with justice to all who come before them. I hold that this is the most important proposal this Convention has considered. As the last resort, as the final arbiter of the rights of the people of the state of Ohio, the courts must be respected. All of us have that in our make-up, in our very nature, which makes us willing to submit to an impartial tribunal the determination of our rights. We are here to try to remedy the defects of our judicial system and to get together on something that will restore to the courts and to all the officers of the courts that dignity and respect which they deserve.

Now, I make these introductory remarks with the idea of going over this proposal of Judge Peck and reviewing with you the different amendments and suggestions that have been made so it will conform with the idea which all of us have, but upon which we are somewhat at sea as to the way they should be expressed.

Now I will ask your attention to this Peck proposal and to the suggestion made by Judge Worthington and Judge Taggart in their substitute proposals presented to this Convention.

Section 1 is practically the same all the way through, except that Judge Worthington changes the words "court of appeals" to "appellate courts," and — perhaps I had better read it:

Section 1. The judicial power of the state is vested in a supreme court, appellate courts, —

Instead of courts of appeals as in the original Proposal No. 184

—courts of common pleas, courts of probate, justice of the peace, and such other courts inferior to the appellate courts as the general assembly may from time to time establish.

I think that change is wise and should be adopted.

Now, going on to section 2, Judge Worthington suggests that there be a chief justice. Therefore I suggest that section 2 be amended so as to read:

The supreme court shall, until otherwise provided by law, consist of a chief justice and six judges and the judges now in that office shall continue," etc.

I think it is the consensus of opinion of the conservative as well as the radical members of the Convention that while we do not want to change the present number of judges, there should be an uneven number of judges of the supreme court. The election of the chief justice would remedy that difficulty, besides giving to the chief justice, elected as such, the responsibility for the execution and administration of that court. There is no other suggested change in the section except the writ of prohibition. I do not think there is any question but that word should be added. It seems to be agreed upon.

Then there is a more important change at the end of the period in line 17, where provision for added jurisdiction of the supreme court is made in the words "and such revisory jurisdiction in the proceedings of the administrative officers as may be conferred by law."

We are, as stated in the beginning of my remarks, in an age of evolution and it seems that in the legislation of other states they have evolved the idea of commissions having charge of public utilities, taxes and other matters in which we are all interested. Those are all administrative officers of the state, and those administrative officers are getting to be very important officers; in fact, the most important we have in the state today, and the suggestion is that the supreme court should have supervisory and advisory power over them.

Mr. TAGGART: Revisory.

Mr. SHAFFER: It is the same thing. Wherever a commission makes a ruling, if anybody is aggrieved he can take it to the supreme court and the supreme court would revise or modify the judgment of the commission on that question. I hope that will be adopted.

If we adopt the chief justice idea, suggested in line 26, I would strike out the language that no statute should be held unconstitutional except by a concurrence of five judges of the supreme court, eliminating the word "all" and striking out the words "sitting in the case." I take the middle ground on this much disputed question as to the court having authority to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional and to answer Mr. Thomas' objection that there never was such a provision in any constitution I refer him to our present constitution of Ohio section 2, which provides for dividing up of the court into two divisions for the adjudication of cases, where he will find the following language:

A majority of each division shall constitute a quorum, and such an assignment of the cases to each division may be made as such court may deem expedient, but whenever all the judges of either division hearing a case shall not concur as to the judgment to be rendered therein, or whenever a case shall involve the constitutionality of an act of the general assembly or of an act of congress, it shall be reserved to the whole court for adjudication.

That has been the law in Ohio since 1883, so that this is not an innovation to put this provision in the constitution.

In line 28 we have brought up to us the much mooted and much argued question as to the requirement of unanimity in the reversal of a judgment of a common pleas judge.

The time of the gentleman here expired and on motion was extended.

Mr. SHAFFER: Mr. Jones offered a suggestion in his argument which appealed to a great many of us. It was to the effect that we add to the cases of public and general interest which the supreme court might affirm, modify or reverse, cases where the decision of the court of appeals is not unanimous, in which, upon the application of either party, the supreme court shall direct the court of appeals to certify the record up to the supreme court, which may review, affirm, modify, etc.

Mr. HALFHILL: Which proposal are you quoting that language from?

Mr. SHAFFER: The original Judge Peck proposal, and this is a suggestion in line 29. No amendment was offered, but Mr. Jones, who is now absent, asked me at the proper time to present an amendment covering that ground. However, he has modified his original suggestion. His original suggestion was that in cases where the decision of the court of appeals is not unanimous the supreme court shall upon application of a party of interest direct the court of appeals to certify its record to the supreme court. He has changed that to read "in all cases where the decision of the court of appeals is not unanimous for reversal of the judgment of an inferior court." That would set out a class of decisions where the court was not unanimous in affirming the decision of the courts below. This amendment has merit and I shall introduce it at the proper time as an amendment to this proposal.

Change in Judicial System.

Another amendment that was practically agreed upon in the wording of the proposal is in line 39. This was a change of the word "after" to "before" and was accepted by the committee. Now we come down to line 45, at the end of the word law, "the court of appeals shall hold one or more terms in each year at such places in the district as the judges may determine upon." That I approve of and I think a majority of the delegates do.

In Judge Taggart's amendment, at line 50 of the Peck proposal, that the general assembly shall provide for the rotation of such judges throughout such districts, I do not know anything that will add uniformity to the decisions and certainty to the law upon different questions more than by a visit of one circuit judge to another district, thus getting the views, not only on questions of law, but on questions of practice. It seems to me it is of the utmost value, not only to the judiciary of the state, but to the litigants and to the lawyers, that that should be embodied in this proposal.

Now there is but one more suggestion that I wish to make and that is also embodied in a suggestion by Mr. Jones that the provision at the end of the word "case" in line 65 of the present proposal should be added to the end of line 31, so that it would read that in all cases where the judgment of a court of appeals is in conflict with the judgment pronounced by another court of appeals of the state upon the same question, the supreme court shall upon application of a party in interest, made within such time as may be prescribed by law, direct such court of appeals to certify the record to the supreme court for review, final determination, etc. That is in line with Judge Worthington's proposal and also with Judge Taggart's proposal, so as to give jurisdiction to the supreme court in all cases where there is such conflict of decisions between the different courts of appeals of the state. Then the period after the word jurisdiction in line 63 should be stricken out and the words "and in cases hereinbefore excepted" inserted. That makes it logical, so that the jurisdiction of the supreme court will all be contained in section 2. I thank you for your attention and sincerely hope that this proposal will go through substantially as it has been offered.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I want to serve notice on the Convention now of an amendment which I have written which I believe will cure some of the objections to the original proposal. I do not know that the amendment will be in order now, but I think a notification of the fact that the amendment will be offered will not be out of order.

The PRESIDENT: It may be proper to call attention to it.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: There seems to be a difference of opinion between Judge Peck and other members of the legal profession regarding the restraint upon the circuit court or court of appeals in trying cases de novo under this proposal. It has occurred to me that all of that should be cured by inserting after the word "procedendo" in line 57 these words: "And the right to try de novo any case not tried by a jury sent up from the lower court." Then let it proceed just as it does, defining the jurisdiction and the final judgment of the appellate court. I believe this amendment would relieve the apprehension of many of the lawyers about the injustice that this proposal would impose on litigants who might not be satisfied with the judgment of the lower courts.

Mr. TALLMAN: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I am in favor of a great many things that have been said and a great many of these amendments, but I am heartily opposed to others. I do not think there is any question in the minds of this Convention as to the supremacy of a constitutional provision over an act of the legislature, and I shall not discuss that at all. I think it is a matter of detail largely for the legislature instead of the Convention to define questions as to the number of supreme judges and the number it would require to reverse or affirm. I am not particular about that, but I do think there is one matter that has escaped the observation of this Convention and one that is material, and the reason why I allude to it is that the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] made it a special ground of attack in one of his very able speeches made to this Convention. I might not have mentioned it had it not been for the further fact that it was given emphasis and importance by the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT]. It is that in no case should the court have jurisdiction to declare the meaning or pass upon the meaning, of an act of the legislature—not as to its constitutionality, but to pass upon or determine the actual meaning or construction of that act of the legislature.

Now, gentlemen, I want to point out to you some of the difficulties there are in that rule if adopted. It is true that under the section here defining the judges of the supreme court and defining their authority it says "such other jurisdiction that may be given by law," but Judge Worthington of Cincinnati, has insisted that it was important to provide—in the constitution itself—that in every case involving the construction and meaning of a statute, the supreme court should have jurisdiction to determine its construction in every case where its construction is involved. I want to illustrate and explain to you the importance of this.

In 1908 there was a commission appointed consisting of three miners, three operators and the chief mine inspector of Ohio. Previous to that appointment the members appointed to frame the General Code—to codify our statutes—put all of the mining laws together, and the next legislature, in getting out volume 101, repealed every section of the act that was in the General Code but re-enacted it largely, with some changes. Now, bearing that in mind, I want to make another statement for the benefit of the lay members of this Convention, and that is that under the common law in a personal injury case there was no right of recovery except to the person injured.

The common law was adopted in this country and it was only by means of legislation that the right of action was extended to the wife or children or next of kin of a person killed. Now, without an extension of that right by statute, the rule of construction would be that the damages for an injury would be confined to the party injured. I want to call your attention to one section of the law adopted by the mining commission, section 972, page 86 of volume 101, which in substance reads as follows:

In case of an injury to person or property occasioned by a violation of the provisions of this act, or any willful failure to comply with any of the provisions of this act by the owners or operators of a mine, a right of action shall accrue to the person injured for any direct damage he may have sustained thereby, and in case of loss of life by any such willful negligence or failure a right of action shall accrue to the widow and lineal heirs of the deceased.

That means, in the first place, the right of action shall accrue to the person injured. That is all right. Second, in case of death it will accrue to the wife and to the children who are the lineal heirs. But it does not give any right of action to the next of kin of an unmarried man who is killed in a mine, who has no wife or children.

Now I want to call your attention to another thing. In the common pleas court of Belmont county an action was brought by a mother as administratrix of her son, a minor sixteen years of age, who was killed in the mine by a violation on the part of an operator of some of the provisions of this mining law. I have not the time to tell you what they were, but it was a violation of the mining law. The minor had no wife or children. The common pleas court there said, he being dead, and having no wife or children, there was nobody on earth that had a right of action and sustained a demurrer to the petition.

Now I want to call your attention to another thing, and right here I want to give a little credit to my worthy friend from Mahoning county [Mr. ANDERSON].

He claims to have had much to do with the employers' liability act. That is a good act. Remember now, before the passage of this mining act the law had been for thirty or forty years that in case a person was killed in a mine his administrator had a right of action, and that right of action would be for the benefit of the next of kin, who was his wife and his children if he had any, and if he didn't have any his next of kin would be his father and mother and his brothers and his sisters. Therefore the law for forty years before this mining act was passed was that a party injured could recover, and if he died his wife and children could recover, and if he had none, then his father and mother and his brothers and sisters as next of kin could recover. The construction of this section of the mining act by the court deprived the father and mother and brothers and sisters of any right to recover because they were not named in the statute.

The time of the delegate here expired and on motion of Mr. Redington was extended.

Mr. TALLMAN: Now in the passage of this employers' liability act, remember that the general act giving the right of recovery to the next of kin had been in force for forty years, and it was very properly repealed in this employers' liability act, volume 101, page 194. The employers' liability act, passed after the miners act, repealed the old law that had been in force forty years, but reenacted it in practically the same terms, thereby putting it out of the power of the court to say that the old statute had been repealed by implication, because it was repealed by the legislature and reenacted later in the same session, showing that the legislature intended to give a right of action to the next of kin in case there was no wife or children surviving the decedent.

That being the case, after the passage of the mining act and the passage of the employers' liability act, on August 23, 1910, a boy sixteen years old, a trapper, was killed in the mine by reason of a violation on the part of the mine owner of some of the provisions of the mining act, and a suit was brought in the common pleas court of Belmont county in the name of the administratrix, who was his mother, to recover the damages sustained by the next of kin—herself and husband, who was an invalid, and some children, some younger than the boy who was killed and some older, but the boy who was killed was her chief support. She brought an action, after the passage of both statutes alluded to, to recover. A demurrer was filed to that petition and for the benefit of the laymen in the Convention I will say that a demurrer raises a question of law—that is, even if all said in the petition is true, there is no right to recover. The court, admitting that everything in the petition was true, yet, under the mining law framed by three miners, three operators and the chief inspector of mines of Ohio, and passed by the legislature, refused a right of recovery to that mother for the death of her child, her only support, because the son had no wife and children.

Now, gentlemen, the case went very promptly to the circuit court. It went there on the 4th of December, 1911, and on the 8th of December, 1911, the circuit court affirmed the decision of the court below sustaining that demurrer, and the case is now in the supreme court. I want to ask my neighbor from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], or I want to ask any other lawyer in the Convention, under those circumstances, if there were no appeal by petition in error or otherwise to the supreme court where a demurrer has been sustained to the petition by the common pleas court and circuit court or court of appeals, as it may be, asserting that the law gave no right of recovery to the mother and her other minor children, and that case could not be taken on review to the supreme court, I ask you what remedy have we? I ask you if we would have any remedy? Absolutely none whatever. This demurrer involved the construction of a statute.

Now, gentlemen, you heard the gentleman for Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], and the principal part of his speech was made in favor of preventing the court from passing upon the construction of or meaning of any law. Here they passed upon the construction and meaning of not only one but two laws, and they held that the law passed after the mining law had no force or effect. The liability law reads that when a death of a person is occasioned by wrongful act or negligence for default, there is a right of recovery in the next of kin, which includes father, mother, brother and sister if there is no wife or children. Then it says such action shall be for the exclusive benefit of the wife or husband and children, but if there be neither of them, then the parents or next of kin. Taking those two statutes together, the common pleas and the circuit court held that the mining statute as passed, although in direct violation of the language of the statute that was last passed, gave no right of recovery to the father, mother, brother or sister at all.

If the supreme court has no right to declare the construction or meaning of a statute you cannot go there by petition in error in cases like this, no matter whether your case is important or not. It may not be important to the general public, but it may be immensely important to you. Are we going to permit this folly? I remember when the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] was urging eloquently and earnestly that the supreme court should not have the right to construe or determine the meaning of any law, that when he finished you clapped your hands and cheered the sentiment expressed by him. Now why don't you clap your hands and cheer when this widow and her minor children are deprived of the right to recover for the death of that minor boy?

Mr. WINN: If the supreme court sustains the judgment of those two lower courts you will still be convinced that they are all wrong?

Mr. TALLMAN: There will simply be no remedy.

Mr. WINN: Then your argument would be that all the courts are wrong?

Mr. TALLMAN: It would amount to that.

Mr. WINN: Then you will be in favor of going on to the supreme court of the United States?

Mr. TALLMAN: It might amount to that, but it would not amount to what you contend for, giving the poor a quick and speedy justice.

Mr. WATSON: If the supreme court sustains that, it would have been better for the case to have stopped below?

Mr. TALLMAN: I leave that to you. I have given an instance and that is a case that I have a record of. There is a case where the poor were deprived. That widow had other minor children. They might all work in that mine and all be killed and there would be no remedy under the law if the supreme court has no right to construe or interpret the statute where it has been wrongly construed by the lower courts.

Mr. HAHN: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: In substance I approve of the proposal of Judge Peck, of Cincinnati. I consider it a masterpiece of judicial provision.

I am glad to find reproduced in it my two proposals that the present circuit courts be abolished and that the supreme court be required to report its opinions. Both amendments were at first recommended for indefinite postponement. Our present circuit courts have no respectable law—that is to say, their decisions need not be respected everywhere in the state; the decisions of one circuit court may be disregarded by any other court.

Judge Peck's proposal, if adopted by the state of Ohio, will not only make the law of the circuit court respectable, but it will, at the same time, do away with a great many delays that have been the objects of so many complaints, and it will remove many an obstacle in the way of the present administration of justice.

A remark was made here that if we had so many circuit courts of final jurisdiction no work will be left for the supreme court of Ohio. Last week a gentleman, not a member of this Convention, in his address before you claimed that cases of procedendo do not exist in Ohio. We do not use the term "procedendo," but we have mandamus proceedings, meaning in the state of Ohio the same thing that procedendo means in England. Look up the reports of the state of Ohio and you will find that our supreme court resorted several times to such proceedings, but even if the supreme court of Ohio should not have to be so busy under a new constitution as it has been heretofore, it stands to reason that in a commonwealth consisting of eighty-eight counties there will always be constitutional questions and other litigation enough to necessitate a supreme court. We must have a supreme court of our own. We cannot send our cases for decision to Michigan, Kentucky or any other state.

There is another question before us: Shall the decisions of the supreme court be unanimous, or shall an uneven number answer better the purpose? That question implies a great principle. Those members of this Convention who think that the decisions of the supreme court should be unanimous, start with pre-supposition of the principle that a general assembly is fully equal in judicial qualification to the supreme court, and, therefore, only a unanimous supreme court should be authority to the legislature, while they who are in favor of an uneven number of judges in the decisions of the supreme tribunal cherish the idea that a supreme court is supreme eo ipso, even if not unanimous.

I am in favor that the supreme court's decisions should not be required to be unanimous. My first reason is that the supreme court, like any other court, must have occasion to correct or reverse itself. No court is expected to be infallible. It is the privilege of any court to err.

Now, gentlemen, if the court has to be unanimous, will it not be more difficult for the supreme court to correct or reverse itself than if there be only a majority required? My second reason is, I am not afraid that the supreme court will allow itself to be influenced by politics. Every supreme court finds it a matter of dignity and duty to repress politics as much as possible, and if a judge through his past connections should—and I say that with the highest regard and respect for the judiciary in general and the supreme court in special—have something to do with politics, will it not be better in such a case if unanimity is not required? The necessity of unanimity often makes the issue a matter of one man's power and would block the course of justice. Thirdly, let me say the supreme court is always expected to be the highest body in point of knowledge of law. It was here remarked that there are in any general assembly men fully as able and learned as supreme court judges are in general. Gentlemen, I am not positive of that. In this Convention we have lawyers and judges that might be an ornament to the supreme court of any state, but you must not forget that this assembly is an exceptional body of men. It is above the average, and is at the present time, while in session, the most august body in the state, but can we say as much for the average legislature? Some times there may be a legislature of men, excellent in character, excellent in talent and excellent in knowledge, but a supreme court must always have men great and profound in the knowledge of law. There may be a great many in a general assembly who have knowledge of law, but in many cases the fine points of law, the higher spirit of jurisprudence, comes with the experience on the supreme court bench.

Remarks were here made to the effect that a supreme court often decided in favor of the plutocracy and the interests. Gentlemen, I am not aware of any such cases, and I am, therefore, very careful in criticising the supreme court's decisions concerning modern questions and problems not definitely provided for in the old constitution.

Fifty years ago, when the present constitution was made, a great many burning questions of the present day, connected with labor, private and public corporations and other movements of the modern age, were unknown. It is our duty to first make provisions for such questions; and such amendments are expedient, necessary and imperative in the new constitution that is to be furnished by us. Such a work on our part will enable the supreme court of Ohio to decide more in accord with the present social, commercial and economic conditions of the state.

I repeat, as to the appellate court I approve of Judge Peck's proposal, but I dissent from it regarding the unanimity of the supreme court in its decisions.

Mr. NYE: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I had not intended to speak on this proposal until my name was unfortunately brought before the Convention because I asked some question. I believe the question that is before the Convention at the present time is one of the most important questions, if not the most important question, that has been or will be brought before the Convention during its session.

I regret very much that there has been so much reflection cast upon our courts. I believe the courts and personnel of the judges of the courts as a general rule are above reproach. I believe that the judges as a rule have been honest, upright men, men who wanted to do what is right as they saw it. Though we may have had some men that have been elected to the bench who could be justly criticised, the great body of the judges of the courts throughout the state have been honorable, upright, intelligent men.

In speaking now on this question, there has been so much said about corporations and the advantage that a corporation may get over the individual that I want to say I am not now and never have been an attorney for corporations. I have at times represented a bank, but corporations that are sued for personal injuries I have never represented. It has been said in this Convention and by my friend from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] that the rights of the people are taken from them because of the great power of the corporations. I am afraid the gentleman has forgotten that the individual may be the one sometimes that may want to take his case to a higher court. To adopt this Peck proposal would, in my judgment, put a millstone about the necks of the poorer classes so they could not take their cases to a higher court and get the wrong that has been done them righted. My friend from Greene county [Mr. FESS] argued at some length that it was important to have cases decided quickly and ended. If the gentleman, or any one upon this floor, will tell me what advantage it is to a man who has had his case tried in a court to find, when it is tried and decided wrongly and he has no remedy, that it is ended, he will confer a favor upon this Convention. If the case is decided rightly it may be well to have it ended, but the poor man is just as liable to have the case decided against him wrongly in the lower court as the other side, and if he is cut off from a review in the higher court he is deprived of the right he ought to have: When you put into the constitution a provision that prevents a litigant from reviewing his case in the court of last resort you are doing a thing that will do injustice, in my judgment, to the poorer classes as well as to the corporation or the richer class. The proposal provides a court of appeals for final jurisdiction in almost all cases. In my opinion that will give you as many supreme courts or courts of last resort as you have courts of appeals in the state. It will be more difficult for the litigant, be he rich or poor, to get his just rights if a case is decided wrongly than it would be if you had the old rule or the one proposed by Judge Taggart's substitute.

It has been said upon this floor that it might be for the interest of attorneys to have the constitution one way or the other. I want to say in behalf of the attorneys in this Convention that the attorneys are the servants of the litigants. The only interest they have in a case is to have the case of their clients decided rightly, and if not decided rightly in one court to take the case to another court and have it reviewed. I say this in behalf of the farmers and laboring man and every other known business man in the state of Ohio. The very fact that you now have many cases taken to the supreme court and reviewed by that court and reversed is an indication that at least some cases have been decided wrongly. It is at least an indication that somebody has been wronged in the lower courts. I know, as has been said by men upon this floor, that courts are human. I concede that they are, but they try to do right and they are as apt to make a mistake against a corporation as they are against a poor man. Again, I say, if there is a tendency upon the part of courts to favor corporations, you are just as apt to find it in the lower courts as in the higher courts, and if the lower courts deprive the individual as against the corporation of his rights, the individual ought to have a right to appeal to the next court, and if it is not decided rightly there, let him have a right to go to the highest court. Let the poor man have a right to have his case decided by the highest court in the state.

I am in favor, as has been said here by others, of having a right to review an equity case tried in the common pleas court in the court of appeals de novo, so that the court of appeals may hear it upon the evidence and decide whether the one man acting as judge and jury decided it rightly or wrongly.

It has been argued that you have a right to review the decision of the jury on the evidence. The common pleas judge reviews the case on the weight of the evidence that was given to the jury. The litigant ought to have the right to have the court of appeals review the equity case on the weight of the evidence when it is decided by one man instead of twelve men.

Mr. PECK: Why can't you review it upon the record?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. NYE: The reason you can't review it upon the record is this: The higher court frequently says that if they had the case originally to decide they would have decided it the other way from which the lower court decided it, but the decision is not so manifestly against the weight of the evidence that they ought to disturb it. I remember very distinctly of having a case after I left the bench where the common pleas court decided an equity case one way, and I took the case to the circuit court on appeal and they were unanimously of the opinion that it should have been decided the other way on the evidence and so decided. I think you farmers and business men and everybody who has a lawsuit have a right to have your case decided in the court of appeals on the weight of the evidence.

Now, just another question. If you will look over the records of the trial cases you will find that very few men ever have more than one lawsuit. That lawsuit is very important to that man, and if he is unjustly beaten he ought to have a right to have it reviewed in the highest court of the state.

The gentleman's time here expired and on motion of Mr. Stilwell was extended five minutes.

Mr. NYE: I will only take a minute. I am in favor of the Taggart substitute with one or two changes. We ought to have the right to review cases in the circuit court or courts of appeals on the evidence in equity cases. We ought to have an odd number of judges on the supreme bench so they cannot evenly divide in the supreme court. It seems to me that with these changes the courts will be perfectly satisfactory to all the people, the litigants of the state and to the bar generally. The Taggart substitute, with these changes would meet with the approval of the people.

Mr. DOTY: It is now three minutes to the time when, according to the rule adopted, we will vote. Judge Peck wants fifteen minutes to close and I move that the time for taking the vote be extended to 3:45.

The motion was carried.

Mr. PECK: Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention: I want to say at the outset that I am very much pleased with the spirit in which this proposal has been received and discussed by the Convention. The friendly spirit in which it was received and thoroughly discussed by my colleague from Hamilton [Mr. WORTHINGTON] was a delight to me. The same with reference to Judge Taggart. He, too, took hold of the matter in a kindly and friendly way, and both of these distinguished gentlemen so far agreed with the original proposition of the Judiciary committee that there really is not a great deal before us to discuss. There are three or four points around which all the discussion has been turning and about which we have been differing, and they are points of some importance, but they do not touch the essence of the bill. The essential thing in this bill is the proposition to make what is now the circuit court a court of last resort for the great bulk of litigation. That is the important point. That is the reform which I regard as essential and of great importance to the people of this state.

Mr. friend who has just taken his seat, Judge Nye, seems to think it will be something of a hardship to the bar to be denied the right to take their cases up to the supreme court. Of course you cannot have a right to continue litigation unless the other party to the case has the same right, and you may know that in a great majority of the cases that right is going to operate in favor of the longest purse, as the one best able to endure continuous litigation, so that the man with the short purse is the man who wants a speedy trial and a prompt conclusion of his case. The conditions are not equal and call for a change.

The first question is whether the supreme court shall decide a law unconstitutional and void by a mere majority of the court. When we were considering that matter in the Judiciary committee it struck us all that it was a remarkable thing that one or two men in a court could upset a law passed with all the due solemnity with which a law is usually passed. Assuming the court is divided and you have a majority of one or two in favor of declaring a law unconstitutional, perhaps two or three more judges on the other side viewing that situation, it struck us as remarkable that one or two persons under such circumstances should have that power, and everybody agreed that no court ought to declare an act unconstitutional without great consideration and perfect certainty of mind that what they are doing is correct.

There is a presumption in favor of every law put upon the statute book. Every lawyer knows that. Any act passed by the general assembly is presumed to be valid, and the man who attacks it must show the invalidity so plainly that there is no logical escape from the conclusion.

Now when the judges of a court who hear an argument upon that question differ among themselves, and if they are pretty evenly divided, it seemed to us that it indicated a doubt as to the propriety of the reversal and that it would be better to require unanimity than to allow a reversal under such circumstances.

I admit the custom has been otherwise, and it is now the fixed law of the country that the supreme court of any state can decide a statute unconstitutional whenever they conclude that it conflicts with the constitution of the state, but there has been a good deal of murmuring and discussion about it. Yet it is a part of our system and we are not trying to take it away by this proposal. I would not take the power away and that has not been advocated here. There was a good deal of academic discussion this morning, but that was not the real question. The question is, how many judges should it require in order to declare an act unconstitutional? Judge Worthington made a point against it that the action of the court is a unit, that the court is one, and the majority is like that which we used to say at common law, that man and wife were one and the husband was the one. His argument was that the court is one and the majority of the court is the court. It seems to me that is crowding a legal fiction too far. A court is one just as this Convention is one. There can be but one action by this Convention and that is controlled by the majority of the Convention, and what the minority thinks makes no difference after the vote is taken. So it is with each body that is acting as a unit by vote. It is presumed to be one, but that is nothing but a legal fiction. The court is composed of five, six or seven, whatever number is fixed. This Convention is composed of one hundred and nineteen members. So a corporate body is composed of a number of directors, but if you consider it carefully you will find it is nothing more than a legal fiction, just as we say a corporation is a body created by law. An established doctrine with reference to legal fictions is that they shall not be pressed so far as to cause them to operate unjustly. When they are pressed beyond what is right they cease to be of use, and a court of equity will disregard them, as the supreme court of Ohio held in the Standard Oil Company case. They held that they would disregard the fiction of the corporation and would go back and take hold of the directors, the individuals. The fiction was sought to be interposed that the corporation did the thing, but the corporation can not act unless the people in it act, and whenever a corporation begins to break the law wilfully the fiction will be disregarded.

Now it seems to me pressing the legal fiction of a unit court too far to say you can not require unanimity with respect to anything done by that court. I do not see any more difficulty in requiring unanimity from a court than in requiring unanimity from a jury. Different ways can be devised so that the exact state of opinion of each judge can be shown, and there is no necessity for any concealment or mystery about it. And it is to be noted that when the court acts unanimously or by the required majority the court acts as a unit as clearly as in any other case, and the same is true in case of a failure to act for want of the necessary number.

Mr. FACKLER: I want to ask one question?

Mr. PECK: Certainly.

Mr. FACKLER: Suppose a case has been decided by a court of appeals and judgment has been rendered for the defendant, the basis of which judgment is that an act is unconstitutional, and that case comes to the supreme court; would you allow one of the judges of the supreme court to reverse the court of appeals?

Mr. PECK: Yes, if they are so equally divided on that—if the court is so equally divided as to be only a majority, I would.

Now there is another proposition of somewhat kindred character. Judge Taggart has in his proposition changed a little as to this constitutional question and he requires five-sixths of the court to declare a law unconstitutional. There is very little difference between unanimity and five-sixths, but as a matter of principle Judge Taggart disposes of the claim that the court is a unit in his proposition as much as does mine. There is not a great deal of difference between them, but I hope the original proposition rather than the modification proposed will be adopted.

Another proposition is as to appeals in equity cases. I do not see why a man should have the right to two trials in an equity case any more than a case at law. I simply can not understand that. Under our practice in the state courts equity cases are always promptly and easily handled. The judge hears the testimony and the testimony can be taken down in shorthand and used in that court or in the court above. It is heard by the judge himself, and in that respect it differs from the practice in the federal court, where a case is sent to a master commissioner and the commissioner takes the testimony and after a while reports to the court. This is often a source of delay and expense. The master commissioner has to be paid. But under the practice in our courts we do not do that very often. Occasionally a case which is very elaborate may be referred in that way, but it can not be avoided in cases which are very long and involve voluminous accounts.

Mr. HOSKINS: On the question of the right of appeal in equity cases, in view of the fact that in an equity case we only have the judgment of a single man, the common pleas judge, upon the fact, and after being prevented from having a trial by a jury ought we not have a right to present the original facts in an appellate court?

Mr. PECK: You have a right to have your questions of fact tried by a judge of the common pleas court and they are so tried, and if they are tried with as much care as you try a case before a jury your evidence will be all presented and reported, and it can be carried up just as easily on a record as a jury case is carried up on a record.

Mr. HOSKINS: Do you contend that the appellate court can get a true view of the facts of the case from a cold typewritten record as well as from witnesses?

Mr. PECK: It can get quite as true a view of the facts as in a jury case.

Mr. HOSKINS: But in the jury case you have had the judgment of twelve men on the facts, and in the other case you have only had the judgment of one.

Mr. PECK: There has never been a time since law was practiced in England or this country that an equity case was tried before more than one judge. It is so in England, it is so in the federal court and should be so in Ohio, except about the rules of appeals which Judge Worthington has shown to be an anomaly that does not exist in any other state, and which is a tremendous stumbling block in the administration of justice, if carried out as you want it carried out. But some of the circuit courts avoid it by adopting a rule that has been spoken of, and other courts which have not adopted it as a rule are practically operating on the same line and nobody seriously objects. Lawyers try their cases in that way right along.

Mr. HOSKINS: By what right do you say nobody seriously objects? Is it not a fact that the circuit court has no right to adopt such a rule?

Mr. PECK: If anybody seriously objected they would carry it to the supreme court and not work under it. That is the reason I say nobody seriously objects. Nobody objects because nobody cares enough to take it up.

Now I have not much time to talk and I would like to be allowed to talk without interruption.

About this matter of appeals in equity cases, they are tried before a judge sitting as a chancellor. The testimony is heard by him. He makes his finding and the testimony is in writing. What objection is there to that? In England the testimony is taken by a master and no judge ever sees the witnesses in England or in the federal court here. The testimony is all taken in writing and all courts decide upon that testimony in England and in the federal court, but here in the first court our judge sees the witnesses and hears their testimony and his hearing is certainly as good or better than that of a master or commissioner.

Mr. DWYER: And may not the important matters of fact be sent by a judge in the chancery court to a jury if he desires it?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. PECK: Certainly. Judge Dwyer calls my attention to the fact that the chancellor can frame an issue and send it out to be tried by the jury. That is not infrequently resorted to. I have participated in several such trials. It is not at all unusual where there are questions requiring consideration which involve conflict of testimony such as we have in cases at law, that they are sent to a jury for a trial of those issues of fact.

Equity cases do not generally involve the fierce conflict as to facts that are generally involved by cases tried by a jury.

Mr. PETTIT: I have not been here during the discussion and I would like to ask this question: Is it not a fact that in equity cases, after the proofs shall have been taken, there is often newly discovered evidence that changes a case entirely?

Mr. PECK: Not very often.

Mr. PETTIT: Is it not frequently the case?

Mr. PECK: I don't think I ever knew of any case, either in law or in equity, in which newly discovered evidence changed the result. I have known counsel to come into court and claim it might, could or would, but when we came to consider the newly discovered evidence it nearly always frittered out and turned out to be a new witness who knew something that was stated by other witnesses, and under the rule that a court will not consider merely cumulative evidence it is ruled out. I would not think there was much in that newly discovered evidence of matter any more than in a law case.

I call your attention to the fact that that may happen in any case after it is tried and determined by a jury, and it is the misfortune of the party who did not get the evidence or it is due to the neglect of himself or his attorney.

This matter of taking the time of three judges to sit on the bench and listen to the taking of testimony in an equity case from day to day when they ought to be considering questions of law and deciding real questions is to me very wrong. It is a great waste of time and it is one of the drawbacks to practicing law in Ohio, and it has been. When a man comes here from an outside state he can not understand it. He will say "We don't have anything like that in our state," and you have to explain it to him to get him to understand what you mean by an appeal of that kind. It is a matter peculiar to this state and one of the stumbling blocks that we want to get rid of.

Judge Worthington called your attention to the fact that this is one of the most beneficial reforms in the proposal. A man can try a case and try it properly. The trouble is that where they have this appeal as we have it now they do not try their cases properly the first time. They skim around the trial in the case below and they rely upon the trial in the circuit court as their real trial. If they tried the case properly in the common pleas court they would not have to do that. Equity cases, since the earliest institution of law, have been matters on paper instead of oral testimony largely.

Mr. DWYER: Will you be willing, when the time comes, to change the organization of the court if it is the wish of the Convention?

Mr. PECK: My own idea is that it had better be left alone. We are cutting down the jurisdiction of the supreme court and we are relieving it of a lot of work, and what is the use of increasing the personnel? If they have not enough work now, why put another judge in there?

Mr. SHAFFER: Then reduce it to five.

Mr. HALFHILL: I am a little in doubt as to the meaning of this proposal so far as it relates to raising a constitutional question. Can we raise a constitutional question in the common pleas court or in the circuit court?

Mr. PECK: You can raise it anywhere.

Mr. HALFHILL: In the appellate court can we raise a constitutional question and have it decided?

Mr. PECK: Yes, of course; but the final decision is the supreme court. That gives the supreme court jurisdiction of the case—the very fact that there is a constitutional question involved.

Mr. HALFHILL: But if it is a question of statute do you think you could raise a constitutional question in the trial court?

Mr. PECK: Certainly; why not? But nobody would agree that an act should be merely decided unconstitutional by the common pleas court. Nobody would agree that that is conclusive. Nobody would be bound by it. It is only the decision of the supreme court in a case of that kind that is effective as to anybody but the parties in the particular case.

Mr. WINN: Suppose there is a suit pending in the common pleas court involving the constitutionality of some act of the legislature and the law is held to be constitutional and it is affirmed by the circuit court and that comes up to the supreme court; how many judges in the supreme court must agree to affirm the judgment of a circuit court?

Mr. PECK: You said that the law was held to be constitutional?

Mr. WINN: I mean unconstitutional. Suppose the law is held unconstitutional in the common pleas court and affirmed by the circuit court and taken to the supreme court; how many judges of the supreme court must agree to affirm that case?

Mr. PECK: All of them under this, five-sixths under the Taggart proposal. This last brief of this paper includes some of the Taggart proposition and several of the minor amendments. It includes the Halfhill amendment about holding a court in each county and the amendment of Mr. Jones and one or two others suggested by Judge Worthington. It will be offered when the opportunity comes as a substitute for all.

Mr. KING: *It is rather late to start a discussion on a new subject, but I fear your answer to the gentleman from Defiance was not in accordance with anything in either of those proposals. Is it possible that if a law has been held unconstitutional and the rights of the parties determined by the court of appeals and then the case is taken to the supreme court and all but one of the judges there are for affirming that judgment, simply because one of the supreme court judges does not concur in the opinion that affirms the case—in other words, that it requires the entire supreme court, under circumstances like this, to declare a law unconstitutional?

Mr. PECK: I don't quite understand you.

Mr. KING: I will put that question in another form. Suppose five judges of the supreme court vote to reverse a judgment of the circuit court on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the law and one of the supreme court judges votes to affirm; does not that judgment stand reversed?

Mr. PECK: No; I don't think so.

Mr. ANDERSON: Not as they have it now.

Mr. KING: There is something wrong about this proposal. There is apparently a contradiction and it should be straightened out. It says that no law shall be declared unconstitutional except by the unanimous supreme court. Take the case I supposed, that the unconstitutionality of a law has been unanimously declared by the circuit court; the case is appealed and five out of the six of the supreme court are of the same opinion that the judges of the circuit court were and they want to affirm the case, but the case involves the declaring of a statute unconstitutional, and therefore, under this, it would take the entire supreme court to declare that statute unconstitutional, and as there is one of the supreme court judges who thinks it constitutional he would reverse the case apparently. That is the same question that the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES] asked the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], and which the gentleman from Mahoning did not answer because he started with a reversal of this proposition and he continued on that way. He started with the judgment of the constitutionality of the law and it was affirmed in the supreme court by a divided court, three to three, but what happens where there is a decision of the unconstitutionality of the law below and the matter is appealed to the supreme court? Do you have to have a unanimous judgment of the supreme court to declare that statute unconstitutional?

Mr. PECK: Three to three could not declare it unconstitutional.

Mr. WINN: But under this wouldn't the same result be arrived at if only one thought it was unconstitutional? You require all of them to unite in an opinion as to the unconstitutionality before it can be declared unconstitutional, so if only one out of the six would think it was constitutional, that one would control the other five.

Mr. PECK: I am not sure whether you are right about that or not. I can not answer right now. We will look into it.

The great thing that we are after is having the court of appeals a court of final jurisdiction in all ordinary cases. I think that is the thing that practically everybody agrees upon.

As soon as there is an opportunity afforded I will offer the amended proposition. Then we can put in our motions to strike out or alter any part of it, get it in shape, have only a few minutes debate on each proposition and get to a vote.

Mr. DOTY: It now being 3:45 I call attention to the special order. I have a motion I desire the secretary to read in connection with that special order.

The motion was read as follows:

One. That there be no further debate until one or more pending amendments are disposed of;

Two. That debate upon any amendment that may be offered after the disposition of pending amendments be limited to three minutes for any member;

Three. That the provision of paragraph two hereof apply to any amendment offered to any substitute now pending;

Four. That the previous question shall be considered as ordered at 5:30 o'clock p. m. of this date, unless the proposal shall have been disposed of before that time.

Mr. DOTY: I have had a number of these struck off and distributed around, and yet there seems to be some question about what we propose to do. It is simply providing for a consideration of the program for the disposal of amendments so we can get through.

Mr. RILEY: The Taggart proposal is the first in order, and it would not be possible to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. DOTY: Under this it will be. The condition is this: There are three amendments pending. The last one is by my colleague, Mr. Thomas. Now, for the purpose of illustration, assume that is voted down. Then the substitute of the member from Wayne [Mr. TAGGART] would be next to be voted on, and upon that there will be a three minutes' discussion allowed on amendments.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then what about Judge Peck's amendment that he is proposing to offer?

Mr. DOTY: That can be offered then.

Mr. RILEY: Is it important that we fix 5:30 for the previous question and thus cut off debate? Suppose considerable time is taken up on the Taggart and the Worthington amendments, Judge Peck's proposition may come almost at the time you fix for the previous question and it would be unfair to have that proposition come up and there be no opportunity for debate on it.

Mr. DOTY: If I may answer that, the vote may come before 5:30. If it does not and we see that we are not prepared to vote, it is entirely within the right of the Convention to make the time 5:35 or 6 or any other time, and we do it simply by a motion.

Mr. RILEY: I suppose your motion would have the right of compelling the previous question at 5:30?

Mr. DOTY: Unless we extended it, it would have that effect, but we can extend it any time before that by a simple motion.

Mr. NYE: It seems to me, this being one of the most important matters to come before the Convention, we ought not to adopt a hard and fast rule such as this. We ought to have opportunity for considering. We are fixing an hour to take a vote on this matter. I think we should go along as we are, and when the time is ripe for the previous question there will not be any difficulty in ordering it.

Mr. ANDERSON: If the Thomas amendment is voted down, as it will be, that will give Judge Peck an opportunity to offer his amended proposal. That will be satisfactory to everybody except in two or three regards, and then we can offer amendments to those particular points. It seems to me we can get through with it in an hour.

Mr. HOSKINS: I beg to suggest that it is not probable that any compromise or substitute that is offered by Judge Peck will be satisfactory to everybody. Judge Taggart has an amendment in here that has attracted a good deal of favorable attention. Some of us have amendments which we desire to offer to Judge Taggart's proposal, and I object to any preliminary arrangement that is going to railroad this thing in a certain direction. Let us have a fair consideration of Judge Taggart's substitute and a discussion under the three-minute rule of any amendment offered to that. If any amendment is offered that is not satisfactory, or if the substitute is not satisfactory, we will vote it down and get to something else. This is too important a matter to fix an absolute time at which to vote on all propositions. I move to strike out paragraph 4 of this motion.

Mr. DOTY: I do not suppose the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] is accusing me of any attempt to railroad anything through.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am not, but I don't like the idea embraced in that whole motion.

Mr. DOTY: The idea is simply to get some program to facilitate matters. Section 4, which the gentleman wants stricken out, reads "that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at 5:30 o'clock of this date, unless the proposal shall have been disposed of before that time."

Mr. FESS: We fixed the time to vote at 2 o'clock. When that was done it was thought that we would be ready to vote at that time. That time has been extended and now it is thought to extend it to 5:30. I agree with the member from Auglaize that there will be no desire to pass any parliamentary plan by which anybody's amendment shall be pigeonholed, and I am sure there is no desire on the part of anybody to do that. It seems to me, however, that we are about as ready to vote intelligently upon all amendments before the body as we shall ever be. I think the member from Auglaize will accept the amendment that is to be offered by Judge Peck with perhaps one or two exceptions. I think the Convention will do it. It is not for the purpose of shutting off anybody that this motion is made, but simply to get to a vote. We ordered the vote at 2 o'clock and now we have extended it to 5:30; and if we want to continue it at that time we can do so.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have no objection to going to a vote and voting these propositions through as fast as we can under the three-minute rule, but I do object to fixing an absolute time when everything is shut off. I am not willing to accept Judge Peck's proposal if I can get some things contained in Judge Taggart's proposal.

Mr. PECK: Indicate what there is in Judge Taggart's proposition that you have particularly in mind.

Mr. HOSKINS: There are several things.

Mr. PECK: Indicate what they are.

Mr. HOSKINS: His provision on the jurisdiction of the supreme court.

Mr. PECK: About what?

Mr. HOSKINS: I want a test vote on that.

Mr. ANDERSON: Indicate what you mean by jurisdiction of the supreme court in the Taggart amendment.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have an amendment to offer on that proposition.

Mr. ANDERSON: What about, the jurisdiction?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I suggest, as it seems to be the universal desire that there be no effort to prevent a consideration of all amendments, that the simplest plan would be to accept the elimination process and then we can reach the previous question by 5:30, or we may possibly order it earlier. The limit of debate is practically agreed upon, and that would remove any feeling that there is an intention to railroad any amendment, no matter whose it may be.

Mr. DOTY: I think it is very much better for the Convention if it desires, to vote in or out certain things than for gentlemen to agree on the changes that they want.

Mr. WINN: Mr President and Gentlemen: I want a moment's time. I have not taken any on this debate. I hope this amendment offered by the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] will prevail. I say that because of the peculiar condition of this proposition. There is the Peck proposal and you will recall that there are two entire substitutes. It is already manifest that a good many amendments will be offered. I have four or five of my own that are being written with reference to the Peck proposal. They will fit in the Peck proposal, but not in the others, and I expect that will apply to other amendments that are ready to be offered. It is suggested by the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], and concurred in by the member from Greene [Mr. FESS], that the author of this proposal has something to offer as a substitute that is agreeable to everybody. Of course, that may be so and I hope it is.

Mr. PECK: It does not differ much.

Mr. WINN: Then it is a violent assumption on the part of the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] that with a few slight amendments it would be agreed to by everybody here. So we should limit debate to three minutes on the amendment offered by the delegate from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS], and then, when that is voted down, or when it prevails, we can go on with another one. And in that way we will finally reach a vote before the adjournment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion as amended was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] and the secretary will read that amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the words "adopted by the general assembly" in line 25; also the words "except by the concurrence of the five judges of the supreme court."

Place a period after the word "court" in line 26.

Mr. CASSIDY: I move to lay that amendment on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. PECK: I offer a substitute for the pending proposal and the two substitutes.

The substitute was read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause in the pending proposal and all pending amendments and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the state is vested in a supreme court, courts of appeals, courts of common pleas, courts of probate, and such other courts inferior to the courts of appeals as may from time to time be established by law.

Change in Judicial System.

SECTION 2. The supreme court shall, until otherwise provided by law, consist of six judges, and the judges now in office in that court shall continue therein until the end of the terms for which they were respectively elected, unless they are removed, die or resign. A majority of the supreme court shall be necessary to constitute a quorum or pronounce a decision, except as herein-after provided. It shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition, procedendo and appellate jurisdiction in all cases involving questions arising under the constitution of the United States or of this state and in cases of felony on leave first obtained, also in cases which originated in the courts of appeals and such revisory jurisdiction of the proceedings of administrative officers as may be conferred by law. It shall hold at least one term in each year at the seat of government, and such other terms, there or elsewhere, as may be provided by law. The judges of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of the state at large for such terms, not less than six years, and they shall be elected, and their official term shall begin, at such time as may now or hereafter be fixed by law.

Whenever the judges of the supreme court shall be equally divided in opinion as to the merits of any case before them and are unable for that reason to agree upon a judgment that fact shall be entered upon the record and such entry shall be held to constitute an affirmance of the judgment of the court below.

No statute shall be held unconstitutional and void by any proceedings in this court except by the concurrence of five of the judges of the supreme court.

In case of public or great general interest the supreme court may, within such limitation of time as may be prescribed by law, direct the court of appeals to certify its record to the supreme court and may review and affirm, modify or reverse the judgment of the court of appeals.

SECTION 6. The state shall, until otherwise provided by law, be divided into appellate districts of compact territory and divided by county lines in each of which there shall be a court of appeals consisting of three judges. The judges of the circuit courts now residing in their respective districts shall continue to be judges of the respective courts of appeals in such districts and perform the duties thereof until the expiration of their respective terms of office. Vacancies caused by the expirations of the terms of office of the judges of the courts of appeals shall be filled by the electors of the appellate districts respectively in which such vacancies shall arise and the same number shall be elected in each district. Laws may be enacted to prescribe the time and mode of such election and to alter the number of districts or the boundaries thereof, but no such change shall abridge the term of any judge then in office. The court of appeals shall hold at least one term annually in each county and such other terms at a county seat in the district, as the judges may determine upon, and the county commissioners of any county in which the court of appeals shall hold sessions shall make proper and convenient provisions for the holding of such courts by its judges and officers. Each judge shall be competent to exercise his judicial powers in any district of the state.

The respective courts of appeals shall continue the work of the circuit court and all pending cases and proceedings in the circuit courts shall proceed to judgment and be determined by the courts of appeals, subject to the provisions hereof, and the existence of the circuit court shall be merged into and its work continued by the courts of appeals.

The courts of appeals shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus prohibition and procedendo and such other appellate jurisdiction to review, affirm, modify, or reverse the judgments of the courts of common pleas and superior courts within the district as may be provided by law, and judgments of said courts of appeal shall be final in all cases, except such as involve questions arising under the constitution of this state, or the United States, or cases of felony, or cases of which it has original jurisdiction, or cases of public or great general interest in which the supreme court may direct the court of appeals to certify its record to that court. No judgment of the court of common pleas and superior courts shall be reversed except by the concurrence of all the judges of the court of appeals on the weight of the evidence and by a majority of such court of appeals upon other questions and whenever the judges of a court of appeals find that a judgment upon which they have agreed is in conflict with a judgment pronounced upon the same question by any other court of appeals of the state, the judges shall certify the record of the case to the supreme court for review and final determination.

The decisions in all cases in the supreme court and courts of appeals shall be reported, together with the reasons therefor.

Mr. WINN: I do not believe we should vote on this proposition until it has been printed. If I heard this correctly and if I understood the reading there are no districts provided for the courts of appeals and there is to be one term in each district each year, and that notwithstanding there are no particular districts.

Mr. PECK: It says one in each county.

Mr. WINN: It says one term in each county each year and then there shall be many more terms in some of the county seats. It seems to me that the whole thing is considerably uncertain, and I therefore move that the further consideration be postponed until tomorrow at ten o'clock and also that this be printed and that it be placed at the head of the calendar for that hour.

Mr. DOTY: I move to amend the motion by striking out the period and adding "and the limitation regarding debates adopted today shall be continued tomorrow."

The amendment was accepted by the maker of the motion and the motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I desire to make a report from the committee on Rules on a resolution introduced some time ago relative to a matter of some importance.

Resolutions Relative to Adjournment—Motions and Resolutions, Etc.

The PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the report can be made.

The report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Rules, to which was referred Resolution No. 89—Mr. Doty, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its adoption.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That any resolution providing for sine die adjournment of this Convention shall require for its adoption a vote of not less than a majority of all the members elected to the Convention.

Mr. DOTY: This resolution is adopting a rule of the Convention and it requires a ye and nay vote.

The PRESIDENT: The president does not know of any reason why this should require a ye and nay vote.

Mr. DOTY: Then I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 107, nays none.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ANTRIM: I offer a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 100:

Resolved, That the following bills which have been filed with the secretary of this Convention be allowed and ordered paid:

Anna L. Bower, to extra compensation for reporting sessions of the convention from January 9 to February 6, inclusive, fifteen days, $75 00

Minnie Rodgers, to extra compensation for reporting sessions of the Convention from January 9 to February 6, inclusive, fifteen days, $75.00

On motion of Mr. Antrim the resolution was referred to the committee on Claims against the Convention.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. Hoskins submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Corporations other than Municipal, to which was referred Proposal No. 72—Mr. Stokes, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 2. Corporations may be formed under general laws; but all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed.

Corporations may be classified and there may be conferred upon proper boards, commissions or officers, such supervisory and regulatory powers over their organization, business and issue and sale of stock and securities, and over the business and sale of the stock and securities of foreign corporations in this state, as may be prescribed by law.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Doty the proposal, as amended, was ordered printed.

Mr. Hoskins submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Corporations other than Municipal, to which was referred Proposal No. 127—Mr. King, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Hoskins submitted the following report:

consideration, reports it back, and recommends that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Stilwell submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Labor, to which was referred Proposal No. 298—Mr. Hoffman, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its indefinite postponement.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Johnson, of Williams, submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Legislative and Executive Departments, to which was referred Proposal No. 164—Mr. Thomas, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its indefinite postponement.

Mr. Thomas submitted the following report:

The minority of the standing committee on Legislative and Executive Departments, to which was referred Proposal No. 164—Mr. Thomas, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 and re-number the succeeding sections.

HARRY D. THOMAS.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the minority report.

Mr. WINN: I move to lay that on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on laying the minority report on the table.

Mr. THOMAS: A point of order. I had the floor and I had not yielded.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken; the president was in error.

Mr. THOMAS: If you will look at Proposal No. 164 you will see it is a proposal similar to the one that Mr. Elson offered providing for one legislative body.

Sections 5, 6 and 7 contain the initiative and referendum and the minority report strikes these sections out. The other sections are amended to provide for one legislative body. That this matter is getting some consideration other than by the delegates in this Convention, and that it is something that not only is being considered in this state but in other states, is evidenced by the fact that since the discussion of this matter has been taken up in the daily papers I have had letters from nearly every state in the Union and from men in different walks of life and from different newspapers commenting on the subject in favor of one legislative body. I have been here at the sessions of the legislature for the past four or five years, and in all these years my experience proves to me that one legislative body can do the work as successfully as two, and better, in my opinion, because it costs less to the state. Those of you who are acquainted with legislative matters know that important measures are considered before one house. The consideration there determines largely whether it should be adopted or not. Take our women's fifty-four hour law at the last session. That matter was discussed in the senate and whatever amendments or changes were made were made in the senate, and they were agreed to almost without any change whatever in the house. The workmen's compensation law, the Green bill, passed the house and was adopted by the senate with the change of but few words. It has been the general experience that one house does the work on important measures. Just to show to what extent this matter is being taken up by the public I want to read a comment from the Springfield Republican, Springfield, Massachusetts:

The Ohio Constitutional Convention, which convened last week at Columbus, is the fourth one in the state's history. A radical movement among the voters is responsible for it and apparently there is a majority of radicals in control. Innovations too numerous or too extreme, however, would cause a reaction among the voters when the amended or revised constitution was sent to them for approval, and this danger will tend to modify the aspirations of too zealous reformers. The initiative, referendum, recall, short ballot, woman suffrage and single tax are among the items on the radical program, while the liquor question may assume prominence in the Convention's work. It is somewhat surprising that American radicals do not take advantage of such opportunities to establish the state legislatures on a single chamber basis, but not even in Oregon, California or Arizona, not to mention Ohio, has an effort been made to effect this change. In municipal government the old bicameral legislative assembly has had its day; that it is really necessary to state governments may be disputed. Indeed, it may be argued that the bicameral system is somewhat or even largely responsible for the inefficiency and corruption of many states.

Now, here is something from the Pittsburg Sunday Post. It ridicules the idea of bicameral legislation:

Ohio is now having a constitutional convention on her hands, and if she wants to do something novel, and at the same time something that will commend itself to a large number of thinking people, she will provide for a single instead of a double-barreled legislature. There is no more sense in having two legislative bodies to do the same thing than there would be to have two executives to decide whether they would sign the bills.

Our double-headed system was borrowed from England, where one body was for the high and well-born and the other for the common people. In this country, however, we are not supposed to have any classes and to call the senate a higher body is an insult to our citizens, for we are all supposed to stand on an equality. If our senates are composed of wiser and better men than the lower houses, as they are falsely called, then why not have two senates, for the wisest and best are none too wise or too good. If they are not superior, then why not abolish them?

If the two bodies agree, one is sufficient, and if they disagree then both might as well be abolished. They tell us that one serves as a check on the other; but oftener than otherwise the check is placed just where the people do not want it and where they would not have it if they had a single legislature. Half the time the two houses are in a deadlock and can do nothing.

Besides, it enables members to shift the responsibility for their neglect of duty. As an illustration: In a Western Pennsylvania county a few years ago a certain statesman, now in congress, wanted to go to the assembly. He told the farmers if they would elect him he would see that a fence law was passed, compelling railroads to fence their lines. They took him at his word and elected him. The bill passed the house, but he took good care to see that it was killed in the senate.

At the next election he asked to be sent to the senate on the ground that he had the fence bill pass the house, and if in the senate he would have it passed in that body. He was elected and the bill passed the senate, but was killed in the house.

If a single body can make a constitution, the fundamental law of the state, why cannot a single body legislate under that constitution by which it is to be guided? Ben Franklin was about as level-headed as any man who has had anything to do with our government, and he ridiculed the idea of having a bicameral legislature.

It appears to me that argument is sufficient to convince most any man that the time has arrived in Ohio when, instead of following other states in progressive legislation, we might try to start something new ourselves. Here is an opportunity for starting something new and progressive.

Mr. WINN: I move that the minority report be laid on the table.

Mr. THOMAS: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 62, nays 38, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the minority report was laid on the table and the report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. Leete submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Public Works, to which was referred Proposal No. 313—Mr. Leete, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its passage.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

REPORTS OF SELECT COMMITTEES.

The historian and reference librarian, to whom was referred Resolution No. 83—Mr. Dunn, begs leave to submit the following report:

The Ohio News Bureau Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, submits the following proposition to the Fourth Constitutional Convention of Ohio:

It will preserve and compile in volumes, newspaper records containing all the leading editorials and all important items appearing in the Ohio papers and in all the leading papers of the United States. This record will be arranged chronologically with the date of publication and the name of the paper stamped on each item; this record to begin on January 1, 1912, and continue until thirty days after the final adjournment of the Convention. This arrangement may be continued by vote of the Convention before final adjournment from thirty days after the adjournment of the Convention, so as to cover the period between its adjournment and its special election at which the constitution and the amendments thereto shall be submitted. Said clippings or records shall be furnished in volumes of 125 sheets each, making a total of 500 pages to the volume, which shall be bound in loose-leaf ledger style, and in as many volumes as may complete the work. For this work, labor and material up to thirty days after the final adjournment of the Convention, this body shall pay the Ohio News Bureau Co. of Cleveland, Ohio, the sum of fifty ($50.00) dollars per month, beginning January 1, 1912; and for thirty days after the adjournment of the Convention. The latter may continue the arrangement until ten days after the election at which the proposed constitution and proposals submitted therewith shall be held, at the same figures. The volumes shall be furnished from time to time as completed, and the work shall be under the general direction of the historian and reference librarian as to the class of items preserved after the first volume is submitted. The Ohio News Bureau Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, shall also furnish under this proposition a suitable blank index for the entire number of volumes at the close of their publication.

Reports of Select Committees — Resolutions Relative to Adjournment.

The foregoing proposed contract between the Convention and the Ohio News Bureau Company of Cleveland, Ohio, is herewith submitted with the recommendation that it be approved.

NELSON W. EVANS,
Historian and Reference Librarian.

The report was received.

By unanimous consent Mr. Evans offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 101:

Resolved, by the Fourth Constitutional Convention of Ohio, That the report of the historian and reference librarian of this body, as to the proposed contract with the Ohio News Bureau Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, is hereby approved, and said historian and reference librarian is directed, on behalf of this Convention, to execute this contract.

The resolution was laid over under the rule.

By unanimous consent Mr. Peters offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 102:

Resolved, That when this Convention adjourns at the end of this week, that it be to meet on Tuesday morning, April 16, at 10 o'clock.

Mr. DOTY: What is the reason for that?

Mr. PETERS: That the members may attend the Jefferson banquet.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I didn't hear what the object of that resolution was.

The PRESIDENT: The president will state that the resolution introduced provides that there be no Monday night session next week and the purpose as stated is to give the members an opportunity of attending the Jefferson banquet Monday night. The question is on suspending the rules to consider the resolution.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The resolution goes over under the rule.

Resolution No. 90—Mr. Beatty, of Wood, relative to the adjournment of the Convention sine die, was then taken up and read as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention, when it adjourns on Friday, April 26, 1912, shall adjourn to Monday, May 6, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m. at which time the standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology shall report upon such matters as shall have been referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the calendar of business for May 6, 1912, and thereafter, shall consist only of proposals for third reading and questions appertaining thereto, and no other business shall be considered except that which shall pertain to the concluding work of the Convention.

Resolved, That this Convention shall adjourn sine die, at 12 o'clock noon, Saturday, May 11, 1912.

Mr. EVANS: I move to table that resolution.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: You cannot make the motion to table because I am on the floor.

We have a custom in the legislature of introducing a resolution some six weeks ahead of adjournment and working to that adjournment, and this was introduced with that in view. If we don't adopt some similar resolution to adjourn we will be here until Christmas. We have loitered away considerable time in the last two or three months. We are simply not working. Last Thursday I counted and there were only seventy-eight members in the Convention in the forenoon. A week before that we had only sixty-eight. We are not working as we should work. We need something to stimulate us, and I think this will be the proper stimulant.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you include yourself in that statement that we are not working properly?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Yes; I include all of us. We have been elected here to represent the people and we ought to represent them and we ought to work. I don't have any idea of trying to force an adjournment, but if we adopt a resolution of this character we will try to work up to it and if we can't get ready to adjourn by the time fixed in this resolution we can then fix the time farther ahead. If we keep going on the way we have and introducing new matter we will never get through. In thirty days from now we will have just as much work on the books as we have now and we will have just as much in sixty days. It is a never ceasing flow of new proposals.

Mr. ELSON: A point of order. How can all this debate go on when there was a motion to lay on the table?

The PRESIDENT: There was no motion to lay on the table. The gentleman who made the motion to lay on the table was not recognized. The gentleman from Wood [Mr. BEATTY] has the floor.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: As I have said before, I am willing to stay as long as anybody, but we ought to make some effort to get through. We ought to fix some time to adjourn and to work up to it, and if we are not ready to adjourn then we will postpone the time a little.

Mr. DOTY: The object is to set a time when we shall adjourn. We have plenty of work for the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology to work on, and, as the member said, if we set a time for adjournment and we are not quite ready then we can postpone the adjournment a few days longer.

I have seen the general assembly make all sorts of endeavors to adjourn. This plan is the one that has been found to work best in the general assembly.

We have adopted a resolution setting forth the manner of submitting our work to the people. It provides for a separate submission of a number of amendments to the people instead of the submission of a complete constitution. Having decided upon our plan and having gone through two-thirds of our work, so far as importance is concerned, there is no reason in the world why we cannot adjourn by the 26th of this month. The trouble is a number of you won't stay here and work. We all know that a number of fellows are going to duck out on Thursday and we ought to stay here and work six days in the week and complete our work on the 26th day of this month. It can be done if we will attend to business.

There is no trouble about adopting this resolution. We are not in any trouble like the house and the senate are when they adopt a resolution fixing adjournment. Then to change it both sides have to agree, but here there is no house at the other end. We can adopt this resolution and if we are not ready to adjourn at the time fixed, we can simply adopt another one or postpone the time set in this one.

Mr. LAMPSON: I am willing to adopt this resolution and try to work up to it and if we can't we will just simply postpone it.

Mr. KNIGHT: There are nineteen proposals that have been reported favorably by the committees. They are on the calendar, and there are at least two or three others extremely important and the twenty-sixth of April covers just eleven legislative days from now.

Mr. DOTY: Eleven possible legislative days?

Mr. KNIGHT: Eleven days under the rules.

Mr. DOTY: Well, the rules are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians; they can be changed.

Mr. ELSON: I don't think that we can possibly get through by that time.

Mr. DOTY: We can try.

Mr. ELSON: I am willing to support the motion and try to work up to that date, but I am not nearly so sanguine of being able to adjourn at that time as the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] seems to be.

We have been sent here to do a very important work and we should take time enough to do it right, and I don't think we can work six days a week. Most of us have some duties at home, and I don't think it is right to begin to work six days in the week right now, although I am willing to support this motion.

Mr. HALENKAMP: When April 26 comes and we find we have more proposals on the calendar than possibly we have now and that we can't get through, what will be the method of going on with our work? Will we have to reconsider the vote by which this resolution is adopted?

Mr. DOTY: Simply a resolution rescinding that specific date and setting some other date. It just takes a majority.

The resolution was adopted.

Resolution 91 — Mr. Rorick, was taken up.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter debate upon all questions shall be limited as follows:

Author of a proposal or chairman of the standing committee to which it was referred, thirty minutes upon the second reading of the proposal and five minutes upon any amendment thereto. Other members fifteen minutes upon the second reading of the proposal and five minutes upon any amendment thereto.

Upon resolutions upon questions of adoption, five minutes for any member.

Upon all debatable subsidiary motions five minutes for any member.

No member's time shall be extended except on two-thirds vote.

Provided, however, that this special rule shall not apply upon the second reading of any proposal reported to the Convention by the standing committees on Taxation and Municipal Government.

Mr. RORICK: I move that that be referred to the committee on Rules.

DELEGATES: No; consider it now.

The motion to refer was withdrawn and the resolution was adopted.

Resolution No. 94 — Mr. Knight, was then taken up and read as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary be authorized to send to public libraries and, on application, to other educational institutions in the state of Ohio, copies of the pamphlets and other printed matter issued by this Convention.

Mr. KNIGHT: As worded this resolution might include the bound volumes of the debates, and I therefore move to amend by inserting the words "except the debates and proceedings of the Convention."

The amendment was agreed to and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DOTY: Doesn't that require a roll call? It will involve an expenditure for postage.

Mr. KNIGHT: I don't think so. We haven't been considering things in that way.

Resolution No. 96 — Mr. Fess, was taken up and was read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee having supervision of the official reporter and reportorial staff of the Convention be authorized and directed to have the reports of the debates of the first fifteen days of the Convention, prior to the appointment of the official reporter, edited and put into proper form for preservation and publication at a cost not to exceed $125.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Greene is not present and probably the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] ought to explain that.

Mr. FESS: I am just called to the telephone and I will ask the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] to make an explanation while I answer the call.

Mr. KNIGHT: As the members of the Convention know, our official reporter was not appointed until fourteen days of the Convention had expired. Down to that time we had done the best we could under a special resolution by having the stenographers on the regular staff of the Convention detailed to take the debates. They have not undertaken and do not feel that they can undertake to put them in proper form to conform to the debates from the day the official reporter began his work. The amendments are not copied in and the roll calls are not designated, and as this is the first part of the debates that is to be printed it is necessary that they be put in form to correspond with the rest, and this is simply a motion to authorize the committee to expend that amount of money to have it done. I want to say that this was strictly at our solicitation and not at the request of Mr. Walker, who says that he does not care whether it is done or not, or by whom it is done. We want the thing in uniform shape and we prefer it to be done by the reporter, so that at the end of the Convention he can certify to the general correctness of the debates. The amendments and the resolutions are not put in. In other words, every page has to be read over with the journal and put in proper form and recopied.

Mr. STILWELL: Is not there some clerk of the Convention who can do that?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am informed that there is not, but if there is we are perfectly willing to have that clerk do it. So long as it is done the committee does not care how it is done. The committee, after looking over the situation, decided that the proper way to have it done would be to have the same official stenographer who has reported the debates do the work so that he will be in a position to certify as to the essential correctness of the work for those fourteen days.

Mr. FESS: Professor Knight has given exactly the situation. The only question is shall our record begin on the fifteenth day or shall it begin the first day. We want it to begin the first day and be uniform. If there is any way by which that can be done other than as provided in this resolution we are perfectly willing to pursue the other way, but we do not know of any other.

Mr. DOTY: In answer to the question of Mr. Stilwell whether some other clerk could do the work, the clerks of the Convention already have their hands full. Then this is a matter that cannot be done by anybody. I doubt if there is a member in the secretary's office who could do this work properly except the secretary, and that is not reflecting on the ability of any one there, but the secretary hasn't the time. He is charged with important duties and he has to attend to them and he cannot take the time to attend to this.

Mr. STILWELL: The only objection I have is to the matter of expense. Here we have two complete reports, one by the stenographers, which the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] informs us has to be written all over again, and we have the journal and the work is to make these two uniform. I don't see why it is worth $125 for fifteen days' work. That amounts to $8 a day for simply joining the two in proper form. I am opposed to the motion in the present form.

Mr. FESS: Can the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. STILWELL] suggest any other way by which it can be done so that we will have a proper record?

Mr. STILWELL: It is certain that the present stenographer cannot authenticate the correctness of something done before he came here. He didn't take charge until the fifteenth day. Anybody else could do the work just as well as the stenographer can. I believe the entire matter ought to be referred to the secretary with instructions to him to have this work done, and I offer that as an amendment to the present pending motion.

The amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga was put in writing and was read as follows:

That the secretary of the Convention shall be authorized and directed to have the reports of the debates of the first fifteen days of the Convention, prior to the appointment of the official reporter, edited and put into proper form for preservation and publication.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It is not fair to charge the secretary with this increased duty. He has already voluntarily agreed to assume duties that could not properly be considered his, and it is absolutely out of the question to suppose that an unskilled person can take the journal and the debates in the form they are and put them into proper form any more than you could expect an amateur artist to finish up a painting begun by a master. We have been told that the official reporter does not desire to do this work, but will do it if the committee wants him to do it, and the only thing for the Convention to do is to take advantage of his kindness and let the work be put in proper shape.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the resolution and on that the secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 78, nays 22, as follows:

The resolution was adopted.

Resolution 97 — Mr. Bowdle, was then taken up and was read as follows:

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That Hon. William H. Lewis, assistant attorney general of the United States, is hereby extended an invitation to address the Convention before adjournment in behalf of the colored citizens of the state of Ohio.

Mr. BOWDLE: I shall take your time for just a moment. I introduced that resolution in the utmost possible seriousness. It is a difficult thing in these days of conspiring politics for people to attribute anything like disinterested motives to a person in introducing a resolution like this. However, I beg leave to say that in this instance while the accusation is ordinarily true, my introduction of this resolution was a very disinterested one. We have heard in this Convention by invitation from a variety of prominent men, and cudgel my brain as best I can I cannot think of one single novel or illuminating thing that fell from the lips of any man who has had the honor of occupying that rostrum.

Mr. DOTY: Agreed.

Resolution Relative to Invitation to William H. Lewis.

Mr. BOWDLE: Therefore I voted against any of them coming, but it seems to me that an exception might be made in the case of this distinguished colored man, whose name is mentioned in this resolution. We have here among us a race of people which has done as much work as any race of men on the edifice of our material civilization, a race of men which has received but little recognition. They are unctiously talked to in all political campaigns, but when the campaign is over the best reward they get is janitorships, bootblackships, and some other menial ships not worth talking about. And meanwhile, between campaigns, we exercise the right of suspending all the criminal laws applicable to ourselves by hanging them and by occasionally burning them. It seems to me, therefore, that it is a proper thing, as the race is not represented on the floor of this Convention, that we step aside for a moment and spend a half hour listening to one of the most distinguished representatives of the colored race.

Mr. ELSON: May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BOWDLE: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: How many colored voters are there in your district?

Mr. BOWDLE: About six thousand in the first congressional district. I see the purpose of that question, but I should like to say for the benefit of the member from Athens [Mr. ELSON] that I have in my hand a watch which is sixty-five years old. It is a watch that is intimately connected with the anti-slave movement in this country. I know we have reached the time in the history of the United States when pretty near everybody will claim the honor of having had a relative on the underground railway, but most people who tell you that they were there were there as brakemen. This watch comes to me from my grandfather, Daniel Bowdle, who himself was an engineer on the underground railway, with Achilles Pugh, of Cincinnati, another leader in the movement, who in his time had his entire plant destroyed by some white gentlemen from Covington, whereupon my grandfather loaned him enough money to equip his press and get new type and the result was that he returned the loan to my grandfather plus the watch which I hold in my hand. Therefore, I think it is not amiss for me to say that I have inherited some interest in the colored race, which is now being so terribly discriminated against in America. I was reading last night in Ben Butler's book about the fight at Big Bethel. Ben Butler said that the most conspicuous service of the war was rendered by colored men; that after the fight at Big Bethel, on the morning after, when he was riding his horse among the corpses, he was struck with the astounding number of black men who were dead on the field, and that brought about a strong feeling for the colored man and he there made up his mind that among the finest soldiers in the Civil War, were the colored men.

This letter concerning the matter says:

Mr. Lewis is a graduate of Harvard and former coach on the Harvard eleven. He is a resident of Boston and was formerly United States district attorney for Boston until recently appointed assistant attorney general of the United States.

I sincerely trust the friends of the colored race among the Constitutional Convention will cooperate and grant our only request in behalf of four hundred thousand colored citizens of Ohio.

Grant me permission further to state in behalf of the negro press of Ohio and the United States in the passing of the resolution the Ohio Constitutional Convention will have done more towards encouraging the colored citizens of Ohio than all the acts of lynch law and mob rule can accomplish from now to eternity. Mr. Lewis' talk will be along the lines of racial development and of great value to the colored citizens, the Constitutional Convention and the press and fellow white citizens.

I therefore bespeak for Mr. Lewis a hearing.

Mr. DWYER: What office are you a candidate for?

Mr. PECK: I move that the resolution be tabled.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESS: After hearing the eloquent speech of Mr. Bowdle I wish you would withdraw the resolution.

Mr. PECK: I move that we adjourn until ten o'clock in the morning.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is to lay the resolution on the table and on that the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 42, nays 56, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Baum,	Fluke,	Moore,

So the motion to table was lost.

Mr. DOTY: I move to amend the resolution as follows:

Strike out the words "before adjournment" and insert "on Wednesday evening, April 17, 1912."

Resolution Relative to Invitation to William H. Lewis.

By this amendment we arrange for an evening hearing and it will not break into any of our sessions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELSON: I cannot support this resolution. We haven't invited anybody to come to this Convention and speak as a democrat or as a republican or as a white man. We have invited a few very prominent American citizens because we wanted to hear from them and because we thought they could instruct us some, but we did it for a perfectly good purpose and we must draw the line somewhere.

Mr. NORRIS: I understand you to say that we haven't invited anybody here as a democrat or as a republican or as a white man. We are not inviting this man here because he is a white man.

Mr. ELSON: No; we are inviting him because he is a colored man. He is not a very prominent citizen and he is not a man of national reputation. I don't know what good he can do this Convention and why we should invite him here merely to compliment a certain class of citizens is something I cannot understand. If the gentleman will change the name to "Booker Washington" I will vote for it. Booker Washington is a national character and I will vote for him to be invited any time, although we have very little time to fool away on those things. However, while I cannot support this resolution I will say that were I a colored man and lived in the sixth congressional district I would vote for Mr. Bowdle and I think I would as a white man.

Mr. FESS: I voted to table this motion because I thought we had voted down invitations to other people, and with the time fixed for adjournment we would need every minute of our time. That is the only reason I voted against it. I voted with my eyes open, but since the motion has been fixed so that it will not take a particle of time from our sessions, but will be in the evening, I will vote for it.

The resolution was adopted.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Weybrecht and Mr. Worthington.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I move to recess until 7:30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. DOTY: I move to adjourn until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a. m.

The motion was carried and the Convention adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a. m.

FIFTY-FOURTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, April 10, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. Clarence A. Hill, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday, the legislative day of April 2, was read and approved.

Mr. HALFHILL: I desire to offer an amendment to paragraph 2 of the special rule adopted April 9, 1912. I move that that paragraph be rescinded and the debate be limited to ten minutes on any amendment offered to the amended substitute Proposal No. 184 by Mr. Peck.

The purpose is to change the rule limiting the debate on the proposal to three minutes.

Mr. DOTY: That was changed yesterday.

Mr. HALFHILL: Very well, then. It is manifest on the examination of this proposal here that this is a very important matter and can not be considered, so far as any amendments are concerned, in three minutes. I call attention to the importance of this from the fact that several gentlemen have told me of amendments that they want to offer. Some of them, with which I am familiar, I desire to support. At lines 6 and 9 the provision for six judges is affected by one of the amendments, as to whether there will be five or seven, and if that is adopted it will do away with lines 24 to 27, inclusive, in this proposal, which provide that where the supreme court is equally divided in opinion that fact shall be entered upon the records, etc. That would be a most unsatisfactory situation. There may be some other changes that may be necessary—for instance, this clause of the proposition allowing legislative powers to add additional jurisdiction to the supreme court. There may be some question on that. I am not familiar with that, but it looks to me as though this might be a dangerous thing. Amendments to that should and doubtless will be offered. Of course, that will be objected to by the chairman of the committee, as indicated yesterday, and that will provoke discussion.

Mr. PECK: That opens the door to go back to the old system, and we do not want that door opened.

Mr. HALFHILL: It is an open question, however, and we desire to have that amendment discussed.

Mr. PECK: Your motion is to make it ten minutes instead of three. There is no objection to it. The motion will be adopted.

Mr. DOTY: You might have indicated that a moment ago.

The amendment was reduced to writing and was read as follows:

That paragraph 2 of the special rule adopted April 9, 1912, be rescinded and that debate be limited to ten minutes on any amendment offered to the amended and substitute Proposal No. 184 by Mr. Peck.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DWYER: I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. DOTY: I call for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As one of those who voted not to put the Bowdle resolution on the table and as one of those who subsequently voted to invite the Hon. W. H. Lewis to address us I now move to reconsider the vote by which that invitation was extended, and it is done not through any discourtesy to Mr. Lewis, whom all of us would be glad to hear, and to whose race all of us would be glad to pay honor; but out of justice to ourselves and with the limited time at our disposal, I think we ought to reconsider the vote. The action of the Convention to adjourn on April 26, has made it absolutely necessary that we should occupy every minute of time at our disposal. We will have to hold not only day sessions but evening sessions, and that would probably break into one of the evening sessions. Even if it does not, it is an enormous burden on us to sit here all morning and frequently late in the afternoon and then have to come back two hours in the evening to listen to a discussion, no matter how interesting or how important, and I trust as we have lost a great deal of time that this motion will be reconsidered.

Mr. DWYER: I ask unanimous consent to offer a proposal and I ask that it be referred to the Judiciary committee.

Mr. STILWELL: I move that the motion of the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] be laid upon the table.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution extending this invitation was carried.

Mr. BOWDLE: I appreciate the spirit in which Mr. Harris makes the motion. It is rather curious that we should become so exceedingly chary of the time of the Convention at this particular point. Our economy in the matter of time is a good deal like the economy of most people, people become economical of their money when there is not a nickel in the house. We are approaching the end of our Convention, and it seems to me the hour assigned for this gentleman to speak, being in the evening, will not impinge upon the deep meditations of the entire Convention, and I therefore oppose the reconsideration.

Mr. ELSON: We have had a little byplay. Now what is the use of carrying it further? The candidates have all gone on record. We can not afford to carry this thing any further. People say, "What is the use of inviting a man just because he is colored?" He is not a national character at all. We have had our fun out of it and now let us drop it. I am sure it will not be appreciated by the people of the state if we carry the thing out. I say by all means let us reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I now move that the motion be referred to the committee on Rules.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DWYER: I ask unanimous consent to offer a proposal and ask that it be referred to the committee on Judiciary.

Introduction of Proposal—Change in Judicial System.

The PRESIDENT: Does anybody object?

Mr. DOTY: I object. Everyone understands this is no reflection upon the member from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER], but I desire to say if you want to make haste the way to do it is in regular order and not to be breaking in on the regular order by interruptions. We have a big day before us, and it will take all day to do the threshing out of this particular proposal.

Mr. DWYER: You are taking more time talking to the Convention about it than it would take to get my proposal introduced and referred. Now what is before the Convention?

Mr. DOTY: I hope nothing.

Mr. DWYER: Then sit down.

Mr. STOKES: To allow the gentleman from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER] to introduce his proposal I ask unanimous consent that the proposal may be introduced at this time.

Mr. DOTY: I object.

The PRESIDENT: Unanimous consent is not given.

Mr. WINN: I move that the further consideration of Proposal No. 184 be postponed for one minute.

The PRESIDENT: That motion is not in order.

Mr. STOKES: I move that the rules be suspended and the delegate from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER] be allowed to introduce his proposal.

The motion was carried.

The following proposal was introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 330—Mr. Dwyer: To submit an amendment to article IV, of the constitution—Relative to dividing the state into appellate court districts.

Mr. DWYER: I move that that be referred to the committee on Judiciary.

Mr. DOTY: I object.

Mr. STOKES: I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution be referred to the Judiciary committee.

Mr. DOTY: Does the member from Montgomery [Mr. DWYER] desire to have his proposal printed?

Mr. DWYER: I don't care.

Mr. DOTY: If you desire to have it printed I want to inform you it will not be printed if this motion carries.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the substitute amendment offered by the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. PECK].

Mr. PECK: There are one or two matters omitted in drafting this paper, correction of which ought to be made, and there is one correction to which attention was called by the delegate from Erie yesterday. I propose at the beginning of line 28 to insert these words:

In any case wherein the judgment of the court of appeals is reversed, statutes shall not be held unconstitutional and void except by the concurrence of all the judges of the supreme court.

That will leave it this way: If the supreme court affirms the judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional, it is necessary to have only a majority of the supreme court to affirm that judgment.

Mr. TALLMAN: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. TALLMAN: Is any amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT: No.

Mr. PECK: This is a correction I am offering to a substitute I myself offered.

Mr. TALLMAN: I insist upon my point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule on the point. If the Convention agrees to accept these corrections they can be considered.

Mr. HOSKINS: I object to a vital point being inserted as a correction. It should be put on the same plane as an amendment.

Mr. TALLMAN: I insist that anything in the way of a change is an amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] simply notifies the Convention that it is his intention to offer this amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: A word on the point of order. It seems very clear that Judge Peck, having offered the amendment, is entitled to offer it in any form he desires. It is his own amendment, no step has been taken in regard to it and if he wants to vitally change it he should be permitted to do it. He is not seeking to amend anything. He is simply endeavoring to get an amendment, that he himself offered, in the shape he wishes it.

Mr. PECK: There is another place where three lines were left out in copying and I want to put them back.

Mr. HOSKINS: With all due respect to the chairman of the Judiciary committee, the change the gentleman has just offered is an amendment. It can not come under any other head, and I insist that it come regularly.

Mr. PECK: I passed that matter. It is another matter altogether in another place that I am referring to. What I refer to now is in line 36, and I want to insert three lines that were left out there.

Mr. LAMPSON: Are the lines that you wish to put in in the original amendment or in the copy that was offered? If they were simply left out in printing they are in the proposal.

Mr. PECK: They were left out in copying, not in printing. I will give them to you and you will see what they are. Without them the proposal would be lame. After the first word "judges" in line 36 these words should be inserted: "And until altered by statute, the circuit in which circuit courts are now held will constitute the appellate districts."

Those words were in all the proposals and in the hurry they were not copied, and I overlooked the fact that those lines were not in the proposal that I offered as a substitute yesterday. Without them the proposal is incomplete.

Mr. KING: I would like to have the lines read as they would read with this correction made.

The PRESIDENT: The president wishes to rule upon this point of order. The president understands these are not in the nature of corrections, that they are the matters that in the hurry of preparing the proposal were omitted, and the only way that these matters can come up now is after the adoption of the substitute, so as to clear the way for further amendments, and the matter shall be offered as amended.

Mr. PECK: I give notice that I want to offer these when the substitute is adopted.

Mr. FESS: I think we should vote on this substitute now and then we can offer amendments.

Change in Judicial System.

A vote being taken the substitute of the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: Now the matter is open to amendment and the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] offers the following amendment:

Amend Proposal No. 184 as follows: At the beginning of line 28 insert: "In any case wherein the judgment of the court of appeals is reversed."

In lines 28 and 29, strike out "by any proceedings in this court."

In line 29, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "all."

In line 28, change the capital "N" to a small "n."

Mr. PECK: The members want to be heard on each of these proposed changes. We had better stop right there at present and we had better take each one separately.

Mr. STEVENS: That first amendment is not exactly in form. It reads in any case wherein the judgment of "the court of appeals is reversed." Should not that be in any case where the judgment of "a court of appeals is reversed"? These courts are not one court.

Mr. PECK: I accept the gentleman's suggestion.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will make the correction.

The correction was made accordingly.

Mr. PECK: I want to explain this amendment a little before discussion goes further so the members will not be under any misapprehension about it.

The original idea of the Judiciary committee was that no laws should be declared unconstitutional except by a vote of all the judges of the supreme court. That was the original proposal as reported, but there was considerable opposition and in the Taggart proposal it was made five-sixths; then Judge King showed yesterday there were certain cases wherein it would be not workable. For instance, where the court of appeals decided a case unconstitutional and that went up, if five-sixths of the supreme court agreed that that case should be affirmed they could not affirm it because as the proposal then stood it required a unanimous decision by the supreme court to declare a statute unconstitutional, and in that case if one of the supreme court judges voted to reverse the decision of the court of appeals declaring the statute unconstitutional, it would be reversed. We thought if both courts, the court of appeals and the supreme court, held by a majority of each court that the law was unconstitutional that that raised a presumption that it was unconstitutional, and therefore I have proposed this amendment. This only applies where the supreme court is passing upon a decision of the court of appeals declaring the law unconstitutional, and there the supreme court does not have to be unanimous.

Mr. KNIGHT: I desire a division of the amendment offered. It seems to me the changes applicable to the cases where judgment of the court is reversed, is one amendment and the change about the five judges is another. It seems to me there are two questions involved.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON: How many amendments are there?

The PRESIDENT: This is the second.

Mr. WOODS: Do I understand that the first amendment has been adopted?

The PRESIDENT: The substitute amendment has been adopted wiping away all the others.

Mr. WOODS: But the substitute has not been adopted?

The PRESIDENT: The member from Franklin asks that this amendment just offered by the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] be divided.

Mr. WOODS: I don't understand that amendment just offered by the delegate from Hamilton and I do not think it is workable. I would like to have it read again.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] was again read.

Mr. HOSKINS: I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The president is in doubt as to whether that amendment is in order in view of the request of the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] to have the amendment divided.

Mr. LAMPSON: The request of the member from Franklin is simply for a division on the vote. He wants an opportunity to vote on each distinct part of the amendment, but prior to that amendments are in order.

Mr. KNIGHT: I withdraw my request for a division.

The PRESIDENT: The member withdraws his request for a division and the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] offers the following amendment:

Strike out of line 29 the word "all" and insert the word "five."

Mr. HOSKINS: Just a word. We all understand the situation. Judge Peck's amendment to his substitute takes out the word "five" in line 29 and inserts the word "all." I have offered an amendment to his amendment—which simply reinserts the word "all"—and I want to take out the word "all" and insert the word "five," so that five out of six can render the decision.

Mr. WINN: It is provided that "until otherwise provided by the legislature the supreme court shall consist of six judges." Suppose the legislature changes the supreme court and makes it consist of five, what good will your amendment do? Or if the legislature reduces the number to four.

Mr. HOSKINS: Are you in favor of this word "all."

Mr. WINN: I am not.

Mr. HOSKINS: That matter can be corrected.

Mr. WATSON: I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. ANDERSON: Let us discuss it.

Mr. HOSKINS: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the amendment offered by the delegate from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] be laid on the table? On that the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like unanimous consent to change that just a bit.

The PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the gentleman can change his amendment.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. FARRELL: I object. The gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. PECK] tried to do the same thing and objection was made.

The gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] was among those who objected, and I object now to his amendment.

Mr. HOSKINS: I desire to withdraw that and at the proper time I will offer a proper amendment.

The PRESIDENT: We had started to take a vote and we will take a vote on the motion to table.

The motion to table the amendment was carried.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I desire to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out line 28 and the words "this court" in line 29 and insert: "No judgment of a court of appeals shall be reversed by reason of the unconstitutionality of any statute." In line 29 change the word "five" to "all."

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: It will then read "except by the concurrence of all the judges of a supreme court."

Mr. PECK: That is the same thing as mine but in a little better form.

The SECRETARY: Does this take the place of the Peck amendment entirely?

Mr. PECK: Yes, sir.

The SECRETARY: It will then read as follows: "No judgment of a court of appeals shall be reversed by reason of the unconstitutionality of any statute except by the concurrence of all the judges of the supreme court."

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. PECK: No; it is all right.

The PRESIDENT: The motion to table is not entertained. The gentleman making the motion had not been recognized. The delegate from Lucas [Mr. BROWN] had the floor.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: The purpose of this amendment is to avoid the Hibernian use of language. "In any case wherein the judgment of the court of appeals is reversed those statutes shall not be held unconstitutional or void."

That is to say, no limitation is placed upon the reversing of the judgment, but the statutes shall not be held to be void. The thing we are attempting to do is to regulate the reversing of the judgment. What I am trying to do here is to reach the judgment itself, and I do that by saying no judgment in the court of appeals shall be reversed for the reason of unconstitutionality of a statute except by the concurrence of such number of judges as the constitution shall prescribe. I am simply attempting to correct that.

Mr. PECK: The gentleman from Lucas [Mr. BROWN] showed me his amendment before he offered it, and I think it expresses my idea better than I express it.

Mr. LAMPSON: I would like to ask the gentleman if his amendment does not in effect direct the supreme court to disobey the constitution?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I think not.

Mr. KING: I want some information about cases involving questions of the unconstitutionality of a statute in a case in which by this proposal original jurisdiction is given. How are they to be declared unconstitutional? By a majority or by five, or what?

Mr. PECK: This does not affect those cases.

Mr. KING: This only refers to the reversal of cases coming from the court of appeals, and does not apply to cases originally brought in the supreme court.

Mr. PECK: That is left to be decided as always.

Mr. KING: By a majority. The statute could be held unconstitutional by a majority of the court.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: What I am seeking to do is to get into this language the meaning that Judge Peck desires to have in it. I am not caring at all about the form. I am trying to get his ideas correctly embodied. I am trying to get this to say exactly what Judge Peck wants to say. It may not be full enough, and if it is not will some one offer a suggestion tending to correct it?

Mr. ANDERSON: If your amendment is adopted would not this be the situation: Where the present circuit court, the court of appeals under the new proposal, would hold an act of the general assembly unconstitutional, then the law would be just as it is now so far as the supreme court is concerned, but if the court of appeals held it constitutional, then it would require all of the supreme judges to declare it unconstitutional. Is that correct?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: In all other matters where the supreme court is passing upon the constitutionality of an act of the legislature the law would be just as it is now, and the only form of remedy, if this amendment is carried, would be where they would seek to reverse the court of appeals where the court of appeals held the statute unconstitutional?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is not much of a reform.

Mr. PECK: That is all we can get.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: That is what the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] wanted put in. I was simply endeavoring to get the language the member himself desired.

Mr. ANDERSON: It is not what you are trying to do, but what you have done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Will you explain to us laymen the following proposition: Suppose a statute is declared unconstitutional by the supreme court. The case is brought directly in the supreme court and the majority of the supreme court declare it unconstitutional. Then suppose the same question comes before the circuit court and they declare the statute unconstitutional?

Mr. PECK: They could not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: They could not do it, you say? But they might.

Mr. PECK: I don't think it will ever happen.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is it possible for it to originate in both courts at the same time?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I think not, but whatever action is taken by the supreme court prevails.

Mr. KNIGHT: Suppose the court of appeals has declared a statute unconstitutional and it goes to the supreme court and the supreme court is equally divided?

Mr. PECK: The judgment of the court of appeals would prevail.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then the law would be declared unconstitutional by an equally divided court?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. PECK: The judgment of the court below prevails.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then you are having the supreme court declare a law unconstitutional by a divided court?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: It appears to me that what Judge Peck is trying to do is to reach a situation which sometimes occurs when the circuit court sustains the statute and the supreme court reverses it. I want to frame his language so he will accomplish what he is trying to do.

Mr. KNIGHT: I don't know what you are trying to do, but I want to see that I understand exactly what it is you are doing.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not this the thing that you are desiring: Where the court of appeals holds an act of the legislature unconstitutional the law shall remain as it is now; but where the question as to the constitutionality of the law is first raised in the supreme court and where the court of appeals has held the statute constitutional, it must require all of the supreme court to declare it constitutional.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: That is the effect of what Judge Peck is seeking to accomplish in this particular amendment. What I am trying to do is to get the language so clear that it can be understood.

Mr. NORRIS: If that is what it is intended to do, why don't you write it up in language that ordinary people can understand and not have different sections that may be clashing?

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that the amendment of the gentleman from Lucas [Mr. Brown] be laid on the table.

Mr. WOODS: I don't believe this matter is understood yet.

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order. The member from Medina is not in order.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Medina is not in order. The question is on the motion to lay the Brown amendment on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HOSKINS: Now I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. Peck to Proposal No. 184 as follows: Insert after the word "all" the words "but one."

Mr. PECK: That just reverses the amendment offered by me, and it is in effect the same amendment the gentleman attempted to withdraw.

Mr. HOSKINS: No; it is not.

Mr. PECK: Your amendment was laid on the table and this is the same thing.

The SECRETARY: No; it is not.

Mr. PECK: Don't put your oar in, Mr. Secretary; attend to your own affairs.

Mr. HOSKINS: The distinguished member of the committee [Mr. Peck] has a peculiar way of getting in his arguments. The other amendment I offered was not exactly in the form I desired it to be, and attention was called to it by the member from Defiance, whereupon I changed my amendment. I first said "five" instead of "all" and attention was called to the fact that if the number were reduced by the legislature that would mean "all" just the same. I have changed it to read "all but one," so that, whatever the number is, it will require all but one to declare a statute unconstitutional.

Mr. PECK: As there are six judges now, the word does not change your former amendment.

Mr. HOSKINS: No; but if the number would change this would mean a different thing from what the other amendment did.

Mr. PECK: So it is the same thing that was laid on the table.

Mr. HOSKINS: I think that this Convention can draw the line at what they want to do. My position is this: We ought not to pass an arbitrary rule by which it would require all of the supreme court judges to declare an act unconstitutional. If you retain the present system of six judges it would require five out of the six under this amendment. I regard your idea of unanimity as going too far. It is absurd to say that five judges out of six shall not be allowed to pronounce a decision of the court on any proposition. The requirement of unanimity of all the supreme court judges may work all kinds of trouble. Some one man on the court may have an accident. He may be run over, or he may be sick and disabled. I would like to know how you can get all the judges of a court if one is disabled, and that is a practical reason. The other reason is, I don't think it should be a principle adopted by this Convention. If we can not trust five of our supreme judges to pronounce a decision on any proposition we are entertaining a very small opinion of them.

Mr. HALFHILL: I agree with this amendment so far as it goes, but I wish it would go farther. I think we are limiting the jurisdiction of this court by a hard and fast rule and we are laying down requirements here which may arise some time in the future to plague us and justly so.

I want to call attention to a situation that has arisen in the courts of Ohio. Under our dual form of government every judge of the supreme court has to take an oath to support not only the constitution of the state of Ohio, but the constitution of the United States and the treaties of the United States, which are a part of the supreme law of the land. Now, under the rule of international law, as all of us who have investigated know, treaties always provide a rule of action relative to personal and property rights. The United States has not with any civilized nation in the world, a treaty that does not provide how the property of a subject of that nation shall be disposed of in certain contingencies; and in the case of death or injury occurring to that subject the consul of that foreign power residing in that jurisdiction is the one who represents the subject or the property of the subject, notwithstanding any state statute that conflicts with such treaty right. The courts of Ohio in construing a statute as to the right of an administrator of the estate of a foreigner has to be governed by the treaties of the United States. Now, a case went up from Tuscarawas county, I think, in which all of the lower courts permitted the ordinary statutes of Ohio to govern the appointment of an administrator to take charge of the estate of a deceased alien, and permitted such administrator to be appointed in the probate court, on application of a creditor, just as any creditor of a citizen of the United States could go into the probate court and have an administrator appointed to reduce an estate to a fund. All of those statutes and all the constructions given to the statutes by the lower court of the state of Ohio were in direct conflict with the treaty of the United States with the foreign power and the foreign country in the case in question. I know that to be the fact. I have had experience along that line and have seen cases where the administrator has been appointed for the estate of a subject of a foreign power by a creditor acting under the statutes of the state of Ohio, and wherein that administration was held to be of no force and effect, and the consul of that particular power came in, upset the proceedings of the lower court, took charge of the estate and made a settlement of it under the treaty.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you permit a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: When I get through with my statement. If that condition should arise, and I am only pointing to the illustration where it might arise, I do not see why the supreme court of the state of Ohio should not have a right by majority vote and without every member of that court joining to declare that the treaty obligations that are binding upon every citizen of Ohio should be superior to any statute passed by the legislature of Ohio, and even if all the lower courts had held that those statutes were constitutional and not in conflict with the treaty right. There is a case where it would not be wise to involve ourselves in complications with the United States law, by having any conflict with a treaty right guaranteed to foreign subjects under the obligations existing between the United States and that foreign country.

Mr. ANDERSON: In the case you cite you would not expect the probate judge, sometimes not an attorney, to take into consideration treaties of other countries, but you would expect, when that case got up to the learned men of the supreme court, to have them know what the treaties were and prevent doing what the treaty said should not be done. Don't you think you could get all the supreme court judges to decide on a question like that which you state so clearly?

Mr. HALFHILL: I certainly do not think the supreme court of Ohio should be fettered by any such rule. It is entirely possible that some member of that court would insist upon holding to a situation which would involve us in difficulty and I see no reason in the world for putting such a hard and fast rule as that into the constitution.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you not know that just such a question as that went up in Pennsylvania, as to whether or not you could bring an action for the death of a foreigner; and don't you know it went to the supreme court and then to the supreme court of the United States—I think about 207 or 208 U.S.—and there was no trouble in getting the supreme court of Pennsylvania to be unanimous on a question of that kind? Do you really, seriously contend that where the treaties of a foreign country plainly set forth certain rights of their subjects in this country that the supreme court would be divided on it?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do.

Mr. ANDERSON: You do?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do. And the question that has gone through the courts of Pennsylvania or any other state of the Union cuts no figure in the discussion and is quite beside the point. This is the sovereign state of Ohio and you are making fundamental law for it. I point to a condition which seems to me ought to be apparent to any man who is biased or prejudiced to the extent of desiring that the supreme court of the state of Ohio should be shackled by a rule that should not be inflicted upon any court. What this proposal ought to do is to fix the rule that a majority of the court shall control, and I say, unless you do it, you will live to see the day when this hysteria, this attack upon the courts, made here, will be a thing to rise up and plague you. It is to the courts of Ohio and courts of the country that we owe the liberties of the country. They protect the liberties of the country and the rights of the individual. And these cases that have been cited here, some thirty in number, to show that individual rights have been transgressed by the supreme court of Ohio are a slander upon the courts of the state of Ohio, unless you take into account the hundreds of other cases where the rights of the individuals have been fully and fairly protected by holding statutes unconstitutional, and I can cite a number of them right here in these reports.

The PRESIDENT: The time of the gentleman is up.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I want to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT: The member's time is up. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LAMPSON: It seems to me there are many cases reported in the supreme court reports where statutes have been held unconstitutional by a divided court. Now suppose we change the rule and our court of appeals, which we propose to establish, following the precedents of those decisions, shall hold some statute unconstitutional. When those decisions reach the supreme court does it require the unanimous decision of the judges of the supreme court in those cases?

Mr. PECK: No; that is just what we are trying to avoid.

Mr. LAMPSON: Then I do not construe it correctly. If I understand it, you require unanimity in the court.

Mr. PECK: Only when the court reverses.

Mr. LAMPSON: Would not the effect of that be to permit one or two members of the court to overturn all of those precedents?

Mr. PECK: No.

Mr. COLTON: After all of the gratuitous instruction that has been given by members of the bar to laymen of the Convention, it may be regarded as presumptuous for one to venture a suggestion. But I think an amendment of this kind or a statement in a proposal of this kind should be so plainly put that laymen can understand it. I do not understand this amendment to be clear in its language. It reads: "In any case wherein the judgment of the court of appeals is reversed no statute can be held unconstitutional," etc. If I understand what is aimed at, this language would be nearer the point, "and no judgment rendered by an appellate court declaring a statute unconstitutional shall be reversed except by the concurrence of all but one," etc. I do not know that I understand the amendment, and if I properly caught the meaning that is what is intended. It seems to me this language would be much clearer than the language that is employed in the amendment.

Mr. KING: The statement is made, if I caught it correctly, that if a statute be held unconstitutional by the appellate court it shall require five judges of the supreme court to reverse that. Now, the reversal would mean to hold it constitutional and not to hold it unconstitutional. Why not let four judges reverse? There is not anything in any of the proposals that prevents that.

Mr. FACKLER: I offer a substitute for the Peck substitute and all pending amendments—

Mr. HOSKINS: There are two amendments pending as I understand it. That is what the parliamentarians tell me.

The PRESIDENT: No; the substitute is treated as the original proposal and three amendments may pend to that substitute.

The amendment offered by the delegates from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] was read as follows:

Strike out lines 28 and 29 and all pending amendments thereto and substitute the following:

"No law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the supreme court without the concurrence of all but one of the judges sitting in the case, except in the affirmance of a judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional and void."

Mr. PECK: I am inclined to accept that amendment. It accomplishes the same purpose.

Mr. FACKLER: The purpose of the amendment is not to allow the supreme court to declare an act unconstitutional in those cases in which it has original jurisdiction except by the concurrence of all but one of the judges. If a case should come from the court of appeals which had affirmed the constitutionality of an act, it could not be reversed except by a concurrence of all the judges. If it came up from the court of appeals from a judgment of that court holding the act unconstitutional, then a majority of the supreme court could affirm the judgment of the court below. I think that takes care of all three possible ways in which the matter can come before the supreme court.

Mr. PECK: It also takes care of the provision by saying "all of the judges sitting in the case."

Mr. ANDERSON: As I understand the situation now existing, first we have the amended Proposal No. 184. That was printed last night and stands as the proposal. Then we have an amendment offered by Judge Peck to line 28; we have an amendment to that by Mr. Hoskins changing "all" to "all but one," and then we have the amendment of Mr. Fackler as just read. The purpose of Judge Peck's amendment was to permit cases coming to the supreme court on questions of the constitutionality of an act of the legislature, where the court of appeals had held the statute unconstitutional, to be affirmed by the supreme court and just as now. That might be by a three to three vote if it so happened. The Peck amendment went to that and that alone. In all other parts it was to be by the supreme court, that all of the judges sitting in the case should agree as to the unconstitutionality of an act before it should be so declared. The amendment by Mr. Hoskins means the same as the one by Mr. Fackler except one of the judges need not agree. It seems to me that the Fackler amendment should prevail. It seems to me if the supreme court can declare an act unconstitutional where the lower court has held it unconstitutional that this provision ought to be satisfactory. Then "all of the judges sitting in the case" cures another trouble that has been suggested, and that is that some one may be sick, or some one, by reason of interest in the case or having been in the case when he was not a supreme judge, may not be able to sit. It does seem to me there is not much reform, as to acts declared unconstitutional, in the Peck proposal, unless the Fackler amendment carries, and I hope all in favor of the reform of the law will support this amendment.

Mr. NYE: I do not want to let this pass without saying a word. It seems to me we have been elected to this Constitutional Convention because of our qualifications to prepare amendments to the constitution, and if we prepare amendments they ought to be more binding than any statute that can be passed by any legislature that is elected in the ordinary way. If the legislature can pass a statute by a bare majority and then we require a unanimous decision of the supreme court to declare it unconstitutional, it seems to me that you gentlemen are belittling your work in this Convention. I believe that the supreme court ought to have a right by a majority of the court to hold unconstitutional any statute passed by the legislature in violation of the provisions of the constitution we are making. I believe we are putting a millstone around our own necks, and that the people of the state now and to come hereafter will regret our action. I believe we ought to leave the constitution as we have it now, with reference to the point of declaring a law unconstitutional. We ought not to change a provision which has been the rule in this state for a hundred and ten years, and the rule in the United States for a hundred and two years. I say this as a warning. I say that this is wrong in principle and wrong in practice.

Mr. FACKLER: You admit that no law should be declared unconstitutional unless it is so beyond reasonable doubt?

Mr. NYE: Certainly.

Mr. FACKLER: Then under the substitute amendment the requirement of unanimity in the supreme court only applies where the judge of the court of appeals has decided in favor of the constitutionality of the act, does it not?

Mr. NYE: The supreme court ought to be considered by us as the highest and best court under the law of this state, and a majority of that court in my judgment ought to rule.

Mr. LAMPSON: Legislatures have been in the habit of passing what is known as special legislation. Such legislation has usually been held to be unconstitutional. There is a long line of precedents upon that subject. Some times the statutes are so near the border line that statutes of that class have been held unconstitutional by a divided court. It seems to me that this proposal will reverse, or may reverse, this whole line of precedents and permit those special legislation statutes to be held constitutional simply because one member of the supreme court refuses to hold them unconstitutional. If I am wrong in that I would like to know it.

Mr. FACKLER: Under this his judgment would have to be concurred in by the court of appeals.

Mr. LAMPSON: It need not come from there at all. It may come direct to the supreme court without going to the court of appeals. The thing we have to guard against is special legislation. This opens the door wide to the legislature to pass all kinds of special legislation and have it held constitutional in the supreme court.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. HARBARGER: Where a case goes to the supreme court direct and does not come to the supreme court from a court of appeals, it only requires a majority of the supreme court to hold a statute unconstitutional.

Mr. LAMPSON: You are wrong about that. It takes all of them, and it is the supreme court that makes the law on these questions.

Mr. OKEY: A point of order: Was not a roll call demanded?

The PRESIDENT: Some one did call for the yeas and nays, but the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] had been recognized and the member who called the yeas and nays did not have the floor to make the demand.

Mr. LAMPSON: I would like to have my question answered.

Mr. FACKLER: The original jurisdiction of the supreme court is very limited?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes; but all of these administrative questions will be special matters. The legislature used to be flooded with applications for special acts to allow cities and towns things peculiar to themselves which were entirely applicable to them. We used to get around the constitution by providing that a city not having more than a certain population and not less than a certain other population might be so authorized. As a matter of fact the population specified would make the statute applicable to but that one city.

Mr. FACKLER: But that was finally knocked out?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. FACKLER: And it was only when a case arose about the lighting plant in Cleveland that they knocked it out.

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes; but for a long time they held those statutes constitutional. Finally they held them unconstitutional.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I want to ask Mr. Fackler a question. Under your amendment, which takes the place of all the other amendments and strikes out lines 28 and 29, you provide that "no law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the supreme court without the concurrence of all but one of the judges sitting in the case, except in the affirmance of a judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional and void."

Now the supreme court, after hearing a constitutional question argued, often delays quite a considerable time before it reaches a decision. What would happen if in that time one of the judges should die? Could there be any claim that the death of that judge would settle the constitutionality of the law?

Mr. FACKLER: I think not.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Would not all cases of that kind have to be heard again?

Mr. FACKLER: I am not certain as to that, but I do not think so. The remainder of the judges would be all the judges sitting in a case and they would render the decision.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: You say "sitting in the case." All the judges that heard the case would be sitting in the case and if one died after that time that would not alter the number of judges who were "sitting in the case," so don't you think the matter ought to be safeguarded? I think it ought properly to be put "all but one."

Mr. FACKLER: I am willing to consent to that.

DELEGATES: We object.

Mr. FESS: I do not want to reflect on anybody, but it does seem to me that there is an attempt to defeat by minor corrections without number the reform that is here sought. Every suggestion that could be thought of has been made here, and every modification. It seems to me if the proposition concedes the unanimous decision for reversal in pronouncing a law unconstitutional—that, if there be concession about it and it is put "all but one," that can meet the approval of the Convention and the Convention can pass the proposal as it was proposed in the amendment by Judge Peck this morning.

Mr. KING: Will the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess] be kind enough to tell us what his idea would be as to the language that ought to be put into this amendment so that it would be clear and so it would be plain and so it would accomplish everything we want?

Mr. FESS: It would be very difficult to word the language so as to avoid technicalities of the practitioner of today whose chief stock in trade is to find a flaw in order to carry a case to the supreme court, and that is the thing we are trying to avoid. If there is any ambiguity in the language the committee on Phraseology, which is appointed for that purpose, will straighten it out, not a hundred and nineteen people, but a small committee of seven here in session, and it seems to me, if there is no dispute on the point we want to preserve with respect to the judiciary, we ought not to delay long about it. I call the attention of my friend from Lima [Mr. HALPHILL] that while we want to respect in the largest way the judiciary, we can have a greater respect if you don't allow five men against four in the supreme court of the nation to declare a law unconstitutional. If it had required a greater proportion than that we would have had greater respect for that court. I stand here in defense of the judiciary, but it seems to me there is no injury or violation to the judiciary to make the concession of "all but one;" that certainly will cure it, and why can't we get out and vote on this proposition?

Mr. LAMPSON: Does the gentleman seriously think that we should amend the constitution so as to permit one or two of the judges out of six to hold all sorts of special legislation constitutional which have heretofore been held unconstitutional?

Mr. PECK: It has to be held so in the court below before one can do it.

Mr. FESS: If the legislature had seen fit to pass a law and it goes to the court for adjudication and interpretation, I believe that one man dissenting from an entire court does not make that law seriously defective.

Mr. LAMPSON: But the one man becomes the controlling power.

Mr. FESS: No.

Mr. LAMPSON: Certainly the one man can reserve all the precedents under this proposal.

Mr. FESS: Not under this proposal.

Mr. PECK: "All but one" is put in there.

Mr. LAMPSON: That helps it some.

Mr. PECK: I rise to a point of order. A vote was ordered some time ago. The roll call was ordered. Mr.

Change in Judicial System.

Lampson was permitted to take the floor for the amendment. It degenerated into a general discussion, and I demand the roll call.

The PRESIDENT: The president did not recognize any one on that matter. There was no roll call. Does the member move the previous question on the amendment?

Mr. PECK: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: That would be the previous question on the whole thing.

Mr. FESS: In answer to that I would like to read this proposed amendment: "No law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the supreme court without the concurrence of all the judges but one sitting in the case, except in the affirmance of a judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional and void."

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose the courts had been holding a certain class of legislation unconstitutional right along for ten or fifteen years, and now some act that has been passed, similar to those that have been held unconstitutional, goes to the court of appeals and under that provision that act can not be held unconstitutional without the concurrence of all of the judges?

Mr. FESS: Not under that amendment.

Mr. FACKLER: I wish to withdraw the amendment and offer this:—

The PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] withdraws the amendment and offers the following amendment:

Strike out lines 26 and 29 and all pending amendments thereto and substitute the following: "No law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the supreme court without the concurrence of all but one of the judges, except in the affirmance of a judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional and void."

Mr. WATSON: I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the adoption of the amendment.

The roll call was verified.

The substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the amendment as amended by the amendment just adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PECK: Now I want to offer an amendment which simply restores three lines that were left out.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 34 strike out "until otherwise provided by law." In line 36 insert after the word "judges" and before the period "and until altered by statute the circuits in which the circuit courts are now held shall constitute the appellate districts afore-said."

Mr. PECK: There will be an interval before the general assembly can act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that we recess until two o'clock p. m.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I move to amend that by recessing until 1:30 p. m.

The amendment was agreed to and the original motion thus amended was carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess.

Mr. PECK: I have another brief amendment to offer and then I am done.

In line 58 strike out the words "such other" and in line 60 after the word "court," add "and other courts of record."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland, I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 58 strike out the word "and," immediately following the word "prohibition," and insert a comma. After the word "procedendo" insert "the right to try de novo cases, not triable by jury, appealed from any inferior court."

Mr. PETTIT: I have an amendment along that line myself.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Highland [Mr. BROWN] has the floor.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: In the consideration of this proposal it occurred to me that lawyers of small caliber are sometimes elected to judgeships and that in the examination of cases, as suggested on the floor the other day, sometimes are introduced witnesses whose very personal appearance renders them credible and other witnesses whose credibility would appear not to be of the very best. When the transcript goes to the reviewing court that court does not come in contact with the witnesses under those conditions, and if the court only has a right to review on the cold transcript, justice may miscarry, particularly if the judge who previously tried the cases is not competent. I have seen judges on the bench before whom I would hesitate to try a case if I could avoid it, and I would do this all the more when I knew that there would be no appeal except to a reviewing court. I think this proposal is fraught with danger to the litigant, that should have the right to have the case tried de novo before this court of appeals. These are reasons why I oppose this proposition.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. FESS: In view of the fact that this amendment will not close up the gap we are seeking to close, I move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. PECK: It is too late, of course, to be heard, but if you pass that amendment you will have to double the court of appeals.

Mr. BROWN of Highland: Is not that better than having the cases not properly tried?

Mr. HALFHILL. I ask the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess] to withdraw that motion until we can be heard on this.

Mr. FESS: I am willing to withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is, unless it is withdrawn, the tabling of the amendment.

Mr. FESS: I will withdraw the motion at the request of members who wish to have the amendment discussed.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Does the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess] impugn any one's motives?

Mr. FESS: You will learn something later on.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I have not learned much yet.

Mr. WINN: Once before the member from Greene county [Mr. Fess] challenged the good faith of the other members of the Convention who were seeking to perfect this proposal so that they may be able to vote for it. I think I am just as heartily in favor of the proposal as the member from Greene [Mr. Fess]. I have not thus far offered an amendment, but I have several written out, several of my own already have been covered by amendments offered by the author of the proposal. I regard this amendment as one of the very greatest importance. I have one prepared along the same lines which I think covers the situation better than the one under consideration, but I am not particular about that.

We must remember that judges who sit on the common pleas bench—in fact, all the judges—are merely men.

When we impanel a jury to try a question of fact we take the greatest care to obtain men to sit in the jury box whose minds are unbiased, but if we have a question to be tried by the court we have no means of challenging the prejudice or bias of the one man who is trying the case, and I come back to what I have said before, that the judges on the bench are merely men, whose minds are warped, whose judgments may be controlled by opinions formed before a single word of testimony has been heard, just as the judgment and conviction of a jurymen is controlled by his prior opinion.

Now the trial of a case before a jury is altogether different. It has been said by the author that after you have had a trial by a jury you should have a right to have it reviewed on error upon the record and that that ought to be sufficient. I submit that the cases are not analogous. You try a case before a jury of disinterested men. You try a case before the court many times when the court sitting in the case has already determined, before a word of testimony, everything in the case; that is within the practice of every man who has tried a case in court. I have in mind one case now in a northwestern county where a ditch proceeding was involved and more than fifty farmers were interested, and you need not tell me that the judge who tried that case had not an opinion before the testimony was heard. I was not interested in that case and I am not speaking from the standpoint of one interested, but from the standpoint of a practitioner who knows from thirty years' practice at the bar that judges are prejudiced and biased the same as jurors. When they try cases and render judgments the litigant should have the right to appeal to another tribunal and be heard, not upon the record, because the reviewing court is liable to say, as some one suggested yesterday, "If this case were originally in this court a different judgment would be rendered, but we do not feel justified in disturbing the judgment of the lower court." So I insist that this amendment is of the utmost importance to litigants. It does not do any harm. It does not put us back where we are, as has been suggested, and I hope the amendment will be adopted. It ought to be agreed to by the author of the proposal.

Mr. PETTIT: I have an amendment on this same subject which I think more fully covers the ground. It is really a substitute.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment to Proposal No. 184 by Mr. Peck, by inserting in line 59 of the said proposal, after the word "jurisdiction," the following words: "to try de novo all chancery cases, appealed from the courts of common pleas and superior courts and."

Substitute the word "said" for the word "the" before "courts" near the end of line 59 and strike out in line 60 the phrase "of common pleas and superior courts."

Mr. PETTIT: It would then read: "The courts of appeals shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition and procedendo and appellate jurisdiction to try de novo all chancery cases appealed from the courts of common pleas and superior courts and to review, affirm, modify or reverse the judgments of said courts."

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If the member will permit I would like to have the secretary read the proposal as it would read if the amendment offered by the delegate from Highland were adopted.

The SECRETARY: "The courts of appeals shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition and procedendo, the right to try de novo cases not triable by jury appealed from any inferior court, and appellate jurisdiction to review, affirm modify or reverse the judgments of the courts of common pleas and superior courts within the district, etc."

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. PETTIT: Now the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] has made the objection that this would increase the number of appellate courts.

Mr. PECK: Yes; the appellate courts cannot do the work now.

Mr. PETTIT: They do it now and this does not increase their duties one bit, under this proposal. I agree with everything my friend from Defiance [Mr. WINN] has said about the one-man judge. They have the same kind of failings that the rest of us have. They are made of the same dirt. I know in my experience in one bastardy case that the judge was very wild; he came in with his mind made up before the case was called. I would not have stood any more chance before that man than a snowball in hot regions. I do not think one man should try a case. I think we should go mighty slow in this matter. I agree with about everything that Dr. Fess has said in this Convention, but I cannot agree with him on this matter. I have practiced law for twenty-five years. I know what I am talking about, and everybody else knows that when you submit a case to one man, although you have a right to go up on error, that is about an end of your case. At any rate it will not increase the work of the appellate courts one particle over what they have to do now. In our district they are playing more than half of the time. It just preserves the appeal as we have it in the chancery cases, and I think it would be an outrage on the poor class of litigants not to allow them to go on up in a chancery case.

Mr. FACKLER: The Peck proposal preserves the right of appeal, but it does not give the right to hear new testimony.

Mr. PETTIT: What is the benefit of an appeal if you cannot hear the testimony?

Mr. FACKLER: If the lawyer tries his case correctly in the lower court he will have all his testimony in the record.

Mr. PETTIT: He may have in all that is obtainable then, but may he not discover testimony after that?

Mr. FACKLER: You have your rights under the law in that particular.

Mr. PETTIT: After a certain time you have no remedy.

Mr. DWYER: I feel like criticising that language. That "de novo" cannot apply in the appellate court. I think that phraseology ought to be changed.

Mr. STILWELL: I would like to ask the delegate from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] if it is not done now just exactly the way this proposal provides.

Mr. PETTIT: It may be—

Mr. STILWELL: Is it not a fact that in five of the eight circuits you must go up on your transcript of evidence in appealed cases?

Mr. PETTIT: It is not in compliance with the statutes.

Mr. STILWELL: Nevertheless it is the rule of court, and you are simply insisting that what prevails in three of the circuits shall become the law in the eight circuits.

Mr. PETTIT: I don't understand that a rule of court can override a statute.

Mr. HALFHILL: Will you allow me to ask a question of the gentleman?

Mr. PECK: I object unless the question is asked of the speaker.

Mr. PETTIT: If I don't object you can't.

The PRESIDENT: Does the gentleman from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] yield to the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] to ask a question?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: I object.

Mr. HALFHILL: If the member yields to me I have the privilege of asking the question.

Mr. PECK: Well, it is disorderly to ask a question of some one not on the floor. If you want to ask Mr. Pettit a question all right, but you have no right to ask anybody else.

Mr. PETTIT: Just keep cool, we will get along.

Mr. PECK: I object to the member asking questions of anybody except the member on the floor. I submit that it is out of order.

Mr. PETTIT: I have yielded my right to him.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now I want to ask a question of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. STILWELL].

The PRESIDENT: Does the member from Cuyahoga yield to a question from the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL]?

Mr. STILWELL: Yes; if I can answer the question I will do it.

Mr. HALFHILL: In the districts you speak of this rule is by an order of court?

Mr. STILWELL: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, but the law will allow the introduction of witnesses?

Mr. STILWELL: No; the judge would simply refer the case to a commissioner.

Mr. HALFHILL: But there you can introduce witnesses?

Mr. STILWELL: Oh, you can!

Mr. HALFHILL: In all the courts of which you speak, and I am familiar with them, you can always apply to the court for a right to supplement your written transcript with oral testimony, and if the court thinks it ought to be heard the court will grant that as a matter of course.

Mr. STILWELL: That is true, but it all depends on the number of the witnesses. The court won't go into any lengthy testimony. They may permit a witness or two to clear up some point.

Mr. HALFHILL: But there is no hard and fast rule of court and no rule of the statutes which says that you cannot present testimony in the circuit court.

Mr. STILWELL: I don't suppose it will be absolutely binding, but that is the practice.

Mr. PECK: I hope this amendment will not be passed. This is the last stand of stupid conservatism, I was about to say; I will say it is certainly the last stand of conservatism. It is a sort of conservatism that lawyers always manifest whenever any suggestion touches anything that affects their sacred purse. It is the same way when any statute is offered to abolish something that has been existing a long time. Why, it is history that when the statute was offered to abolish hanging men in England for stealing a few shillings the lament was made by Lord Eldon that it was a wicked reform in the law. It is of record in the state of Ohio that when the code of civil procedure was adopted it was fought by nearly all the leaders of the bar in the state and it had to be adopted and put into effect over their objection. Now nobody objects to it and if anybody were to want to change it the lawyers would sit back in their conservatism and fight against it. There is an unreasoning element of conservatism in the bar and it always has to be overcome from the outside. The right of appeal has existed too long; it has clogged the court and has been gotten rid of by five of the circuit courts through a rule which the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] claims violates the statute. At any rate it is a rule that is operated in all of them and they enforce it, as indicated by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. STILWELL] in this way: If you insist on coming in with witnesses they will simply refer you and your witnesses to a master and let him take the depositions and let him bring them in; then they will hear them. That would put you in no better position than to simply let the court try on the record of the common pleas court. You seem to say that you would rather have the trial by the master than the judge of the common pleas court. Well, I think not, if you know what is good for you.

Mr. PETTIT: If we insert a proviso can the courts adopt any system that will override the constitution?

Mr. PECK: If they cannot, that is the reason why it ought not to be in here. The only reason your circuit courts are not all clogged up now is that this rule they have adopted has saved the situation. If you would carry this out the way you would want it done and have all the witnesses in every case introduced in the circuit courts or court of appeals, you would have twice as many courts as you have now.

Mr. PETTIT: We only had three cases in Brown county and two in Butler county at the last term.

Mr. PECK: But there are many other counties in your district. And we are tired of the way they are trying cases now. A case ought to be carefully tried on its first trial and that is enough. I am opposed to these a la justice of the peace trials that we have had in some of the common pleas courts. There is only one way to try an equity case and that is to try it before the chancellor.

Now the objection is made that judges are only men. What would you have them be? I don't know of any other sort of being that tries cases. You may get some women in certain cases if woman's suffrage carries. There may come a time when my friend will have a right to argue a case before a petticoated chancellor, but as it is now he has to take his chancellor in trousers. That is the only kind he can have. I do not know of any other kind of tribunal that you can have except one presided over by a man. Of course, you must in all things make allowance for human nature. Human nature is weak in everything under the sun and it is not worth while to talk to me, as the gentleman from Defiance has been talking, about cases here and there where the trial judge may have made a mistake. No trial judge and no jury and no circuit court is free from mistakes. Three of the circuit court judges may be in error and may come to a false conclusion, but they are just as likely to come to a correct conclusion on a record brought before them as any other way. Now let us vote upon these amendments and dispose of this last stand of ultra conservatism.

The chair recognized the delegate from Noble.

Mr. PETTIT: I want to make a few remarks in reply.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Noble has the floor.

Mr. OKEY: I have been in favor of the Peck proposal and I was on the committee that reported it out, but at the time it was reported out it did not occur to me that the right in chancery cases to be tried anew in the appellate court had been taken away. I am opposed to the taking away of that right from the people. I know that that right ought to exist. We have one trial in equity cases in the court below and we ought to have a right to go to another court and there let the case be heard before three disinterested judges that they may hear the testimony; because it sometimes happens that, when we try an equity case in court and take it up on transcript, new witnesses have been discovered that will entirely change the decision of the court below. I have known such a thing to happen in numerous cases, and I say that the people ought to have a right to a retrial in an equity case.

When I voted to report this proposal I did not know that it contained that provision.

Mr. FACKLER: Is not the object sought to be accomplished by the Peck proposal one trial and one review, and would not that be defeated if this amendment carries?

Mr. OKEY: Not one bit. It would not add any more burden on the appellate court than is now on the circuit court.

Mr. WOODS: Do you think there should be a single review of all cases?

Mr. OKEY: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: If this amendment should go into this proposal, would there be any review of cases tried de novo in the appellate court? Could you go into the supreme court on an equity case that has been tried de novo in the circuit court or the court of appeals?

Mr. OKEY: No.

Mr. WOODS: Then you would have two trials and no review.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Under this proposal if a case is important would not the supreme court have a right under certiorari to reach down and get the case for review?

Mr. OKEY: No; not as I understand it. There has been a good deal of talk about the circuit court's adopting certain rules saying that cases shall be heard upon a transcript taken in the court below. It is as Judge Laubie said to me. The circuit courts of the state adopted a rule that doesn't rise to the dignity of a rule, because the court is doing something it has no right to do, and he never observed the rule in my county strictly, but permitted us to introduce as many additional witnesses as we desired.

The member from Mahoning was here recognized.

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. President.

Change in Judicial System.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning has been recognized.

Mr. PETTIT: I was on the floor first.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Mahoning has the floor.

Mr. PETTIT: It seems to me that this Peck proposal is considered such a sacred thing that nobody ought to touch it. The statement of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] intimated that we must take this Peck proposal just as it is. They first brought in a proposal here and then after it had been discussed Mr. Peck yesterday offered a substitute. Then he came up this morning and there were three or four more amendments that he had to offer, showing that it was not perfect; and now if anyone else suggests that he wants to amend it they act as if the whole fat were within the fire. I am not trying to delay. We want to get this thing right, and this talk about doubling the number of courts if we allow cases to be tried de novo in the circuit courts doesn't amount to anything. In our circuit they don't work one-half the time. In Adams county sometimes they have one or two cases. Last week in Brown county they only had one case. I don't know of any judges that are overworked anywhere. It seems to me that my amendment or the amendment of Mr. Brown, of Highland, ought to prevail. Talk about poor litigants! Here is a right taken away from them and you want to allow them only one trial in the lower courts.

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not believe either carrying the amendment or rejecting the amendment injures very much or to any extent the great reform sought to be accomplished by the Peck proposal. So that those who are not lawyers may better understand it, in a certain kind of cases, equity cases, where you have not any jury, you try the cases before the common pleas judge sitting as a chancellor, both judge and jury, and as it is now if you are not satisfied when you lose in that court you may go on to the circuit court and try the case over again before three circuit judges sitting as a court and jury just as if it had not been tried in the common pleas court. The men who are back of this amendment wish that to remain where it is.

Mr. STILWELL: Can you do that now?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; where there is not a rule. In many of the courts, in five of the circuits out of the eight, they have made a rule, and whether they like it or not they abide by it, by which the circuit court demands of the plaintiffs or defendants, when they come from the court below in an equity case, that they bring, in typewritten form, the testimony of the witnesses below. Then, if either the plaintiff or the defendant asks that further testimony be heard, the circuit court sometimes permits the witnesses to come in, take the stand and testify before the circuit court. In the smaller counties they take practically all of their witnesses up to the circuit court. Really this is the difference between the small counties and the big counties. In the larger places, like the cities of Youngstown, Cleveland and Cincinnati, they now conduct affairs just as it is provided in this proposal. In the smaller counties it is different; it is as the gentleman from Adams [Mr. PETTIT] and the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] suggest. Sometimes they handle matters in the same way we do, but generally they take up their witnesses to the circuit courts. I am in favor of the amendment, which permits the smaller counties still to try before the circuit court sitting as a court and jury.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is it not a fact, if one of these amendments is not adopted, that the other circuit courts are simply trying to force their rules on all the rest?

Mr. ANDERSON: If it remains as it is now the larger counties can have just what this amendment proposes to give them and the smaller counties have it the other way, but I am afraid of the wording—I don't like that de novo. If they would erase that, I am in favor of it; but I don't believe that I am in favor of doing away with the rule.

Mr. PECK: Well, that is just what will happen.

Mr. KING: I have never been very warmly in favor of a retrial of an equity case, but the custom is well established throughout Ohio. This is the only state in the Union that has it; but we have it and have had it for sixty years. It has grown into a system and we feel that we ought to have it.

But I disagree with those who object to it on the ground of the time it will take. I undertake to say proper judges can hear all the witnesses in a case and know more about the case when they are through, in less time than you can read a typewritten record that comes up from a lower court; because a judge hearing the case will know when to stop the witnesses and when to stop the bringing in of testimony, whereas the court below will feel a hesitancy about doing that. Then the attorneys below understand that they have to get everything in the case in the common pleas court. They call witnesses and keep on piling up testimony and the judge trying the case will necessarily be slow about stopping the introduction of testimony. But the circuit court can stop it wherever it pleases, and my experience on the circuit court bench in hearing cases with witnesses was that we could hear them quicker and decide a case quicker and more satisfactorily from the evidence of the witnesses than from the transcript of testimony.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Does it cost much more to try a case de novo in the same court house in a county where the circuit court is sitting than it would to have a record transcribed and brought up?

Mr. KING: No.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: What is the expense of a transcript as compared with a trial?

Mr. KING: If you could avoid taking up the transcript—which you could probably not do—if you could avoid that you could take the witnesses up cheaper than you could take the transcript.

Mr. STILWELL: If any equity case is going to the circuit court in any event, what is the use of having it tried in the common pleas court?

Mr. KING: We have no control over that question under this proposal. The common pleas court has always had control over those cases since our constitution was adopted, and there was no proposal to abolish that jurisdiction. Many cases are not appealed.

Mr. WINN: I wish you would turn to the amended proposal. I have a substitute to offer for that, which I think covers the case better than either of these proposals or substitutes. You will remember that the words "such other" in line 58 have been stricken out. My amendment strikes out the word "appellate" at the end of that line so that it would read, "The courts of appeals shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition, procedendo, and jurisdiction to review," etc.—leaving out the word "appellate." I do that for this reason: In Ohio there is a distinction between cases prosecuted through the higher courts by appeal and those prosecuted by proceedings in error. That does not prevail in many of the states besides Ohio. If you turn to our statutes you will find all through them the word "appealed" is used where we mean to go up and try the case, as has been said, de novo. We find error proceeding used where we have to review questions of law by a higher court, so that I think it is not advisable to use the word "appellate" jurisdiction where we mean jurisdiction by review of proceedings below.

Again, in all our circuit court reports and supreme court reports there is always a distinction made between cases heard on appeal, as we use the term, and cases on review, so that I would strike that word "appellate" out at the end of that line and amend it so as to read as follows: "The court of appeals shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition, procedendo, and jurisdiction to review, affirm, modify or reverse judgments of the courts of common pleas and superior courts and other inferior courts of record," and these are the words that I would provide for retrial, "and for the retrial of cases appealed from any of such courts."

Mr. PETTIT: I will accept that amendment as far as I am concerned.

Mr. KING: Do you wish to provide by that amendment an open door by which the legislature can enact laws which will permit all cases to go up?

Mr. WINN: I just will add the word "equity" which I omitted and make it read, "and the retrial of equity cases appealed from any of said courts."

The amendment was reduced to writing and read by the secretary as follows:

Substitute the following for the amendments of Mr. Brown, of Highland, and Mr. Pettit to Proposal No. 184: Strike out the word "appellate" at the end of line 58. Between the word "district" and the word "as" in line 60, insert the words "and for the retrial of equity cases appealed in any of the said courts."

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman from Defiance permit a question?

Mr. WINN: Sure.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you think your proposed substitute will in any way interfere with the rules they now have in the different circuit courts?

Mr. PECK: It will. This is then a constitutional right.

Mr. WINN: I do not know what rules they have in the circuit courts. I submit this, that if any of the circuit courts of the state have, without any authority of law, deprived any citizen of his right to have an equity case appealed and tried as from the beginning, that court has usurped authority that it has had no right to do. The humblest citizen of the state has a right to appeal in an equity case and he has a right, if he did not have all the testimony below, to call his witnesses into the circuit court and have his witnesses heard there, and no circuit court has a right to deprive him of that privilege.

Mr. PECK: But the circuit court can send him to a master.

Mr. WINN: I don't know what they can do in the big cities, but they don't do that in our district.

Now I want the members to think about this. This is an important matter. You have heard it talked from the stump, from the pulpit and from everywhere that the courts have been depriving the people of their rights by injunction. Remember this matter applies to injunction suits. Are you here to say that if some judge who has already prejudged an injunction suit decides it in one way and renders an opinion no appeal can be taken from it? I submit that to deprive litigants of this right deprives them of one of their sacred privileges and we should hesitate a long time before doing it.

Mr. ROCKEL: I am very much in favor of this amendment. I think it materially affects the rights of the people of this state. I remember within the last two or three years attending a state bar association at which Judge Reeves, of Cuyahoga county, brought this question before the association, and it was there discussed. It was the sentiment of the bar association of this state that this would be a serious invasion of the rights of the people.

Mr. PECK: Did you ever know any bar association to declare in favor of any legal reform?

Mr. ROCKEL: I do not profess to have the wisdom of the gentleman from Hamilton—

Mr. PECK: That wasn't the question at all. That was not an answer to my question. Did you ever know of any bar association declaring in favor of any legal reform?

Mr. ROCKEL: I don't know and I don't care. It is not material to the question before this body. I want to say to the gentlemen of this Convention that the poor man is the man who is likely to be affected by this. You have heard a great deal said in the Convention about injunctions and the cases that come up before one man and I say to the Convention no man should be entrusted with absolute and arbitrary power. I am in favor of reserving to the people of this state all the rights that can be reserved to them. I had the honor to be on the circuit bench a while and we never found any difficulty under the present procedure. If a case came up on a transcript and an attorney wanted to present his witnesses, we heard the testimony of the witnesses. I repeat to you, don't take away this barrier, don't put the power in the hands of one man to determine rights that may affect the humblest citizen of this state far more than the rich and corporate wealth.

Mr. KING: I would like to ask the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] to examine his amendment to see where it comes in. As it was just read by the secretary after the last word of your amendment, in the copy I have, there is the phrase, "as may be provided by law."

Mr. WINN: It comes after the word "district."

Mr. KING: Where does the phrase "as may be provided by law" come?

Mr. WINN: I think that is stricken out.

The SECRETARY: No; it is not.

Mr. WINN: That should be stricken out.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. KRAMER: I want to say just a word. The most important cases we try are those that are in courts of equity. Equity cases usually involve a great deal more money and a great many more sacred rights than jury cases. For instance, a poor old man is imposed upon by some person and he deeds away his one hundred and sixty acre farm, worth $16,000. You go into a court of equity and try to have that deed involving $16,000 set aside, and we are compelled to try it before one man finally and absolutely, no difference what his prejudices may be. You may go into a court to have a will proved and it may involve an estate of thousands of dollars; you go before one judge and you are bound absolutely by what he finds. Hence, I think we should have the right to try the case before more than one man if we want to.

Mr. FACKLER: Does not the Peck proposal give you the right to try the case in the court of appeals upon the testimony in the common pleas court?

Mr. KRAMER: You know just as well as I do, and Judge King suggested it, that no circuit court will read a long record. Judge King hinted at it, but I say it outright.

Mr. ROEHM: How many times do you get a chance to put your testimony before the jury?

Mr. KRAMER: Once; but we have twelve men to hear the testimony and if one man is prejudiced one way or the other, or if he has a lesion in his brain, as Judge King said, the other eleven men may convince him that he is wrong. In any event, with our three-quarter jury verdict one man cannot stop the wheels of justice as one judge could.

Mr. ROEHM: What has been your experience in trying cases with judges and juries? Have you ever waived a jury and consented to try before the judge?

Mr. KRAMER: Not in many cases. If there is a whole lot of law and very little fact we do it sometimes.

Mr. ROEHM: Is it not conceded by ordinary lawyers—excepting damage suits—that they prefer to try questions of fact before a court rather than a jury?

Mr. KRAMER: Well, if they wish to do it they can do it.

Mr. JONES: When this proposal was first brought to the attention of the Convention and when I had occasion to first speak in reference to it, I was inclined to the view held by the gentleman now introducing this amendment, and so stated from the floor in the remarks that I made upon the subject. Upon further reflection I am inclined to the view that the provisions of the proposal as it stands are the better. As has been suggested, this constitutional provision proposed to be incorporated by this amendment may have the effect of preventing the court of appeals from doing the very thing which in practice is done now by the circuit court in reference to hearing cases on appeal. It may prevent the exercise of the power to refer to a master in order to compel parties to submit their cases upon transcript.

Mr. WINN: Suppose this amendment is adopted; will it be any different from what it is now?

Mr. JONES: It may be. If this becomes a part of the constitution and you provide that cases shall be and must be tried upon appeal with the oral testimony of witnesses, I can readily see how that might have the effect suggested of preventing the court of appeals from requiring them to be tried on transcript of the testimony. Mr. HOSKINS: Is it not a fact that that provision is simply a jurisdictional feature?

Mr. JONES: What provision?

Mr. HOSKINS: The amendment proposed by the delegate from Defiance.

Mr. JONES: But the manner in which it has been presented here, in at least some of the amendments, will raise a very serious question as to whether you may not have to try those cases on appeal by oral testimony, just as this provision contemplates.

Mr. WINN: You understand that the statute provides these cases can be tried de novo on appeal?

Mr. JONES: Yes.

Mr. WINN: Do you think it is more difficult to disobey a constitutional provision than a statutory one?

Mr. JONES: Certainly it is more difficult to disobey a provision of the constitution than of a mere statute. That is illustrated by the provision with reference to reporting decisions. Suppose you have a statute requiring the court to report all decisions; how can you enforce it? If there is a constitutional provision to the same effect you can enforce the provision and secure reporting of all the cases.

Mr. WINN: If a statute provides that the circuit court must hear the evidence on appeal in certain cases, and if the circuit court can disobey that provision of law, what is there to prevent the circuit court from disobeying a similar provision in the constitution?

Mr. JONES: That is assuming a situation that does not exist. The statute now simply gives the right of appeal, and the court has applied to the trial of cases on appeal as provided by our statute the existing methods of trial.

Mr. PETTIT: You say that if this amendment is adopted it may tie the hands of the court of appeals. What harm will there be in tying the hands of the court of appeals in this matter?

Mr. JONES: The main object of this whole reform in our judicial system is to secure a prompt disposition of cases. Now, as we all know, if all the cases that go to the circuit courts in the various circuits had to be heard on oral evidence taken by the court, the courts could not possibly do all the business. It could not be done now, and necessity has compelled changing the rule in the respects referred to. As a matter of fact, nineteen out of twenty cases, aye, more than that, forty-nine out of fifty cases, tried on appeal in the circuit courts, are tried on a transcript of the testimony. In every other state in this country cases on appeal are tried in that way. They are tried that way in the federal courts. What wrong can there be to the litigant in trying them that way in Ohio, in these proposed appellate courts?

Now, there is another matter in connection with this that should not be lost sight of. The great majority of cases that go to the circuit court are jury cases. At least that has been my observation and experience.

Mr. PETTIT: What jury cases can be appealed from the common pleas to the circuit court?

Mr. JONES: They would come up on appeal, where now they come up on error proceedings, which simply brings up for review the whole evidence in the case and the questions of law made in the lower court upon the introduction of evidence and otherwise, and the question is whether the judgment below is fairly sustained by the evidence in the case.

The great majority of cases you have in the circuit court are jury cases, and the rights of parties are determined upon the record from the court below. They are often the largest and most important cases that go up. What reason can there be for having two trials on oral testimony of an equity case and only one trial of a jury case, when the rights of the parties may be just as great in the one and the interest involved just as important as in the other?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The gentleman from Fayette seems to deal with this question as if the amendment made it mandatory on the appellate court to try a case de novo. If the member from Fayette [Mr. JONES] will endeavor to ascertain, he can easily see that the amendment I propose only gives the court that right. It is not a mandatory provision, but it gives the court the right and under that it is in the court's discretion.

Mr. JONES: That may be, but under one of the proposed amendments the question arises whether it does not make it mandatory on the court to hear the evidence on appeal. But if the rights of parties can be subverted and justice can be properly administered in law cases by taking them on error proceedings to the reviewing court, why cannot the rights of the parties be equally subverted in an equity case in the same manner? The best answer to be made to this is that the experience of the whole country and of the English speaking world has demonstrated that it can be done.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to speak just a moment on this proposition and I want to say this: I am more vitally interested in this thing than in any of the rest of the provisions. I want reform, but I do not want it at the expense of the average litigant. You are simply seeking by the Peck proposal to take away from the average litigant certain rights that we have enjoyed for the last sixty years.

Now, as to the matter of time, you do not save any. Judge King has told you so. You don't save any time and you don't save any money. The member from Erie [Mr. KING] has had years of experience on the bench. He tells you that you can hear the witnesses quicker, with less expense and with a great deal more satisfaction, in the circuit court, or the court of appeals, or whatever it is called, than you can read the transcript.

Mr. JONES: May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOSKINS: No, don't bother me; I do not yield. I want to call attention to the fact that if you are compelled to try the case before the lower court you are going to put every scrap of evidence in because the upper court will hold you to the evidence in the lower court. That common pleas judge will be slow to shut out any evidence. You will not be controlled by the strict rule of the evidence as in jury cases. He will be slow to shut out anything, unless it is clearly incompetent. Consequently you will spread your transcript over about five times as much as you should.

Now, some circuit courts have adopted an arbitrary rule, which they had no right to do. I don't care what they do down in Cincinnati or in Cleveland; I want to practice law in my own county, and I want my people's rights preserved. If the circuit court of any other place have taken away the people's rights, it is a matter that concerns those people and not the remainder of the state. I know our circuit court has not taken these rights away. My information is that the states of New York and Indiana, and possibly other states, have this intermediate court, and that in it you may introduce evidence. You have started to rip things up. Now, we people who represent circuits that have not been enforcing an arbitrary rule ask to be let alone. We don't want to change our customs and adopt the customs of Cincinnati. We don't want the arbitrary rules of any Cincinnati court written into the constitution of Ohio, and I protest against it. I have great respect for the gray hairs of the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. PECK]. He has practiced in Cincinnati, but if he had practiced in Northwestern Ohio he would not take this position. We ask the Convention to allow the appellate courts, or the circuit courts, to remain as they are now and not to inaugurate a revolutionary proceeding on the idea of saving time and expediting litigation, when we are told by those in position to know that it does not do either. There may be some other features of the Peck proposal that will expedite and facilitate, but certainly this is not one of them. I was glad to see the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] so fair as to agree that this should be written into the Peck proposal; which he helped to draft.

Mr. STILWELL: Is it not a fact that the only place where this custom at the present time prevails is in the three circuit courts of this state and that it does not prevail anywhere else?

Mr. HOSKINS: I don't know.

Mr. STILWELL: Is it not a fact that you are attempting to force the rules of those three circuit courts upon all the other parts of the state?

Mr. HOSKINS: What right have you to attempt to force your rules and your customs on us?

Mr. STILWELL: You are making objection to a course and you cannot show an instance where any hardship has resulted from it.

Mr. HOSKINS: I don't know anything about that.

Mr. JONES: If your statement is true that these cases can be heard on appeal with the witnesses before the court more expeditiously than they can be on transcript, how do you explain the fact that in five of the circuits of the state they all come up on transcript and that in the other three circuits nineteen out of twenty cases come up on transcript?

Mr. HOSKINS: I don't know anything about that. It is an arbitrary rule and in that rule they are violating the statute.

Mr. STILWELL: But they don't object.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would if I were there.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is not the essence of the controversy that it is one between the cities and the country counties?

Mr. PECK: No.

Mr. HOSKINS: That may be true, but I think there are people over the state who are fair enough not to attempt to urge a rule on us.

Mr. LAMPSON: Don't you think that the country representatives ought to understand what the issue is?

Mr. HOSKINS: Most assuredly, and I think the country representatives ought to protest against writing the rule of the Cincinnati circuit court into the constitution of Ohio.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. SHAFFER: As a matter of fact, the only point that you make in this argument of yours is to give the court of appeals the right to consider additional testimony in cases that come before it.

Mr. HOSKINS: Not necessarily.

Mr. SHAFFER: Is not that the whole of your controversy?

Mr. HOSKINS: No.

Mr. SHAFFER: What else is there?

Mr. HOSKINS: You have all the evidence that has been given in the trial below. Now I don't care to have my time taken up by an argument. The proposition has been made half a dozen times that in an equity case the judgment is by one man. He may be a good judge, but he may be a two-by-four, and I want to say that all the poor judges are not on the supreme bench. Some of them are on the common pleas bench, and you have to go before judges of that class and have one man instead of twelve pass on your rights. It has also been argued here that the upper courts are loath to disturb a finding of a lower court upon a cold transcript, where you cannot get all the facts before them in the manner in which the witnesses themselves could present the facts.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Couldn't the judge be sworn off the bench if there is any just ground for it?

Mr. HOSKINS: We have not a statutory right now to do that, and if the senator could recognize what a delicate thing that is to do he would know that would not be an adequate remedy. Next week you would have to meet that same judge in some other matter, and if you have sworn him off the bench you are not in very good standing with him.

I hope this Convention will realize that there are some arbitrary, narrow-minded judges on the common pleas bench and that you cannot get a proposition properly before the appellate court without a right of retrial.

Mr. FACKLER: Several questions have been raised regarding this amendment.

There has been an attempt to inject sectional differences here, leaving the impression that the cities are asking for the Peck proposal while the country districts are opposed to it. All of the circuits of the state except two or three have adopted as a rule of court what the Peck proposal provides, and this rule is in effect in the district embracing Ashtabula county, from which the gentleman comes who asks the question.

Does the gentleman think that Geauga county is one of the city counties? Is Columbiana county? Is Harrison county? Is Noble or Monroe? Take your map of the districts of the state and you will find your answer and the answer will be diametrically opposed to the statement of the gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. Hoskins].

Mr. LAMPSON: There has been considerable complaint in those counties along that line.

Mr. FACKLER: The object of the Peck proposal is simply this, and it is an object that has been advocated by every progressive lawyer and thinker on the subject of judicial reform in the country: "One trial and one review." What is sought here? Here is an effort on the part of some men to cut out that principle as applied to equity trials. They say you would not save any money. You can try cases in an appellate court in a few hours and if you attempt to bring all the witnesses before the court on appeal, in a case involving considerable testimony, you will have lawyers' fees and witnesses' fees piled upon the litigant. No, sir; this is a help to the poor people. The proposal here offered is cheaper. Very much so in the long run.

Mr. CROSSER: Have you tried any cases in the circuit court?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. CROSSER: Didn't you find that you could try them as rapidly and more so by the introduction of the witnesses?

Mr. FACKLER: Not nearly so.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Don't you regard a review de novo as more valuable for your case than an appeal on the record?

Mr. FACKLER: That depends entirely on which side of the case you are on. Taking it as an abstract proposition, stripped of interest in the matter, you will get just as near justice by trying the case rightly in the lower court and then taking the record up to the higher court. The result of what we have now is really slipshod trials in the lower court, because the lawyers feel they can go to the higher courts and try it over again. That means expense and extended litigation.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: It seems to me that you are not trying to reach justice.

Mr. FACKLER: We are trying to reach justice, and we believe it is best to reach justice with one trial and one review.

Mr. WINN: Suppose you were trying an equity case in a certain city of the state where most of the judges are boss-made, and on one side of the case was a litigant of the same persuasion as the boss and on the other side was a man fighting the boss, what chance do you think the man against the boss would have before the boss-made judge?

Mr. FACKLER: That is an argument that goes not to the system of jurisprudence, but to the manner in which you carry out your system of jurisprudence, and I submit you will have just as much chance if you take that case upon a transcript of testimony to the higher court as if the lawyers had the right to bring in all the witnesses and spend all the time trying the case over again in the second court. It does not take away the right to an appeal; it simply says on what facts you try the appeal; that it is on the testimony below. I believe if this amendment is adopted it will strike out of the Peck proposal very much of its merit.

Mr. PETTIT: What right have you to impugn the motives of any lawyer?

Mr. FACKLER: What did I say?

Mr. PETTIT: You said substantially that lawyers are taking cases to higher courts to make more money out of them.

Mr. FACKLER: That is the effect of it. Now let us vote upon this proposition. This is the last stand to try to save an equity case from "one trial and one review," which has been established as a sound and progressive doctrine in judicial procedure.

Mr. ROEHM: When this amendment is voted on won't the next move be to provide a method for going to the supreme court?

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. FACKLER: I don't know. Some people are never satisfied with an end to litigation. Litigation must end somewhere, and usually it is to the advantage of the poor litigant to have the end quickly.

Mr. HOSKINS: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FACKLER: No; I will not.

Mr. TALLMAN: I want to start with the idea that if we have our equity case in the court above we have one trial and one review. I presume the gentleman used the word "review" in the sense of reviewing the law in the case, which is the only sense in which it can be used unless there is testimony and the case is heard on testimony above. In jury trials they have a judge and a jury and the case is again heard by a judge on the facts on the motion for a new trial. It is heard upon the facts below by thirteen men. It goes on error, and the questions of law are reviewed. When an equity case goes up on appeal it is heard upon the facts and the law by the judges who pass upon that case, and it is reviewed as to the facts and there is a review as to the law. If the facts are reviewed it is a better review than a review of the law alone. The idea of having only one trial and one review is theoretical; I do not care what you call it. I want to ask this question: Doesn't the judge who tries the case below decide upon what is competent and what is incompetent testimony? Let us have your boss-made judge upon the bench, let us have your boss-counsel trying his side, and let us have a man opposed to the boss-made judge as one of the parties to the case. How about your review if you want to have it as does Judge Peck, the Martin Luther of this century? The judge below determines the law and what is competent testimony and he determines what is to go into that record of the case and what doesn't go into the record of that case. The court of appeals can't read or review evidence that is excluded, and you can always beat a case on review before the court of appeals if you keep out all of the proper testimony, or a good portion of it, that ought to have been admitted below. I want to ask some of you, how are you going to get that testimony before the court of appeals if it is not in the transcript and the court below has erred—this boss-made judge, this narrow-minded judge, this judge who has made up his mind before he took his seat upon the bench?

How are you going to get the whole testimony before the court above if the judge chooses to rule it out? There is only one way on earth that you can do it. You would have to go up by a petition in error and you would also have to go up by appeal. Now if you cannot get your testimony in the transcript which has been wrongfully excluded by the court below by this boss-made judge how are you going to get it there if you are not allowed to bring the original witnesses before the court? That is what I would like to know. Here we are called stupid conservatives. I admit, if this is stupid conservatism, I am a stupid conservative, and I would rather be a stupid conservative than that kind of a progressive, a progressive that goes backward—a crawfish. That is another name for it, and it is just as apropos as the one applied to us.

Mr. JONES: Your inquiry was, how the evidence rejected by the boss-made judge is gotten into the record. How would it get into the record in a law case?

Mr. TALLMAN: By exception.

Mr. JONES: Could it not be gotten into the equity case just as in the law case?

Mr. TALLMAN: When you except to the testimony, how are you going to get it there on petition in error?

Mr. JONES: Could you not get it in the equity case the same as you get it in the law case?

Mr. TALLMAN: The court rules it out and the transcript only embodies what the court permits.

Mr. JONES: But wouldn't you get the evidence in the equity case just the same as you would in a law case?

Mr. TALLMAN: The court above would say in the common law case that the court below erred in ruling it out.

Mr. JONES: But if he ruled it out erroneously in the one case would it not be just as erroneous as in the other?

Mr. TALLMAN: Would you send it back to another jury?

Mr. JONES: It certainly would be sent back if there were wrongful exclusion of evidence.

Mr. TALLMAN: We don't want a crawfish—we don't want to go back.

Mr. JONES: Well, why go back in the one case and not in the other?

Mr. TALLMAN: Simply because the other doesn't go up and you can't hear it on testimony. We have a class of cases where the facts have been heard and have been passed on by the jury, but you cannot get them up to the other court.

Mr. DWYER: If the court refuses to give you a proper transcript can you not compel him by mandamus?

Mr. TALLMAN: There is no trouble in getting the transcript. The trouble is in regard to what the transcript contains, when you take it to the appellate court.

Mr. REDINGTON: I acknowledge that I am oftentimes influenced by experience, and I find that some of the delegates here are also influenced by experience. Before I state the reason for my opinion upon this proposition, I want to give you one illustration only. I could give others in my practice, but one will suffice. About twenty-two years ago a father and son got into a controversy over a farm. The son obtained possession, claiming he obtained possession under a gift from his father and that he had made valuable improvements thereon, and he claimed the title. The father denied having given the son the farm as a gift, the farm still being in the father's name. I happened to represent the son. We brought our evidence to the common pleas court as a trial court, and after the evidence was in I received a lecture from that court. The court took the position that he would always believe a father as against a son in property transactions of that kind, that the father knew what the son should have and the father could be trusted to do what was right by the son. The court absolutely ignored the testimony. I appealed the case to the circuit court. That was twenty odd years ago, when the circuit court heard their witnesses. They heard the case upon the same evidence and they gave the farm to the son. Now, how can you get justice between two parties in a case like that under this proceeding? While we are making these courts, why not make them right? I don't care what the circuit court has done. I don't care anything about courts de novo or courts of appeals, but as long as we pay the court and there are only a few equity cases that go to the court while they have ample time and the difference between hearing a case on record and with the witnesses is a mere bagatelle, I believe that the equity case, as a matter of justice between the parties, ought to be heard de novo in the circuit court. Six months may have intervened between the two hearings, and you may have found some new witness or some document that will add to your side. Why can't the parties, as between man and man, receive full and complete justice and introduce the record below plus the new testimony discovered? As long as the court is here, why not allow it to hear the new evidence if the parties demand it? No harm is done.

Again, as has been well said, the trial judges do not always allow you to introduce such testimony as you think ought to be introduced, and how are you going to introduce that record into the trial above when it hasn't that evidence in it? You can do it in an error case by going to the stenographer and have him put in the record what you expect to prove. But on the hearing of an equity case, as long as that evidence doesn't get to the ears of the court he does not weigh it, and you have no advantage of it in the appealed case, for it is not in the record, but you have in an error case. It makes no difference what you call the court. The mass of the people want to know when they go into a court that all of their evidence will be heard, and it seems to me it is a play upon words to say that one man can get justice in a review as well by reading a cold record. Here is a man whose appearance would convince anybody that he is telling the truth and yet a scalawag can go upon the stand and contradict him. The testimony of the scalawag will look as well as the testimony of the credible man. How can the judge above decide between those two parties?

Now, I didn't expect to say anything, but the remarks have gotten on my nerves. I have had some experience and I don't believe it is just between the parties to shut off this trial by hearing witnesses in the circuit court in an equity case where there may be a settlement of an estate, a construction of a will, a receivership, an injunction or a great many cases of that character. I am not satisfied every time with the judgment of the trial court in those cases. I know oftentimes, where certain corporations are interested, they expect certain things from the court. I feel the judgment in advance, and I believe we have a right when we go to the second court to let that second court hear all of the testimony, hear the witnesses, hear the evidence and dispose of the case in such a way that justice may be done between the litigants. That is what the people want. They don't care what you call the courts. You are making the court and you are giving it certain powers. I don't care what the supreme court has done, I don't care what rules of common law the courts in England follow; you are arranging for the courts in Ohio, and I think you should arrange things having in view somewhat the practice that we have had here in such cases.

Mr. FESS: As a layman, you may regard it as presumptuous for me to speak upon this proposition, but as a practitioner of law with ten years of experience and as a teacher of legal procedure in a college for five years, I am partially conversant with the method of legal procedure as practiced in the courts today. I came to this Convention with no pledge written upon paper on any proposition, but I came here with a pledge to myself that if there were any possibility of reforming the methods employed now by the judiciary so as to prevent delays and make it possible for litigants to reach the end of a lawsuit without unnecessary loss of time and expenditure of money, I would do it, and I am going to speak to you now in favor of that idea.

Mr. HOSKINS: Will you tell the Convention how you are going to make litigation any shorter by the adoption of this original proposition?

Mr. FESS: If you have a trial in the lower court and insist upon having the case retried in the upper court on the evidence introduced orally you have multiplied the possibility for delay and expense. You insist upon having a retrial of the case de novo in the upper court.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is not the review upon the evidence the same thing in point of expense as the hearing of the witnesses?

Mr. FESS: No, sir; the review on the evidence will not bring in testimony de novo.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not know that the preparation of the stenographer's transcript and the fees charged for it are vastly in excess of the expense of litigant's taking the testimony into the circuit court for another trial?

Mr. FESS: I do not know that is true. I would think that would depend entirely on the character of the case.

Mr. HALFHILL: That would be true in any case. The testimony of ten witnesses, covering a day in the common pleas court, will make a transcript that will cost $75 to $100. So, on that statement, would it not be much cheaper for the litigant to take his witnesses at $1 per day and mileage into the circuit court?

Mr. FESS: Don't pick out a single instance and use it to apply under all circumstances. You may find a case where the transcript will be more expensive than the retrial, but the principle is the thing we are going upon. We do not see any necessity for the lawyers' contention that when a trial has been heard in a court there must be another retrial of it. That is the thing we want to avoid. I insist that we must reach some form of reform that will cheapen and make possible for us to reach an end of a trial without doing injustice to any one.

If you carry this amendment I am ready to vote against the whole proposition, for we might as well give it up so far as reform is concerned. I insist that we come to some conclusion here, and therefore I move that we table this amendment and thus bring it to a test one way or the other.

The roll call was verified.

So the amendment was tabled.

Mr. KNIGHT: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 8 strike out the first comma and all following in that line.

In line 9 strike out the first four words and insert the following: "consist of a chief justice and six judges."

In line 20 after the period insert the words "The chief justice and".

In line 20 change the capital "T" in the word "The" to a small letter.

Mr. KNIGHT: I shall take only three or four minutes to show why I offer this amendment. I want for the first time to bring a direct vote on the question of the constitution of the supreme court. The purpose is to avoid the question of a divided court upon important matters that may come before the supreme court. If an equally divided court affirms the judgment of a lower court, that is of interest to all the people. Further than that, we have provided distinctly in this provision that the judgments of the court of appeals are final, that no ordinary case can be taken from the court of appeals to the court of last resort until or unless there be a diversity of judgment in two different circuit courts or courts of appeals. Often in one circuit a question has been decided one way and in another circuit it has been decided just the other way. Under this provision that would be certified to the supreme court and the supreme court being divided affirms the judgment of the lower court. So if two of those cases should go up at the same time, decided in an exactly opposite way in the lower courts and the supreme court divided equally, each of those cases would be affirmed when the decisions were diametrically opposed to each other.

During the noon recess I had an opportunity to speak to a number of attorneys, and one of them called my attention to a matter that arose in his own practice in Missouri, where, within the last year, he himself has happened to be engaged as an attorney. There they have two appellate courts and they have a rule like this: Where there is a diversity of decision by the two courts of appeals upon a question, it then goes to the supreme court. In Missouri with only those two courts—where we are going to have eight—contrary decisions do arise; my informant says that in his practice they have arisen in those two courts and that they had to be sent to the supreme court to reconcile the decisions of those two courts of appeals. Now, if we have eight we multiply by at least four—and I think if we apply the proper rule of arithmetic it would be many times four—the number of conflicting decisions they would have in a state where there were only two courts of appeals. Therefore, I do not think it is a good idea to have a case affirmed by an equally divided court. The court should be constituted of an uneven number of judges in order that there cannot be a divided court even in the few instances where the supreme court may have to pass upon conflicting decisions from two different courts of appeals. If there were an absent member, leaving an equal number on the supreme court bench, the supreme court would probably decline to hear the case until the absent member returned.

Now, the reason I increase the court to seven rather than reduce it to five is that to reduce it to five would legislate out of office a present member of the supreme court bench, whereas to increase it to seven would simply necessitate the election of a chief justice.

A DELEGATE: There are only five now.

Mr. KNIGHT: There will be six on the bench before you get this passed.

Now, whether the supreme court business is decreased or increased by this proposal makes no difference; the thing we want above all other things is certainty as to decisions. In the second place we want expedition, and in the third place we want a court that will have weight, and on account of the very size of the court the decisions of that court will have weight not only in this state but in others, and it will make it impossible ever hereafter to have thrown at us what was published widely a short time ago when the president of the American bar association said publicly that if any one would give him any price at all for his Ohio State Reports he would be glad to get the money out of them, because they were valueless in his practice. I think we want to make a supreme court that shall command respect at home and abroad. I think increasing the number of judges by one and putting the chief justice on the bench will be money well expended, for we have done something to expedite justice and to give us greater confidence in the court than we now seem to have, and we avoid the possibility of a divided court, a court divided at a point where we cannot afford to have it divided when we are making our courts of appeals the courts of last resort in so many cases.

Mr. PECK: I want to speak a moment about this matter. If the judgment of the Judiciary committee is of any value at all on any question it is on this question, because they very carefully considered it for quite a while and discussed it calmly and dispassionately when everybody was there, and there was a considerable tendency at one time to adopt the view expressed by the gentleman from Franklin. Upon final and full consideration, however, it was agreed by everybody present that it was not advisable to increase the judicial force of the state, especially the supreme court, the duties of which we are reducing. We do not want to put another man into a court that many of us think will not have enough to do under its reduced jurisdiction. What would the people say about that for economy, and what will they say about increasing the judicial force of the state when it is not needed?

Mr. KNIGHT: Has not the gentleman forgotten that this new proposal makes the entire court sit in one body, whereas it has been sitting in two divisions?

Mr. PECK: How will seven expedite it? Six men can do just as much as seven.

Mr. KNIGHT: Does not the reduction of the supreme court to one body instead of two, as it is now, offset the claim that we are reducing the work so that they won't have anything to do?

Mr. PECK: I believe it is reducing the work greatly. I think we will lighten the work considerably and enable them to keep up with their docket. If that does not happen I will be surprised.

The people have the final say, and we want the people to be able to see that we have not legislated out any judge and we have not created any new judges. We have simply readjusted the judicial work so that in our opinion they will do the work better and more promptly. Let us maintain the position and don't let us have anything to explain.

Mr. KNIGHT: How do you dispose of the cases that I have referred to?

Mr. PECK: Where two conflicting decisions come up from two different circuit courts at the same time and the court is divided equally?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: I don't think that will happen once in twenty years. It is a negligible quantity.

Mr. KNIGHT: It has happened in this state.

Mr. PECK: It might, but it is not worth making an amendment to provide against. The supreme court would work that out. They will contrive to make a decision and to make it harmonious. Our judges of the supreme court are honest and conscientious men. They are good lawyers, too. No man has heard me in the whole course of this discussion say anything against the supreme court. I am not here to say anything against them or to cast any reflections, and when a case like that goes up before them, they would find some way to decide the question without dividing equally.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams. I offer an amendment. The amendment was read as follows:

In line 9 strike out the word "six" and insert the word "five." Strike out lines 24, 25, 26 and 27.

Mr. WATSON: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In section 2, line 9, strike out the word "six" and insert "one chief justice and four judges."

Mr. KING: I move that all amendments be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. KILPATRICK: I offer an amendment. The amendment was read as follows:

In line 14 strike out the second comma and the word "prohibition."

In line 58 strike out the second comma and the word "prohibition."

Mr. PECK: This sounds like a report from the Liquor Traffic committee.

Mr. KILPATRICK: Prohibition as used in this proposal really should be "writ of prohibition." The present constitution provides: "It shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus and procedendo, and such appellate jurisdiction as may be provided by law." Now I do not know how many members there are in this Convention who have given any particular attention to that word "prohibition" as it appears in this proposal. The proposal before us says: "It shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition, procedendo and appellate jurisdiction, etc." If we understood what that word "prohibition" means there wouldn't be more than two or three votes against my amendment. With your indulgence I want to read what the writ of prohibition means as used in this proposal. It was not in the constitution of 1802; it was not in the constitution of 1873-'74, nor is it in the present constitution, adopted in 1851. Now the writ of prohibition is a writ issued by a superior court directed to a judge and the parties in an inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution of some case upon a suggestion that the cause originally or some collateral matter arising therein does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognizance of some other court. If this is put into the constitution and a case were commenced in the court of common pleas, or in any circuit court where they have original jurisdiction, one of the parties could go to the supreme court and ask for a writ of prohibition and the supreme court immediately could say to the parties of the lower court, "Get out of court; you have no right of action." In this state just a very short time ago a certain higher court did issue in fact writs of prohibition. I refer to the case which took place in Cincinnati a short time ago. They didn't call it a writ of prohibition, but it was a higher court issuing an injunction against the lower court to prevent it from doing certain things. We don't want to place in this constitution the right in the supreme court to say to the lower courts you cannot do thus and so, and for that reason this amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. PECK: This amendment was put in at the suggestion of Judge Worthington. He thoroughly explained it. This word "prohibition" was thoroughly explained by Judge Worthington and I do not think the gentleman could have heard Judge Worthington's argument on the subject on this floor. He gave the very case to which the gentleman alludes as a reason for placing this writ of prohibition in there, and certainly if anything could have stopped the unseemly action of the court of common pleas and the circuit court of Hamilton county, it would have been a very good thing. It was a bad exhibition of judicial conduct in that matter, and if some court above could have stopped it, it would have been a godsend. This writ is only used occasionally. I understood Judge Worthington to say it was in use under the constitution of 1802 and was left out of the constitution of 1851. At any rate the supreme court of the United States issues such writ. I have known that court to issue such writs to territorial and other courts. It is a rare writ. It is something that the average lawyer would not meet once in a lifetime, but it is one like a weapon adjusted to rare circumstances. It is not very often used, but when the circumstances arise it is a very handy thing. This supreme court is not going to be arbitrary and interfere in a case in which it has no warrant. We must always assume, and I have always assumed in my attempts to arrange this matter, and that is the proper basis of assumption, that they are all going to do their duty and do it honestly and conscientiously, and the possibility of abuse of power is no argument against the existence of power. You give any other body of men a power and they are liable to abuse it, but those powers must be vested somewhere. Every power necessary for the community must be entrusted to some one. It may be abused, but the person to whom it is entrusted will feel responsible.

Mr. DWYER: This writ is only used where the lower court is departing from its jurisdiction?

Mr. PECK: Only where the lower court is going beyond its jurisdiction and doing something it has no right to do.

Mr. STOKES: I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. JONES: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Insert after the word "may" in line 30, the following: "and in cases where the decision of the court of appeals upon questions other than the weight of the evidence is not unanimous for a reversal of a judgment of an inferior court shall, upon application of a party in interest". Also strike out in line 64 the words "of public or great general interest." In line 65, after the word "may" insert the following: "as herein provided."

Mr. JONES: Those who were present a few days ago when I spoke on this matter may recall that I discussed this to some extent at that time. The number present was very small at the time and I ask your indulgence for a few minutes to say something I may have said heretofore on this same matter. I called Judge Peck's attention to this amendment and he was under the impression that this provision was in the substitute. However, upon examination it appears that the amendment is not in this substitute proposal.

Mr. PECK: I wrote it into one draft and another got into the hands of the copyist.

Mr. JONES: This amendment is now some different from what it was when I first offered it for the consideration of the Convention. It is now intended to meet simply those cases in which the appellate court is not unanimous for the reversal of the case upon grounds other than the weight of the evidence. The objection made to this amendment before was that if a case should go to the supreme court the duty might devolve upon that court of reviewing the case upon the weight of the evidence; so I have now provided for that class of cases, where the appellate court divides upon the question of reversal, that the case may, upon all questions other than the weight of the evidence, upon the application of a party in interest, be certified to the supreme court for decision.

Now it will readily be seen on a moment's reflection that this will only cover a class of cases where a member of the appellate court has coincided with the views of the common pleas judge, making two judges in favor of the judgment rendered below, and two court of appeals judges on the other side, so that you have a situation where there are two members of the reviewing court saying the judgment is wrong and two judges, one a member of the appellate court and the other the common pleas judge, saying it is right. It does appear to me in a case of that kind that the rights of the parties ought not to be concluded by that sort of a judgment of the appellate court, and that there should be some provision whereby the litigants can have the judgment in some way or other of more than two judges against two. If the case is reversed on the weight of the evidence it will of course go back for a new trial, but if the reversal is upon other grounds the appellate court may render the judgment which the common pleas should have rendered, and thus finally dispose of the case. If the case is taken to the supreme court merely upon the questions of law, you could have a determination by the highest court in the state of the questions upon which the lower courts have divided equally. The appellate courts are not going to divide upon questions of law unless one or the other of two situations exists. They may divide because they claim that one court of appeals has decided a question one way and another the contrary, or because the question has never been decided in Ohio and is a new question. Now, in either case, it is important to have the judgment of the supreme court upon the question which caused those four judges below to divide, two on the one side and two on the other.

The means of taking the case to the supreme court would be simply by the ordinary proceedings in error, and would require review by the supreme court merely of those law questions involved in the case. What will result if this sort of a provision is not incorporated into the proposal? A case comes to the court of appeals and two judges of the court vote to reverse and one to affirm. The case might go back to the common pleas court and be retried and come up again in the court of appeals with exactly the same practical results—that you have the rights of litigants finally determined upon questions of law with two judges of inferior courts of the state on one side of those questions and two on the other. It is hard to see how you are going to satisfy litigants with that sort of a final judgment.

If two judges of the court of appeals are in agreement with the judge below, you would have three to one, and it is suggested that where you have the concurring judgments of three members of these courts, two of the appellate court judges and one common pleas judge, that ought to be enough and ought to satisfy the parties. There is a good deal of force in that suggestion and so I have changed my original amendment and applied it only to reversals.

Mr. PECK: I am inclined to accept this amendment and I hope it will prevail.

Change in Judicial System.

Mr. ANDERSON: I object to it. With all due respect to Judge Peck I cannot understand why the committee in favor of this proposal should accept that amendment. It would practically destroy the whole proposal. Let us analyze and see what it means.

1. It defeats the purpose of the proposal. I hope we understand the proposal by this time. Its purpose is to limit litigation and make it cheap, swift and sure; to give one trial before a jury and a court and one trial before a reviewing court, and let it stop there. If this amendment is adopted what have we? Take the witnesses before the jury, try the case, the judge charges the jury, the jury decides in your favor. The losing side takes the case to the circuit court or the court of appeals. On the question of the charge to the jury two of the judges of the court of appeals may say the court committed error and the other judge may say, "Yes, but that is a technicality." It is an error, but it is not prejudicial. Now you have the divided court that Mr. Jones has referred to. Under these circumstances it goes to the supreme court. What happens? Two years expire before you can have it heard as to whether or not the charge to the jury, although technically wrong, is prejudicial, and it costs hundreds of dollars to have that question determined. The supreme court says it is prejudicial and sends it back to the common pleas court; you try it all over again, and then probably the judge in charging the jury will change one sentence in the charge—

Mr. JONES: Why do you say, if this reform in the judiciary is going to get business through the courts so rapidly, that it will take two years for a case to be reached by the supreme court?

Mr. ANDERSON: I mean what I say.

Mr. JONES: Don't we hope that these cases will be promptly disposed of by the supreme court?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; because if your amendment carries there will be practically no change in the present system.

Mr. JONES: Would it not be much better after the case has once been tried and has gone to the appellate court, where there are questions of such serious nature that the appellate court divides upon them, to have the court of last resort immediately determine them? Would not that expedite business much more rapidly than to send the case back for another trial?

Mr. ANDERSON: You know that ninety per cent of the lawsuits that go from the common pleas court to the circuit court on questions of law go upon the charge to the jury or upon the admission of testimony or refusal to allow testimony to be introduced—some little technicality or other about evidence being introduced improperly. Ninety per cent of the cases that go from the common pleas court to the circuit court and up to the supreme court on error are predicated upon what I suggest.

Again, say that some witnesses are called. The Jones amendment is carried and certain questions are asked him and the common pleas judge permits him, over the objection of the other party, to answer. The losing party takes the case to the circuit court upon the evidence improperly introduced. The two judges hold it was a technical error and prejudicial. The other judge holds that technically it was an error, but not prejudicial.

What happens? In the course of two long years the case goes up to the supreme court; printed records, printed briefs, expense of hundreds of dollars, and the supreme court finds the circuit court was right, the evidence was improperly introduced, and you have to go back to the common pleas court and start all over again. Then when the same witness testifies the next time there is a change of the phraseology of his answer, in no way changing the substance, but still a change of phraseology, and it goes up again.

Mr. JONES: Does not the gentleman know that in actual practice in our circuit courts there is probably not one case in fifty, certainly not one case in twenty-five, where the circuit court fails to reach a unanimous conclusion? That being so, will there be a burdening of the supreme court to any great extent? Will not the provision in practice simply result in taking to the supreme court those cases in which important questions arise on which the court of appeals divides?

Mr. ANDERSON: Under conditions as now existing to some extent you are right, but we are now making the circuit court a court of last resort, and that is what we who are the friends of the measure want to have done. In the doing of that you are going to add responsibility and dignity to the court. If your amendment carries you offer to the court of appeals a premium to escape responsibility by having a divided court. The court of appeals can simply say we will escape responsibility and one judge will take one position and the other two the other and then the case will go to the supreme court at the expense of years—delays and hundreds of dollars of expense.

Mr. JONES: Does the gentleman mean to claim that in practice the court of appeals of this state, if this system is adopted, is going to degenerate into any such condition as he suggests?

Mr. ANDERSON: I mean this: We are trying to legislate, not in favor of the lawyers or the court, but in favor of the people, if I understand it rightly. Just as Judge Peck suggested, we cannot have a suggestion of reform that is not fought by the lawyers. I don't want to be unfair to the bar, but the only interest that a lawyer can have is the additional fee for doing additional work, which does not at best amount to much.

Mr. JONES: If the result is to facilitate a disposition of cases, why is not that in the interest of the clients and against what you claim is the interest of the attorneys?

Mr. ANDERSON: If I agreed with you that it helped to facilitate the cases, I would not be talking. As Judge King suggests, what if the circuit court were to find upon the weight of the evidence that the common pleas judge and the jury were wrong, and in addition to that found that the court committed an error in the charge to the jury, what would happen then?

Mr. JONES: Wouldn't the case go on to the supreme court?

Mr. ANDERSON: Then you would have all kinds of cases. Let us be honest and say we are against the proposal. Let us get out in the open and say we are not for it.

Mr. JONES: I don't like remarks of that kind.

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that the Jones amendment be tabled.

Change in Judicial System.

The motion was carried.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines 30 to 33 inclusive. Place a period after "jurisdiction" in line 64 and strike out "or cases of public or great general interest in which the supreme court may direct the court of appeals to certify its record to that court," in lines 64 and 65.

Mr. TANNEHILL: If we are going to make the court a court of last resort, let us make it a court of last resort. If we are going to fix an impassable gulf over which you cannot come up, let us prevent them from going down in the other direction. If you leave in this provision which I am seeking to have taken out, you will lose most that you are trying to gain in the way of reform. I think we all agree that the supreme court has been, in the past at least, too far from the people. If that court in the future should be, as it has been in the past, unfriendly to the people, and you put this provision in, and the lower courts make the decision favorable to the people and against the corporations, and the highest court of the land continues in the future as it has been in the past, friendly to corporations, as the proposal now stands, what is to prevent that court from reaching down and bringing that case up? I think this is an important matter and that these words ought to be stricken out of the proposal.

Mr. PECK: I hope this amendment will not prevail. This matter of certiorari has been attacked from the other side, and I was against that. The proposition was that the supreme court should have a right to get any cases up and I opposed that. Now the attack comes from the other side. They want to strike it out altogether. I do not believe in any impassable gulf, but I believe the supreme court should have the right occasionally to reach down and bring up cases to the supreme court. It is a great help to the United States court jurisdiction, this taking of cases from the circuit court of appeals, and this proposal is largely modeled upon that principle, which has been found to work well. I hope that this will be left as it is so that cases that should go up to the supreme court will be taken there and decided, and I move that this amendment be tabled.

The motion was carried.

Mr. KNIGHT: With the full consent of the author of the proposal I wish to offer a minor amendment and take a moment to explain.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 66 strike out "the court of common pleas and superior courts" and insert in lieu thereof "a court of common pleas, a superior court or other court of record".

Mr. KNIGHT: Just after recess today Judge Peck introduced an amendment, which was adopted, inserting in lines 58, 59 and 60 the words "other courts of record". Evidently it was an oversight not to make the same amendment here. Incidentally, I offer this to try to correct the English a little. I do not wish to put any more work than is absolutely necessary on the committee on Phraseology. It will have enough to attend to at best.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Add at the end of line 23: "All judicial officers of the state shall be nominated by nominating petitions only and shall be voted for upon one independent and separate ballot without any emblem or party designation whatever."

Mr. PECK: That ought not to be here. There are several places where that might possibly go, but it is not germane to this proposal and I move to lay it on the table. There are twenty sections of article IV and several of them will have to be amended.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Do I understand you to say that to make the constitution conform to this proposal we shall have to change other sections in it?

Mr. PECK: There will be changes made in other sections. The committee on Judiciary is contemplating a number of them.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I am not sure that this Convention will want to do anything more in the way of judicial reform aside from this proposal.

Mr. PECK: Well, there are some proposals to the effect that the supreme court shall be limited in its power to punish for contempt. These matters will come in here and you can't help it.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I feel that if we are to reform the judiciary we had better begin right now. This last general assembly made an attempt to take the judiciary out of politics, but they didn't do it. Section 4965 still provides that parties of any kind may have partisan committees to decide nominations for judges. If my amendment carries the judiciary will be as free from politics as it can be made; it will sound the knell of party control of judicial nominations. To my mind this would be a most beneficial provision.

Mr. FACKLER: The legislature would have to enact additional legislation to make this amendment effective.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: It would make section 4965 unconstitutional. The legislature has already provided the machinery to carry the idea out I have suggested. It would simply wipe out section 4965.

Mr. PECK: I think the gentlemen are all out of order. I move to table this amendment. I am in favor of this matter when it comes in its proper place, but not now.

The motion was carried.

Mr. PECK: I move the previous question on the amended proposal.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amended proposal as offered by the member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK].

Mr. LAMPSON: I think this vote is upon the proposal as amended by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK].

The SECRETARY: It is the final vote.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on adopting the proposal as amended.

Mr. KILPATRICK: As I understand it the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] introduced an amendment and we are voting upon that. We are not voting on the original proposal. This is not the final vote.

Change in Judicial System.

The PRESIDENT: Those amendments are voted on, the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton was adopted and this is the final vote.

Mr. FESS: I think there was a misunderstanding this morning. I made the motion that we adopt this amendment in order that it would be in shape to offer further amendments. It was adopted and they have offered amendments and they have been voted upon and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT: This is the final vote and the secretary will call the roll.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 184—Mr. Peck. To submit an amendment to article IV, sections 1, 2, and 6, of the constitution.—Relating to the supreme and circuit courts.—Judicial.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the state is vested in a supreme court, courts of appeals, courts of common pleas, courts of probate, and such other courts inferior to the courts of appeals as may from time to time be established by law.

SECTION 2. The supreme court shall, until otherwise provided by law, consist of six judges, and the judges now in office in that court shall continue therein until the end of the terms for which they were respectively elected, unless they are removed, die or resign. A majority of the supreme court shall be necessary to constitute a quorum or pronounce a decision, except as hereinafter provided. It shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition, procedendo and appellate jurisdiction in all cases involving questions arising under the constitution of the United States or of this state and in cases of felony on leave first obtained, also in cases which originated in the courts of appeals and such revisory jurisdiction of the proceedings of administrative officers as may be conferred by law. It shall hold at least one term in each year at the seat of government, and such other terms, there or elsewhere, as may be provided by law. The judges of the supreme court shall be elected by the electors of the state at large for such terms, not less than six years, and they shall be elected, and their official term shall begin, at such time as may now or hereafter be fixed by law.

Whenever the judges of the supreme court shall be equally divided in opinion as to the merits of any case before them and are unable for that reason to agree upon a judgment that fact shall be entered upon the record and such entry shall be held to constitute an affirmance of the judgment of the court below.

No law shall be held unconstitutional and void by the supreme court without the concurrence of all but one of the judges, except in the affirmance of a judgment of the court of appeals declaring a law unconstitutional and void.

In cases of public or great general interest the supreme court may, within such limitation of time as may be prescribed by law, direct the court of appeals to certify its record to the supreme court and may review and affirm, modify or reverse the judgment of the court of appeals.

SECTION 6. The state shall be divided into appellate districts of compact territory and divided by county lines, in each of which there shall be a court of appeals consisting of three judges and until altered by statute the circuits in which circuit courts are now held shall constitute the appellate districts aforesaid. The judges of the circuit courts now residing in their respective districts shall continue to be judges of the respective courts of appeals in such districts and perform the duties thereof until the expiration of their respective terms of office. Vacancies caused by the expiration of the terms of office of the judges of the courts of appeals shall be filled by the electors of the appellate districts respectively in which such vacancies shall arise and the same number shall be elected in each district. Laws may be enacted to prescribe the time and mode of such election and to alter the number of districts or the boundaries thereof, but no such change shall abridge the term of any judge then in office. The court of appeals shall hold at least one term annually in each county and such other terms at a county seat in the district, as the judges may determine upon, and the county commissioners of any county in which the court of appeals shall hold sessions shall make proper and convenient provisions for the holding of such courts by its judges and officers. Each judge shall be competent to exercise his judicial powers in any district of the state.

The respective courts of appeals shall continue the work of the circuit court and all pending cases and proceedings in the circuit courts shall proceed to judgment and be determined by the courts of appeals, subject to the provisions hereof, and the existence of the circuit court shall be merged into and its work continued by the courts of appeals.

The courts of appeals shall have original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, habeas corpus, prohibition and procedendo and appellate jurisdiction to review, affirm, modify, or reverse the judgments of the courts of common pleas and superior courts and other courts of record within the district as may be provided by law, and judgments of said courts of appeal shall be final in all cases, except such as involve questions arising under the constitution of this state, or the United States, or cases of felony, or cases of which it has original jurisdiction, or cases of public or great general interest in which the supreme court may direct the court of appeals to certify its record to that court. No judgment of a court of common pleas, a superior court or other court of record shall be reversed except by the concurrence of all the judges of the court of appeals on the weight of the evidence and by a majority of such court of appeals upon other questions and whenever the judges of a court of appeals find that a judgment upon which they have agreed is in conflict with a judgment pronounced upon the same question by any court of appeals of the state, the judges shall certify the record of the case to the supreme court for review and final determination.

The decisions in all cases in the supreme court and courts of appeals shall be reported, together with the reasons therefor.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next matter before you is Proposal No. 236—Mr. Worthington.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Mr. President and Members of the Convention: The proposal referred to is one that I think will receive the unanimous support of the Convention. It is that of Judge Worthington, who asked me by a note on Monday night if I would take charge of the proposal on the floor, owing to his absence because of sickness. I have consulted with Mr. Harris, of Ashtabula, the chairman of the committee, and he has authorized me to speak in his behalf. The sole object of this proposal is to meet a condition which confronted Hamilton county two years ago when the famous Drake investigation was in progress. The supreme court of Ohio stopped that investigation on the ground that it was not authorized by a concurrent resolution by both houses of the general assembly. This proposal simply meets that condition by giving to each house power to do the things contemplated originally. The attorneys in the Convention are familiar with the legal aspects and it will not be necessary for me to refer to them. I sincerely hope that you will pay the compliment to my honorable colleague and let me send a telegram to him that his proposal has been passed on second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON: The only language that has been changed in the proposal from the present constitution is that part which is italicized?

Mr. ROEHM: There was an amendment passed by the committee.

Mr. PECK: I hope this will pass. The power here conferred should be in each house.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 102, nays none, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fox,	Nye,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 236—Mr. Worthington. To submit an amendment to article II, section 8, of the constitution.—Relative to investigations by the general assembly.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend section 8, of article II, of the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE II.

SECTION 8. Each house, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, shall choose its own officers, may determine its own rules of proceedings, punish its members for disorderly conduct; and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member, but not the second time for the same cause; and shall have all other powers, necessary to provide for its safety, and the undisturbed transaction of its business, and to obtain, through committees or otherwise, information affecting legislative action under consideration or in contemplation, or with reference to any alleged breach of its privileges or misconduct of its members, and to that end to enforce the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of books and papers.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that 2,500 copies of the Peck proposal as passed on second reading be printed. The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next business in order is Proposal No. 93 — Mr. Earnhart.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. ANTRIM: The one proposal recommended to the Convention for passage by the committee on Banks and Banking is a very simple measure, namely, double liability for the stock of incorporated institutions receiving deposits; and because of its simplicity and the absence of opposition to its adoption its consideration need take very little of the precious time of the Convention.

Mr. PECK: Will you allow me a question right there?

Mr. ANTRIM: Yes.

Mr. PECK: I want to ask whether this proposal applies to building and loan associations?

Mr. ANTRIM: I think so.

Mr. PECK: You want to be very careful about that. You will raise a hornets' nest. You will be sorry you ever fooled with it.

Mr. ANTRIM: However, from the fact that this proposal is a substitute for a state guarantee deposit proposal, from the further fact that Hon. W. J. Bryan, in his able address before this Convention eloquently recommended the guarantee of deposits, and finally lest some ultra-progressive delegate under the hypnotic influence of the peerless leader should be tempted to offer the original proposal as an amendment to the substitute, I decided to make a hasty review of the history of banking for the purpose of discovering, if possible, a precedent that would warrant the advocacy of the idea of guaranteeing deposits.

At this point, it was my idea to take you on a little excursion into the history of banking, but because of the resolution recently passed limiting the time of speakers to half an hour, it will be necessary for me to give you instead a little aeroplane flight. I will be the aviator and I shall want to go very rapidly. However, the flight will be sufficiently slow to permit of a bird's-eye view.

We shall start away back in an old historic city in Italy, and we find that the first bank organized was in Venice, in 1171. A few years later several other banks were established in Italy, one in Genoa, another in Florence. For a great many years banking in Italy, as well as to a certain extent banking in Europe, in the matter of international banking, was in the hands of these three cities. Then came a number of centuries when very little was done in the banking business. That was during the Dark Ages. During the Dark Ages of European history we find nothing of any importance in banking history and we pass to the Bank of Amsterdam, established in the year 1609. Previous to the organization of this bank two important handicaps were found in the banking business. One was the scarcity of coin. Coin was very scarce all over Europe. The other handicap was the inability of reaching a basis of equivalence among the different coinages. When the Bank of Amsterdam was started in 1609 a way was found to remove both of these handicaps and it was found in this way: In the first place, the bank received all kinds of coin and gave credit for it in Dutch money; secondly, this furnished a good deal of money which was simply representative of coin deposits. Because of these two facts the trade of Europe was given a very wonderful impetus. We find in connection with the banks of Italy, to which I have briefly referred, as well as in connection with this great Bank of Amsterdam, which played an important part in the banking business in the seventeenth century, that no idea of guaranteeing deposits was ever mentioned or ever heard of by any of the people of the time.

From the Bank of Amsterdam we go over to the Bank of England, which was established in the year 1694. It was established to assist the government to liquidate government obligations and we find this bank has had a successful history from the time of its organization down to the present day. It became what we might call an impregnable bank after the "Peel Act" was adopted in 1844. At the present day we find the currency of England the safest in the whole world. Only 20,000,000 pounds is based on anything but gold. Twenty million pounds is based upon securities and all the rest is based on bullion or gold coin. The idea of guaranteeing bank deposits, as far as I know, has never been mentioned and never been considered in the British Isles! And this bank, being the reserve agent not only of the banks of the British Isles but of all the banks that have to do with British trade, we can see that the idea of guaranteeing bank deposits would not be considered.

From England we go over to the Bank of France, and we find that the first French bank was established in France by that most remarkable character, John Law, a Scotchman. We have all heard about the Mississippi bubble, or the Mississippi scheme, which was started in order to relieve the French government in its financial straits. John Law started the first bank, but it came to grief after the Mississippi bubble, of which Emerson Hough has written, burst. After the breaking of the Bank of France which was started by John Law we find little in banking history of any importance down to the year 1776. Then we have a state bank organized and from that time until the establishment of the great bank by Napoleon several other banks were organized. The banks that represented France during the eighteenth century were not very important institutions, but the great Bank of France started by Napoleon may be considered one of the great banks of all history. From the day it started until today it has often been in trouble, particularly during the Franco-Prussian war, but there never was a time when it came near insolvency. Its most remarkable period was during the Franco-Prussian war, when it paid the indemnity of the French nation amounting to a billion dollars and at the same time liquidated its own war debts.

We find that the great Bank of France does not even guarantee its circulation. We hear of guaranteeing bank deposits, but in France, whose credit is second to none among all the nations of the earth, the great bank of the nation does not even guarantee its circulation, and of course the idea of guaranteeing deposits was never heard of among the French people.

Then we go to Germany and we find the first great bank in Germany established in 1765, in Prussia. This bank operated in the German nation for quite a number of years, but really the first great bank of Germany was started after the war with France, when we have the Reichsbank, or Bank of the Empire. The remarkable thing about this bank is the wonderful elasticity of its currency. In this respect the Bank of Germany is one of the great banks of the world and it is the one thing needed in our banking system to put our banks on a sound footing. The Bank of Germany, the great central bank of the empire, has two-thirds of its circulation based on short-time notes and the other one-third on gold coin and bullion, and the same thing that I have said about the banks of Italy, the Bank of Amsterdam, the Bank of England and the Bank of France is true of the Bank of Germany as well as of the banks of all other nations. In none of these banks do we hear anything about guaranteeing bank deposits.

With this brief extemporaneous introduction, we come down to the banks of the United States. We find over a century elapsed after the first settlement in the United States before the first bank was established. It was in the year 1714 that Massachusetts led the way by starting a bank of issue. The sole purpose of this bank was to issue notes, and its notes were based on land security. Other banks similar to this one were from time to time organized. The first great name in the financial history of our country is that of Robert Morris. Unlike John Law, France's first banker, who started his banking career under the most propitious circumstances and ended it most disastrously, Robert Morris established America's first real bank under rather discouraging circumstances, but this institution has had an uninterrupted and honorable history to the present day. Robert Morris and several other patriotic men of means of his day accepted, in the year 1780, bills drawn by congress, and established on their own personal credit in the same year the Pennsylvania Bank of Philadelphia. Its sole purpose was to render aid to the government. This it did in a time when assistance was most sorely needed. Too much credit can not be given the father of American banking and his loyal supporters. This bank was replaced by the Bank of North America during the following year. It was much larger than its predecessor and had the double purpose of aiding the government and fostering the struggling business enterprises of the country. It issued a limited number of notes. This bank was in 1781 chartered by the state of Pennsylvania and has continued to the present date.

Between the establishment of the Morris Bank and the first bank of the United States several state banks were organized and played an important part in the financial history of those early days. In 1791 congress chartered the Bank of the United States. With this bank is associated the name of Alexander Hamilton, the greatest financier of the eighteenth century. That the bank enjoyed the confidence of foreign investors is shown by the fact that of the 25,000 shares, 18,000 shares were sold abroad. Still the control was in the hands of home stockholders because of a special way of voting the stock. Naturally the first bank of the United States dominated the financial interests of the country; still the state banks were also a factor in the country and their number increased. However, with the expiration of its charter the Bank of the United States was obliged to go into voluntary liquidation on the ground of the alleged unconstitutionality of its charter. Of course the young republic missed its financial institution. The Bank of the United States had exercised a salutary influence over the numerous state banks and with its disappearance state banks rapidly increased, note issues expanded unreasonably and an unstable condition of affairs resulted. During the five years that intervened between the expiration of the charter of the first bank of the United States and the chartering of the second bank of the United States the finances of the nation fell into a very disordered state. Of course, the war with England during this period had much to do with the financial condition of the times. Still we feel that if the country had had a strong, conservative institution of its own the result might have been vastly different. The country was entirely dependent on state banks, and because of their advances to the government, with some exceptions, they were forced to a suspension of specie payments.

The discontinuance of the first bank of the United States marked the rise of private banking. Stephen Girard purchased the outfit of the bank and founded a private bank with a capital of $4,000,000. There had been private banks before, though all of them had been small institutions. Girard floated a government loan, which the government had vainly sought to obtain, and this assisted materially in the effecting of an early peace. Private banks were followed by savings banks, which came into existence in 1816. Some years later, in 1831, building and loan societies had their origin.

On April 3, 1816, the second bank of the United States was established. The capital was $35,000,000, of which the government took $7,000,000. With the organization of the second bank of the United States pressure was brought to bear on the state banks and they resumed specie payments. Moreover, they increased and prospered. Unlike the first bank of the United States, the second bank had an unfortunate termination and its undoing was largely caused by Andrew Jackson, who was a bitter opponent of the institution. He boldly stated in his message to congress in 1829 that he would veto the bill to renew the charter. He vetoed the bill in 1832 and thence proceeded to remove the government deposits from the bank. This, of course, crippled the institution, since the government had a great deal of money on hand. The old bank ceased to be a United States bank with the expiration of its charter, though under a charter granted by the state of Pennsylvania it operated until 1840. From the expiration of the charter of the second bank of the United States to the time of the Civil War the business of the country was all transacted through state banks. Of course, with banking principles little understood, with the undeveloped condition of the country, with the great area of the country compared to the population, with the imperfect transportation facilities, with the scarcity of both capital and coin, and with lax ideas of redemption, it is no wonder that the record of state banks is somewhat checkered.

In this connection let me say that from the year 1171 to 1829 no government or state or county or municipality or other political subdivision, or bank, as far as I know, had ever guaranteed deposits. In the year 1829 a law was passed by the New York legislature requiring all state banks to contribute to a so-called safety fund to the extent of three per cent. of their capital to take care of the losses of failed banks. This law, which is the parent of the notorious Oklahoma act, came to an ignominious end, and recent months have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that the Oklahoma child will go to an early grave. Michigan and Vermont, which adopted plans similar to that of New York, each experienced a more disastrous failure than did the Empire State, and the states that have followed Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota and Texas—will some day realize the error they have committed.

Our financial history preceding the Civil War reveals the fact that there was a strong sentiment against a central bank. However, the exigencies of the war demanded the raising of large sums of money to meet extraordinary expenses, and because of this fact it was comparatively easy to establish a national banking system, though the system established was a compromise. The purpose of establishing a national banking system was to float government bonds and to provide a national currency. The plan of chartering national banks was proposed in 1861, emphasized in 1862 and made a law in 1863.

This introduces us to the banks of the present time, since the banks of today are the banks of the Civil War times with the changes resulting from a modification of federal and state laws. There are three classes of banking institutions in the country, namely, national banks, which are under the supervision of the government; state banks, which are under the supervision of the several state governments; and private banks, which are under the supervision of the owners. Of the national banks nothing need be said, since they are under the sole direction of the federal government. In the class of state banks are included commercial banks, trust companies and savings institutions. Here we might also mention building and loan associations.

The member here yielded to Mr. Doty, who moved to recess until tomorrow morning at 10:00 o'clock.

Mr. PIERCE: I move to amend to 7:30 this evening.

Mr. FOX: That will upset some of the arrangements of the committees. We have a special meeting of the committee on Legislative and Executive Departments this evening.

A vote being taken, the amendment was carried, and a further vote being taken, the Convention recessed until 7:30 this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by the president, and Mr. Antrim, having yielded to a motion to recess, was again recognized.

Mr. ANTRIM: To resume, Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention, in the brief introduction I gave before the Convention recessed I brought out just one fact and that was that nowhere else in the world has there ever been such a thing as guaranteeing bank deposits.

With this introduction we come to the question, What is the nation doing to make more perfect the system of 7500 national banks, and what are the forty-eight states doing to make more perfect the 17,500 banking institutions which came under their supervision?

I will devote a few minutes to the celebrated Aldrich monetary plan, one of the most ingenious devices to place a nation's banks on a more stable footing ever conceived by a world financier. A few years ago we had a disastrous panic in our country. This panic showed very clearly the weaknesses of our financial system. With the idea of eliminating these weaknesses a commission was appointed by congress to investigate carefully all the great banking systems of the world. The commission took its time and did its work, and a plan has been evolved which, if adopted by congress, will, in the estimation of the great majority of the leading bankers of the country, revolutionize banking conditions in the United States and inaugurate an unexampled period of prosperity in our nation.

The exigencies of the Civil War gave us our present monetary system and we have made few changes in it, with the result that it has become a brake on the wheels of progress. Aldrich tells us that two things have prevented our making changes that would put us on an equal footing financially with the other great nations of the world, and these are our almost inexhaustible natural resources and the wonderful energies of our people. However, after the experience of three very disastrous panics, in the years 1873, 1893 and 1907, each of which caused the loss of billions of dollars, years of business stagnation and indescribable suffering among the poorer classes, the fact is gradually dawning upon us that we can obviate all this by the adoption of a monetary system similar to the monetary systems of Europe, where they have had no panics during the last half century.

Three facts have impressed themselves on all financial experts in connection with the devising of a monetary plan, and these facts are:

1. The people will not accept a central bank, since the banking history of our country shows a strong repugnance to the idea of an institution similar to the government institutions in England, France and Germany.
2. The interests, or "big business," must have no connection with the scheme whatsoever.
3. The plan must be absolutely free from politics.

The Aldrich monetary plan would create a great number of local associations and would place each bank of the country in one of them. These local associations would be united through district associations. And the several district associations would be merged into a great central association, which would have a capital stock equal to one-fifth the capital stock of all the thousands of banks of the country; would be the chief reserve agent of the nation's bank; would handle the note issue of the country, thus giving the most perfect elasticity to our currency; would be the depository and fiscal agent of the government; would be managed by directors representing all the banks of the country; would render perfect the co-operation of all the nation's banks through rediscount, thus making their combined resources an element of strength in times of storm and stress; would make examinations, reports and publicity of all banks much more satisfactory; would give self-government in the banking business and make the financial interests of the country less dependent on Wall street; would give the United States the large profits arising from the handling of the great import and export business of the country, nearly ninety per cent of which is handled by foreign banks; would save the people millions of dollars annually through stable and uniform interest rates, and would be an absolute preventive of panics.

The Aldrich monetary plan is clearly illustrated by A. Piatt Andrew, assistant secretary of the treasury. The fire protection of towns and cities formerly depended on scattered cisterns. A large fire occurring, if the cisterns in the neighborhood of the fire became empty the burning buildings had to be abandoned, although there were millions of gallons of water in other cisterns. After the great Chicago fire a plan was devised of concentrating the water, and the result was our modern water works system. This makes it possible that all available water be concentrated in one place. We have in this country twenty-five thousand banks, each isolated like the fire cisterns of the middle of the last century. In the event of a local financial panic the banks of the locality must depend on themselves. If the strain on them is too great they must fail, though thousands of other banks have an abundance of resources. The Aldrich plan simply combines the resources of all banks, thus making the failure of any sound bank a practical impossibility. All banks would be given the protection guaranteed by the Aldrich plan if they should want it.

We all know that business rests on credit, that credit is based on confidence and that confidence is necessary to the life of our banking institutions with their twenty-one billions of assets, an amount equal to the assets of all the other banks of earth. Lack of confidence has caused every panic in our history. The one aim of the Aldrich monetary plan is to anchor confidence in our national life.

Looking to the safeguarding of depositors, what can we say of the Aldrich plan? We can say that it would be the most effective means ever suggested to any nation in the history of the world to protect the interests of the depositors of its banks. By uniting all banks, giving, in a way, each the strength of all, it would prevent panics and render bank failures extremely rare occurrences.

The next question is, what are the forty-eight states of the Union doing in the management of their seventeen thousand five hundred banking institutions? Within the past few weeks I have made, in connection with the work of the banking committee, sufficient investigation of the banking laws of a number of the states in the Union to warrant my hazarding a few general statements.

1. Many of the states of the Union already have state banking departments, and the remaining, I believe, are soon likely to have them.

2. States are gradually raising the minimum bank capital. In Ohio the minimum capital of incorporated banks is $25,000, which is higher than in many other states. However, the minimum capital of private banks in this state is absolutely nothing, which means that the private banker can operate wholly with the people's money.

3. Regarding the use of the word "bank", some states are very strict, some moderately strict and some have no restrictions whatsoever. A number of states allow only incorporated institutions to call themselves "banks"; other states permit simply those institutions that are supervised and examined by their state banking department to bear the name "bank"; many states have restrictions of a minor character. Ohio has no restrictions.

4. In the matter of the supervising and examining of banks the states are making rapid progress. Perhaps a majority of the states today supervise and examine their incorporated banks; many states insist on supervising and examining all their banks, both state and private; an increasing number of states do not permit private banks.

5. Double liability in the case of the stock of state banks has become so common that few states of the Union still have only single liability.

The tendency among the states, then, is the organization of state banking departments, the raising of the minimum capital of banks, greater strictness respecting the use of the word "bank", the extension of supervision and examination to all banks and the adoption of double liability for incorporated institutions receiving deposits.

Is it not plain to see that all this legislation looks to the protection of the depositor? The depositor seems to be the one person in the minds of legislators in all the bills pertaining to banks and banking that are enacted into law.

To recapitulate: I have given a hasty resume of the history of banking in foreign countries, as well as a brief statement of the history of banking in this country, and I have discovered before the present day only three cases of deposit guarantee, and they were failures; during the present day, five cases, and their future is dark.

Why should one urge a state law looking to the guaranteeing of bank deposits when the Aldrich plan, which I have briefly explained, in some form is sure to be enacted into law by congress, and when the legislatures of all the states of the Union, through rapidly increasing wise banking laws, will eventually make our great banking system by far the safest in the world?

A law guaranteeing bank deposits and requiring all banks to make good the losses of failed banks is a pernicious law that, I think, can point to only two groups of experiments in the history of banking. In the first group, New York, Michigan and Vermont, all were failures; in the second group Oklahoma may be considered a failure, and Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota and Texas, which, influenced by Oklahoma, considered the most accommodating state in the country for trying out all kinds of legislative acts, and affected by the great panic of 1907, passed laws providing for the guaranteeing of bank deposits, have not yet had enough experience under these laws to enable one to pass intelligibly upon them. It may be stated, however, that letters from all these states indicate that enlightened public sentiment has unqualifiedly pronounced against this plan of the state guarantee deposit law.

A law guaranteeing bank deposits is a serious blunder because —

1. There is an absence of precedent in all foreign lands to justify its enactment; it was an absolute failure to New York, Michigan and Vermont many years ago, has in the past four years worked badly in Oklahoma and is likely to be repealed in Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota and Texas. Postal savings banks give all persons who fear banks a chance to deposit their money on interest with the government; the adoption of the Aldrich plan by congress will make our banking systems almost impregnable, and practically all of the forty-eight states are passing better laws to regulate state banks.

2. It would discriminate against the business on which the nation is most dependent. Why force bankers to guarantee their credits and exempt all other business men from guaranteeing their credits? How would you like an amendment to our liquor proposal which would force all liquor men of the state to make good the losses resulting from inebriety, losses of a physical, intellectual and spiritual character, losses to the home, losses to society, losses to the state? Why not group the farmers, the grocers, the merchants and other business men in separate classes and require them to guarantee one another against losses?

3. It would guarantee depositors against loss, but would not guarantee bankers against losses that might be suffered at the hands of depositors who are borrowers. Why not ask all borrowers to insure all banks against losses resulting from bad loans? If this were done there would be no need of guaranteeing deposits. In the nation's banks the deposits reach fifteen billions, though there is only one and one-half billions of money. The thirteen and one-half billions' difference is purely credit. Why should the banker guarantee what he creates to foster the gigantic business of the nation?

4. It would penalize all banks and thousands of stockholders because a comparatively few people deposit their money in bad banks. Can not we trust the people to select safe banks when there are so very few bad banks? In the state of Oregon it has been eloquently said the people are capable of selecting the best men from a ticket containing more than a hundred names and of voting intelligently on thirty-two amendments and laws after having perused a two-hundred-page book. In the name of reason, if the Oregon people can do this are we to doubt the ability of Ohio people to pick one good bank? Moreover, is a whole state to suffer because of the bad judgment of a few people?

5. It would put a premium on dishonesty, recklessness and incompetency, placing them on the same plane with integrity, conservatism and ability. This would result in an increase of the former and a decrease of the latter quality in the banking business. An increase of the former and a decrease of the latter would inevitably lead to an expansion of credit through loans. A large expansion of credit through loans would mean a weakening of the investments of banks on which the safety of deposits depends. And a weakening of the investments of banks would culminate in ultimate demoralization in the financial world.

6. It would destroy millions of dollars in investment values. The stock of many banks, because of the excellence of their record, the superiority of their management and the profitableness of their business commands very high figures, the same being frequently one hundred per cent and more above book values. This difference would disappear if all banks were put on the same plane through a guarantee deposit law. Besides, what would inspire one to build fine buildings, install substantial equipments, select the best available officers and clerks and make an effort to conduct a high-grade business, if all banks would be equally safe? By way of illustration, do you think our young people would make many sacrifices to secure a thorough education, if when their work were all done they would be placed on exactly the same footing with the ignorant?

7. It would lower the business standing of a community. The business of a community is reflected by its banks. Let the banks maintain high standards and a high class of business men is developed; let the ideals of the banks be lowered and the results are soon manifest among the business men. The bank is to the community what the teacher is to the school. Study the teacher and you know the school. Study the bank and you know the community.

8. It would foster panicky times by lowering the standard of bank assets. Some people think panics result from fear that deposits are unsafe. Panics result when people suspect that bank assets have been impaired, and this suspicion developing into a complete loss of confidence, indiscriminate runs on banks start. This can be illustrated by a reference to the panic of 1907, which started on Wall street and spread over the whole country. A few speculators played fast and loose with several New York banks, the people became suspicious regarding the assets of these banks, runs began on scores of banks everywhere, deposits were withdrawn, reserves shrank, loans had to be called, the business world found it necessary to curtail its operations, thousands of men were discharged, business stagnation resulted, millions of money were lost and thousands of people suffered indescribably. Had we then had the government reserve association and the elastic currency contemplated under the Aldrich monetary plan, the damage in this panic would have been confined to the guilty alone, and the rest of the country would have serenely attended to its business. The great trouble was that business could not be fostered by renewals of old loans and the negotiating of new loans because of the withdrawals of deposits and the shrinking of reserves.

9. It would be committing a great evil to eliminate a small one, and one that will continue to grow less from year to year. When one remembers that the capital, surplus and stockholders' liability are all behind the depositor, and when one realizes that these frequently equal the whole sum of the deposits, one sees how unjust such a law would be. The capital, surplus and stockholders' liability of the First National Bank of Cincinnati are fourteen and one-half millions and the deposits twenty-five millions. In this great bank the depositor has over one and one-half dollars behind every dollar he has on deposit. The capital, surplus and stockholders' liability of the Winters National Bank, of Dayton, exceed the deposits by $250,000. So every depositor of this bank has considerably over two dollars of protection for every dollar of deposit.

These are a few of the reasons why a state law guaranteeing bank deposits would be unwise. The committee on Banks and Banking decided such a proposal should not be embodied in our constitution, but recommend in its place double liability for state institutions receiving deposits, and this proposal I hope to see made a part of our organic law.

Mr. ROCKEL: Will the gentleman permit a question?

The PRESIDENT: The time of the gentleman is up. I recognize the delegate from Warren.

Mr. EARNHART: I shall speak only a few minutes. I believe it is in the interest of justice. I believe the depositors should have interest for their money when they place it in banks other than national banks. And I do not believe it will work any hardship against the banks; in fact, I believe there will be a spirit of fraternalism engendered. I mean by that that the banks will have the confidence of the patrons, and that will prevent a rumor making a run upon the banks and thereby embarrassing the banks. I am sure it will be in the interest of the bankers on that account, and I believe, while I am free to say that it does not afford absolute protection, that it goes a long way toward it. I went before the committee by invitation and I told them I was aware of the fact that there would be considerable opposition to an Oklahoma assessment plan and that I would be satisfied as the proponent to have a double liability, the same as we have in the national banks, and the committee has proceeded along that line. Now it seems to me, taking this view of the matter, and reviewing the past, that this proposal ought not to have a very great deal of opposition, because nothing wrong is being asked. It is not going to inflict any hardship, but rather a benefit upon the banks themselves and it needs no extended argument. I do not take any honor on myself for the introduction of this proposal. I want every member of the Convention to share equally with me in giving the people of Ohio the benefit of the provisions of this proposal, and I hope the Convention will consider it and pass it. If there is any amendment proposed that will strengthen this proposal it will meet with my approval. In the end I hope that we may have a measure that will accomplish the end desired.

Mr. WINN: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Between the words "corporations" and "authorized" in line 7 insert the words "other than building and loan associations".

Mr. WINN: I think perhaps a mere reading is sufficient explanation, but for fear that some may misunderstand it I want to say that this amendment is only for the purpose of excluding the building and loan associations from the operation of the proposed amendment to the constitution. It will then read:

Dues from private corporations shall be secured by such means as may be prescribed by law, but in no case shall any stockholder be individually liable otherwise than for the unpaid stock owned by him or her; except that stockholders or corporations other than building and loan associations authorized to receive money on deposit shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporations, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares.

Mr. DOTY: First, on the amendment offered by the delegate from Defiance. I have been in two or three building and loan associations. Those associations in this state are very useful institutions. There is not any question about that. So are banks useful institutions. They each have their sphere, but they overlap in many functions. At any rate the building and loan associations have come to overlap the banks. If you will examine into the building and loan associations you will find that by a stretch of the law any kid lawyer can show you how to start a trust company with $5,000 in cash.

Mr. WINN: You can't do that any more.

Mr. DOTY: That is the law today. I called the roll on it up there at the desk and I know. The only thing you can not do in the building and loan associations is to honor checks; you can not do a commercial banking business, but you can do a savings bank business and the building and loan associations are run as pure savings banks. They like the building and loan association plan better than the other plan and they escape taxes with some other things.

A DELEGATE: They have heretofore.

Mr. DOTY: And they are going to yet, and if any of you think you can come here and beat out the finest lobby that you ever saw, just try it. Just propose something that interferes with the building and loan associations and they fight. Why, gentlemen, this fight this afternoon would not be in it for a minute. They have the best system of getting legislation that they want—and I don't say they shouldn't have it, but they have the best system of getting the legislation they want of any set of people you ever saw in your life. They are the finest lot of gentlemen you ever saw in your life and you can't get away from them.

Mr. JONES: Do you know of any building and loan association in the state of Ohio where the depositors have lost out?

Mr. DOTY: No; I said they were a fine lot of institutions—

Mr. JONES: No, you said they were a fine lot of gentlemen.

Mr. DOTY: I never heard of any of them losing out.

Mr. PECK: I know of several of them that lost out in Cincinnati.

Mr. DOTY: Others have information that I have not. Be that as it may, what is the crying need of this proposal? Did any of you gentlemen ever think of the real reason why ordinary people, not business people as we are, but ordinary people who walk along the street, put money in bank? Why do they put money in bank not taking up the general proposition of saving money—but why do they go into a bank? There are many subsidiary reasons, but the only true reason is that they have the word "bank" over the front door. That may seem hard to substantiate, but I have had some practical experience. I was connected with an institution that was about to open and I put the word "Bank" on the front window. I put it in as big letters as I could, and it was finished about three weeks before we were ready to open, and the next day after that sign was painted, four different people walked in and laid their money down on the counter and wanted to deposit it. They didn't know whether we were in business, they didn't know who we were, but they simply saw that word "bank". That is the reason you put money in bank, and you never stop to think whether there is single liability or double liability.

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

The largest bank in the state of Ohio, the Society for Savings, has not any liability of stockholders—they haven't a single stockholder.

Mr. SHAFFER: It has not any stock and it is not a building and loan association.

Mr. DOTY: It is the largest bank in the state, the Society for Savings. It refuses more money than any bank in Cleveland or Cincinnati or more than the average large bank in any one year takes in, in their savings department, and they have no stockholders and never had any, and if this is passed they still would have no additional liability. What is the crying need for this proposal? Absolutely none. I don't say there is absolutely no need. I say there is absolutely no crying need.

There is much to be said in favor of double liability of banking institutions and much to be said against it, and comparatively speaking it is an unimportant subject. There is no tremendous demand on the part of the people of Ohio for any change in the stock liability of banks.

Mr. EARNHART: What opportunity have you had to find out what is the general opinion of the people of Ohio?

Mr. DOTY: I expect the same opportunities as any individual member has except what you get through the newspapers. I don't say there is absolutely no demand. The fact that the member has introduced it shows there is some demand. The fact that the member from Van Wert made the speech he did, and I suppose it was in favor of it—I didn't quite get the drift of that speech—shows that there is some demand.

Mr. EARNHART: About half of this committee are bankers, and every one on the committee is in favor of this proposition. If they are in favor of it, how can you say there is not a demand for it?

Mr. DOTY: I was in a bank once myself. I never got very far in, and the fact that the bankers do or do not advocate this would have the same effect as the support of any other business men. They are just like any other sort of business men.

Mr. ANTRIM: How did that bank that you refer to get out of having stockholders?

Mr. DOTY: It paid every stockholder in full.

Mr. ANTRIM: I heard it failed.

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; it did not.

Mr. ANTRIM: I understood that it did.

Mr. DOTY: That is like some of the rest of the information you gave us. That bank does not owe a dollar to any living man and it paid its depositors within two months.

Mr. ANTRIM: How much did it pay its stockholders?

Mr. DOTY: It didn't pay its stockholders a cent.

Mr. ANTRIM: They then lost it all?

Mr. DOTY: No; they didn't, and I can't see the drift of your inquiry.

Mr. ANTRIM: I was just paying you back for your complimentary remarks about my speech.

Mr. DOTY: I thought you made a very able speech and I said so. I was not trying to be uncomplimentary. If that is your idea of getting even, go ahead.

Now let us get down to the question of the necessity for the double liability of banks: There is no such necessity as long as the bank is running, and how many bank failures do we have?

Mr. EARNHART: Don't you remember this proposal was introduced just at the time the bank of Gallipolis went down and two other banks were pulled down with it?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. EARNHART: Should not the depositors have some security for their deposits?

Mr. DOTY: Yes. And so ought the stockholders, but the stockholders were in about the same position as the depositors. What took down the two state banks? I don't happen to know myself.

Mr. EARNHART: I do not know that I can recall.

Mr. DOTY: Was it not the failure of a private bank that took the two state banks down and would this proposal have helped that situation any?

Mr. EARNHART: I am not talking about that. I am talking about the depositors.

Mr. DOTY: I don't think that this question is one of such vital importance that we should add it to the constitution to be submitted this fall, and I say that with all due deference to the gentleman who claimed that it ought to be a law. This is not the time to submit such amendments along with more important things in which we are interested, and I therefore move that the proposal and amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. WINN: The motion is not seconded and I ask to be recognized.

Mr. PECK: I second the motion.

The PRESIDENT: We have not been requiring seconds and I think the motion is fairly before the Convention.

Mr. EARNHART: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 14, nays 69, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Brattain,	Malin,	Shaffer,
Doty,	Mauck,	Shaw,

So the motion to table was lost.

The delegate from Defiance was here recognized.

Mr. WINN: I just want to take a few minutes of time to answer some of the arguments offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty], or at least to attempt to answer some of them.

I am very much interested in this amendment and I do not believe that any person interested in the adoption of the proposal will seriously oppose the amendment. It is, as Mr. Doty has said, true that when persons connected with building and loan associations come to the general assembly to prevent certain legislation or to secure legislation which they think ought to pass, they come with arguments that can not be answered by members of the legislature or other persons. The reason they come thus fortified is because they come with the truth on their side. Building and loan associations are in the fullest sense of the word organizations for the benefit of the poor people in the state. Why, in the little town where I live, in a single year, one building and loan association built for the laboring men of that little city fifty-two homes, just one each week. That was a good many years ago and they have been building them ever since. The member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] inquired as to who it is that is in favor of this proposal.

Mr. DOTY: No, who demands it?

Mr. WINN: He wants to know what demand there is for this proposal. There is the simplest answer you ever heard. There are now in Ohio approximately two hundred state banks. When this proposal shall become a part of our constitution it will apply to banks hereafter organized, but it will have no application to the banks now existing.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Are you sure of that?

Mr. WINN: Absolutely sure. There is a contract between the state of Ohio and every bank in existence now and that contract is binding; no lawyer will dispute the proposition that an amendment to the constitution now will not have the effect of relating back and bringing within its provisions the stockholders of institutions that have been formed theretofore.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. WINN: Yes.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford. There was a special committee on banks. The chairman of that committee was Judge Worthington and I believe what I am going to say will be substantiated, that the report was made that this law may affect alike all banks organized hereafter or existing at this time.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Stockholders of a state bank might get together and agree to work under the provisions of this constitution and would not it be in their option?

Mr. WINN: That is it exactly. The stockholders of a given state bank might get together and surrender their charter, and take out one under the double liability law.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: But they will not have to do it?

Mr. WINN: No.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: This proposal does not apply to building and loan associations unless they receive deposits, and if they receive deposits, why should not they be liable?

Mr. WINN: I do not know what the courts may say about it. Of course the building and loan associations receive the money of their stockholders and instead of issuing certificates of deposit as a bank would do they issue certificates of stock and each depositor becomes a stockholder, but that is different from becoming a stockholder in a bank. Of course, that money can not be checked against, and lest some court might say that the words "authorized to receive money on deposit" apply to building and loan associations, I desire to insert these words. They can do no possible harm and they may do a whole lot of good.

Mr. WOODS: Do I understand the member to say this would not apply to the present state banks?

Mr. WINN: I said that.

Mr. WOODS: Then stockholders of most banks now doing business were, when they were organized, responsible under the former double liability clause?

Mr. WINN: A good many of them.

Mr. WOODS: But was not that double liability taken away a few years ago?

Mr. WINN: It never affected any institution organized before it went into effect, and I just collected the double liability from a stockholder of a corporation organized before the amendment to the constitution went into effect.

Mr. DOTY: Is not the double liability, compared with single liability, a handicap to a bank?

Mr. WINN: I do not know. Generally speaking it is, and that is the reason why I say there are two hundred banking institutions in Ohio that are interested in the passage of this proposal; and I say to the member who asked me the question a while ago, and who suggested the appointment of a committee that rendered the opinion to which he refers that I am as fully and firmly convinced as on any legal proposition—and it seems to me that every lawyer will agree to it—that to pass an amendment to the constitution now, as suggested by this proposal, can not apply its provisions to existing banking institutions.

Mr. DOTY: Then would not this proposal have a tendency to prevent the starting of new banks?

Mr. WINN: That is what I had been considering when I said that there are in Ohio two hundred other banking institutions that are interested in the passage of this proposal, and they are interested because it will not affect their institutions, but will hinder the organization of any new bank.

Mr. LAMPSON: If the existing provision in the constitution which exempts them from double liability did not affect those in existence when that provision was adopted, on what theory could this provision affect them?

Mr. WINN: I do not say it will not. It will not affect any then in existence. I perhaps was at fault in saying there were two hundred institutions interested. I should have included as interested only the number that have been organized since the constitution was amended by taking out the double liability.

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. EVANS: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. EVANS: My point of order is that the gentleman's amendment and his remarks are totally out of order and not germane to the question. He knows, as everybody knows, that a building and loan association deposit can only be invested in mortgages, and when banks are mentioned it can not possibly have any reference to this subject.

The PRESIDENT: The remarks of the gentleman are in order.

Mr. WINN: In answer to that I want to say there is nothing in this proposal that by express terms has reference to banks. It has reference to corporations. It reads, "except that stockholders of corporations authorized to receive deposits", and that might be held to apply to building and loan associations. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I came in late. I caught some part of this statement and some reference was made to an opinion expressed by a sub-committee on banking of which Judge Worthington was chairman. I should like to hear what that statement was.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I made a statement that that sub-committee had stated that if this proposal passed it would affect all existing state banks.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I was a member of the committee on Banking and my recollection is that when we asked that question of Judge Worthington the answer was diametrically opposite to the statement made by you, and the conclusion was—what we drew from it as a practical question—that all the old banks would be forced to reorganize as a business proposition in competition with the new banks, because the business man would say he would deposit with a new bank on account of the double liability rather than with the old bank that has only single liability.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Mr. Cunningham was a member of that sub-committee.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I have been trying to get the floor to make a few remarks, but I will answer this inquiry. The committee was unanimously of the opinion that it did apply at once when adopted to every banking corporation in the state of Ohio, without any question. Just three or four years ago this very question came up and they took away the double liability, and if the gentleman's view is right these corporations are still subject to double liability. Nobody claims that. More than that, the corporation is a creature of the law. It is subject not only to the laws existing then, but to any other that may be passed thereafter. That is a fundamental principle of the present constitution and every lawyer ought to know it.

Mr. Brown, of Highland, here requested recognition.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Highland wants to ask the member from Defiance a question.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No; I want to make some remarks.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Highland is not seeking the floor to ask a question then.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to ask a question.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Just a minute: Did the member from Defiance say there were five hundred state banks that favored this proposition?

Mr. WINN: I said they were interested in this. I don't know whether they are all favorable to it or not.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: The president of the bankers' association sent out over two hundred letters to the bankers and state banks of Ohio and he made the statement before the committee that he had received seventy-five replies. Thirty-five were against it and forty favored it.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I want to call your attention to this proposal and to the terms of it. There was a unanimous opinion of the committee that this would not apply to building and loan associations unless they received deposits. There is a large class of associations that profess to be building and loan associations, but they are doing a banking business. Go into one of their offices and you will see persons coming in and depositing and checking money. You would not know that you were not in a real bank. I was in the town of Mansfield a short time ago and went into a bank, or I thought I had gone into a bank, and it turned out to be a building and loan association. They were receiving deposits, paying out on checks and doing every thing that any bank in the state of Ohio is allowed to do apparently. Now this would apply to that kind of a building and loan association; there is no question about that, and it ought to apply to a concern of that kind. The subcommittee thought so and the whole committee thought so. The amendment to section 3, article XIII, in substance provides, first that certain corporations shall have only single liability and it gives exceptions:

Except that stockholders of corporations authorized to receive money on deposit shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such corporations, to the extent or amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares.

That amendment was intended simply to apply to corporations receiving deposits as banks receive deposits, and it applies not at all to the ordinary building and loan associations. It has not the slightest application to them. When the gentleman talks about five hundred private banks of Ohio he is mistaken. I think there are two hundred and thirty-one and not five hundred. This proposal is for the benefit of not only depositors, but the banks themselves, because they expressed themselves to the committee—at least some of them did to me—that they felt they were somewhat under a cloud from the fact that the national banks were doubly liable to their depositors and therefore they could demand deposits which the state banks could not demand. They therefore ask for their own benefit that their stockholders should be made subject to double liability also.

Now there have been failures in the private banks in the state of Ohio and depositors have lost. If this measure goes into effect I take it that there will be no opportunity of loss. If there is any loss to depositors it would be in a very special case.

As to the question whether a stockholder in a bank existing now is liable, I have not the least doubt in the world that he is liable. The instant the people pass this proposal every banking corporation becomes doubly liable on their stock. They become subject to double liability, because of what? Because they are creatures of the law. They have been created by law and are subject not only to existing laws, but any law that may be passed affecting them. There is no question about that. It was only three or four years ago that the legislature submitted an amendment taking away the double liability. What lawyer holds now that the stockholders of those banks existing at the time that amendment went into effect are doubly liable still under the present amendment?

Mr. KNIGHT: If there were a creditor of any one of those banks at the time the double liability existed and this amendment you referred to changed the double liability to single liability, could that creditor be deprived of his rights under the liability against the stockholders of that corporation?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No; and I didn't say any such nonsense as that, because the liability had existed at the time the amendment fixing single liability was passed. But if a liability came after that amendment providing single liability was passed, they would not be doubly liable. I take it for granted that a good many others know nearly as much as I do and some may know more, but I think I know enough to say that if this law passes it affects every corporation that is receiving deposits in the state of Ohio the instant it goes into effect.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Do you mean it would affect private banks?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No; only corporations. That matter was considered in the committee and we considered we had no power or authority to require them to be doubly liable. They don't own stock. We don't know how to reach them.

Mr. LAMPSON: What effect would this proposal, if adopted, have upon the market value of the stock of state banks?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I do not think it would have any effect at all, because it is as much to the advantage of the banks to have this double liability as it can be to any one else. The credit of the bank has increased. Thereby its deposits are increased, and its profits are increased. Consequently, this proposal is for the benefit of the stockholder and not to his detriment. It is also to the benefit of the depositors of the bank. By these means the depositor secures himself against loss.

I can say, since this matter has come up, I have carefully examined the laws of Ohio and the laws of the several states, and we have, without question, the best banking law in the United States applicable to private banks, and it needs only this to make it as perfect as can be. Some of the other states have the double liability, and in that respect they are better off now than we are, but if we put this in, the state of Ohio will have the best banking system in the United States beyond any question.

Mr. KRAMER: I want to ask you about the liability of persons connected with private banks as compared with the liability of those connected with state banks. Is it not a fact that the men connected with the private banks are liable for all they are worth?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Certainly.

Mr. KRAMER: The member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] suggested the building and loan associations had the finest lobby ever organized in the state, and that they always got their demands. I would like to ask if there were any lobbies before the Convention on the part of the building and loan associations arguing against this proposition?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No; the superintendent of banks, at the request of the committee, wrote to the private corporations asking them how they felt about this matter of double liability, and a great many of them wrote back saying they preferred to have it, that it would increase their business and increase the confidence in the bank, and that they were altogether in favor of it.

Mr. KRAMER: Did you get any word from the building and loan associations in any way that they were opposing the measure?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Not at all, because they supposed they were not liable and did not come under this proposal in any way. And I don't think they do. If they received deposits, of course, they would come under.

Mr. SHAFFER: Do you hold this would not apply to the stockholders in the building and loan associations?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Certainly not.

Mr. SHAFFER: Then have you any objections to the amendment of the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN]?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I turn that question over to Mr. Earnhart.

Mr. SHAFFER: In your mind there is some question that that might apply to the stockholders of the building and loan associations?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: It will apply if they receive deposits. There is no question about that, and we intended that it should.

Mr. SHAFFER: I mean to all borrowers of building and loan associations. They are stockholders under the law of Ohio.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: No; I don't think so.

Mr. SHAFFER: Is not that the law on which the building and loan associations are founded, that all borrowers from the building and loan association are stockholders and stock is issued to them for the amount of loans made to them?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Some of them.

Mr. SHAFFER: Is not that the law of Ohio?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I don't think so.

Mr. SHAFFER: It certainly is.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I will say frankly that I do not understand the law applicable to building and loan associations as well as many of the other members of the Convention. I was in a building and loan association for five years and president of it, and I know there was no stock liability in that association.

Mr. SHAFFER: Then would you object to the amendment of the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN]?

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I am not objecting. If Mr. Earnhart is willing to accept that amendment I am not objecting, but I do not think it is necessary; and if they receive deposits they ought to come within the provisions of this proposal.

Mr. STOKES: What do you mean by receiving "deposits"?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I mean just what the word says.

Mr. STOKES: The building and loan association receiving deposits and making loans on real estate—that is not a bank.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Oh, no; they pay in their assessments once a month or once a week.

Mr. STOKES: Then if they receive a deposit they are not banks?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Those are not deposits in the meaning of the law.

Mr. EARNHART: I am not a lawyer, but my impression of the whole matter is that it does not apply to the building and loan associations unless they are using that name and doing what we properly apply to a bank, in receiving deposits. Corporations of that kind ought to come under the provisions of this proposal. I think that ought to be clear.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Perhaps you have not noticed it, but I have made only one or two little speeches, and occasionally put a question. I have asked several questions, but really have made few speeches. But I have almost got out of the notion of making this speech because I have been so long in getting the floor, there being so many ahead of me. I can not realize why there should be any objection to the passage of this proposal even though it will disturb the banks in their present system, which I doubt very much. Notwithstanding the opinions expressed by able lawyers on the floor, I believe the stock itself has inherent rights when the stock is bought under the charter of single liability; that stock itself has rights, and you can not change it from the conditions under the charter after the innocent purchaser is in possession of it.

But that is neither here nor there. I stated to the member from Defiance, and he pooh-poohed the idea, that the bankers who are now doing business under the state laws of single liability could come together and agree with their depositors, even though this proposal did not bind them, that they would stand for double liability and it would hold. There is no question about that, I think, because that would be an agreement which would have the same effect as a contract or gift, neither of which can be nullified by the processes of law. There would not have to be any surrender of charter or anything of the sort for that kind of a thing, provided the proposal doesn't retroact and the stockholders of existing state banks want to come under this rule.

The gentleman from Harrison stated that when the tax was taken off municipal bonds of the state it went right on and everybody had the tax off his bonds and it was effective from the beginning; that is true, but it carried with it no damage to any one. But if those bonds had been bought with exemption from taxation and any other law had attempted to place taxation upon them, after contracting with the owners of the bonds that they should not be taxed, it would be a question of damage and a question of whether or not they would have to stand it. The state bankers of Ohio, I think, are the people who are demanding it—in answer to the question of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory]—and they are demanding it because they are working at a disadvantage in competition with national banks where national banks have a double liability and all the national banks of this state, I think, have a double liability. There are some national banks that have not double liability, but the state banks are laboring under a disadvantage of an argument from the national banks that the state banks have no responsibility other than the stock they have bought and the national banks have a double liability, and, besides, the government is behind them. They work that for all it is worth to the disadvantage of the state bankers, and the state bankers themselves therefore are demanding it, and if it has a retroactive effect they will voluntarily work under its provisions. I think there is no question about that, and I do not see why any one would object to passing this. I do not think it will affect anybody but the bankers, and if the bankers are demanding it, why not give it to them? If it is not of sufficient importance for us to put it in the constitution and submit it to the people as it is, then I think we can make it right by adding the amendment which the member from Medina has prepared.

Mr. SHAFFER: What was the amendment that was offered? Was it the one with reference to building and loan associations?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The member from Defiance wishes me to explain that the member from Medina has an amendment—

Mr. SHAFFER: Has he proposed it yet?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No.

Mr. SHAFFER: Then we don't know what it is.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No, but if this is not sufficiently important, as suggested by the member from Cuyahoga, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Medina will make it very important, if he submits it.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: Did you say not all of the national banks have double liability?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Yes.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: I would like to ask Mr. Brown if that is true? I was under the impression that all of the national banks did have double liability.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: There are one or two banks in New York and one in Chicago which, under an act of congress, enjoy the same privilege they enjoyed before they became national banks. This was brought about by a process of special legislation by the congress of the United States. Congress is not confined to general legislation as we are in Ohio.

Mr. WINN: But I assume when congress passed the banking law they applied to those banks specially organized after that. Is not that correct?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The double liability was passed before these banks came in and they were made exempt by a special act.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: The bank in Philadelphia had a right to retain its old name, I believe, the Bank of North America.

You will find there is no mention of its being a national bank, but I did not know that they escaped double liability. I did not understand Mr. Antrim to say that.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Oh, there are several banks in the United States that are not under double liability, and if Mr. Antrim stated that all national banks had double liability he was in error.

Mr. ANTRIM: There are two or three national banks in the country that were organized under special charters, and for that reason they have the same single liabilities that they had before the national banks were organized.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: But nearly every national bank in the country is under double liability?

Mr. ANTRIM: Yes; there are just two or three that are not.

Mr. WINN: They were organized before the passage of the law?

Mr. ANTRIM: No; they were private banks then.

Mr. SHAFFER: Does the gentleman from Highland tell us that the state bankers have asked for this proposal and have recommended that we pass such a proposal?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I didn't make it as strong as that, but, being connected with a state bank myself, I have talked with a good many state bankers. I looked for this proposal to come up and I have consulted with a number of persons connected with state banks. I have asked them what position they would take on it, should it come up, and they said they were perfectly indifferent to it, some of them, and others said they would favor the proposal because they have no fear of the double liability and it would benefit them in their business.

Mr. SHAFFER: Was there any suggestion made that this would be a better proposition for them than having the state guarantee the deposits?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No banker has any thought of indorsing such a wild-cat scheme as that.

Mr. SHAFFER: I know no banker would, but do not some people?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Nobody who really knows anything about the situation would advocate such a thing.

Mr. SHAFFER: Have not some of the states indorsed it?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Yes; and every one to their great regret and sorrow, and for the real and absolute destruction of the integrity of their banking business.

Mr. SHAFFER: Have not some of the states had this inaugurated and has it not proved successful?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Never.

Mr. SHAFFER: Has not the state of Kansas?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: It has just gone through with it.

Mr. SHAFFER: Is it not satisfactory?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No, sir; it is not.

Mr. SHAFFER: Is there any movement on foot to repeal that law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I don't know, but I know from the bankers of Kansas that they think it is an utter failure.

Mr. FLUKE: Have you any knowledge of any depositor having lost any money in Oklahoma?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: No; and I haven't any knowledge of any depositor having lost any money in Nebraska or any other of those states.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: With reference to double liability, of course that doesn't apply to contracts before the law was passed, but it does adhere to all liability incurred after the law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Of course that is all I have contended for.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I hadn't intended to speak on this matter, but I want to correct some things that have been stated.

It has been stated that the state banks of Ohio favor this proposal and want it to become a part of the constitution. Mr. Earnhart introduced a proposal which I believed in thoroughly. I spent four years in Oklahoma and know the working of the guarantee law there as well as any man, because I investigated it thoroughly, but I do not believe in Ohio, where we are lending money at five, six and seven per cent, we want the same laws that they do where they are lending money at ten, fifteen and twenty per cent, although I believe firmly in the guaranteeing of deposits. However, as I suggested to Mr. Earnhart, I do not believe the guaranteeing of deposits will work in the state of Ohio, and the best thing would be to get double liability. This suggestion was not from the state bank, but from the committee. I am interested in national banks and also state banks, and therefore I know whereof I am talking. I am also interested in national and state banks of Oklahoma, and I know what I am talking about there.

Now we have heard a good deal said about this being a detriment in Oklahoma. Go out there and you will find it different. I have been there when banks failed and I have investigated failures.

Mr. WINN: I don't understand, and I wish you would repeat the result of the workings of the guarantee law in Oklahoma?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: It would take too long for you to sit and listen to it. I saw four banks fail and there was not one of the stockholders lost a dollar, and three of the banks are still in existence. The first bank was the State Bank of Bartlesville. Then there was a Tulsa bank, which is still running, and one in Oklahoma City where the depositors were paid every dollar. There was not any run on any of the three banks when they failed three years ago. It was announced in all the papers of the state of Oklahoma that these banks had failed. The Bartlesville bank was reorganized and is now a national bank. There was no run at all, and only $15,000 was drawn out.

Mr. WINN: I want to know whether the statement of the member from Highland to the effect that the people of Oklahoma are in sackcloth and ashes because of the passage of the guarantee law is confirmed by your experience?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I can answer that question very thoroughly. I have seen reports in the newspapers that they were, but you could not find a stockholder or depositor out there who agrees with those reports. I have seen in the papers that the banks were dissatisfied in paying those assessments and that the committee had over $1,000,000 out on mortgages, which upon investigation proved incorrect. As Mr. Brown said, the papers did make that report all over the state of Oklahoma, but the people of Bartlesville and Tulsa are not dissatisfied as claimed.

Now, as to the attitude of the banks of Ohio on this matter of double liability. As claimed in the committee, we called in the president of the Bankers' Association of the State of Ohio and asked him if the state banks would stand for this, and he sent out over two hundred inquiries to the banks. He received seventy-five replies and thirty-five were against double liability and forty favored it.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: You stated a minute ago that the bank you had previously referred to had now become a national bank—I mean the one out at Bartlesville, Oklahoma.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Yes.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Is it not true that, on account of the guarantee, a large percentage of state banks have become national banks in order to get out of being required to make all the wild-cat institutions of the state good?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I believe in the last year there have been forty-five banks merged into national banks. It was reported last January that the assessment was too high, but it was not because of wild-cat banking but because of the failure of four banks.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Under that guaranty system is it not possible for any kind of a wild-cat bank to start business and have credit and standing on account of the high class banks?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I don't think any more so than here.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Are you familiar with the failure of the—

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Yes, I know the president, Mr. Norton, very well. He was a personal acquaintance of mine and he is now on his way to the penitentiary.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Didn't that cause a tremendous draft on the guarantee fund, one that the state has never recovered from?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: No, and I know, for I was right there. I know that Mr. Norton, the president, went to Wellsville, New York, and brought back $900,000.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Did not the stockholders lose something?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I think they did, but Mr. Norton went to Wellsville, New York, negotiated $900,000 and paid that into the bank three days after the failure and kept it running.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Didn't that failure depreciate and deplete the guaranty fund so the state of Oklahoma has never recovered from that failure? Is not that the reason the state banks are going out and becoming national banks?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: No; I don't think the guaranty fund paid much money into that. Mr. Norton made it good himself. We went to Wellsville, New York, and borrowed $900,000. I don't think that was what depleted it. I think it was another one.

Now, I have forgotten just where I was when they interrupted me. I believe I was talking about the statement that the bankers of the state of Ohio favored this proposition. A lot of those banks were organized under double liability and that has been changed to single liability. We went to the president of the bankers' association, as I stated, and he sent out circulars, and out of seventy-five replies thirty-five were against the double liability and forty in favor of it. Then the committee was appointed to draw this substitute bill to provide double liability. That committee made a report back, and as far as the building and loan associations were concerned they made a statement, drawn up by five lawyers, and Mr. Worthington was chairman of that committee. That statement was in substance that this proposal didn't affect any building and loan association except those that did a banking business, which we know some of them are doing. It is only those that are receiving deposits that are checked out that will be affected. We were in two or three in Mansfield that were doing a banking business and there are others in Cincinnati, and these attorneys framed the proposal so it would affect the building and loan associations that do a banking business, but not those that are engaged strictly in the building and loan association business.

Mr. Doty said, "I have been up against the building and loan association lobby", and, like him, I say it is the finest lobby I ever went against in my life. I have seen the senate chamber so crowded with building and loan association men that you could hardly get through and it was the finest lot I ever went up against. I have only made this statement to clear off the effect of the statement that the state banks were wanting this bill. It was not suggested by the state banks, but by the committee, because we didn't want to apply in Ohio the guaranteeing of bank deposits by law.

Mr. KNIGHT: With the trend the discussion has taken we are in danger of losing the especial purpose of this proposal, namely, that it is in the interests of the people, of the depositors, and not in the interest of the banks themselves. We haven't been talking about the people. All the talk has been directed toward the banks and whether they were in favor of it. The proposition is in the interest of a majority of the people instead of the banks. It is for the people who are not stockholders, but who may sometimes become depositors. A bank acts in a fiduciary capacity and receives other peoples' money on deposit, and it may fairly be required to give better security than that of a single liability on the stock. Down to 1903 the incorporated banks of this state were like all other corporations of the state—the stockholders were subject to double liability. In the modification of the constitution at that time the banks were relieved of the double liability by what I think was a mistake. They should not have been relieved and other corporations should have been.

Now, it is another fact that single liability state banks in comparison with the national banks are under a handicap. The people of the state of Ohio in attempting to organize state banks as compared with national banks are handicapped, so there is a handicap on our people by the single liability, whether they are bankers or depositors. I fully agree with you about the bankers having no objection, and in fact some of them having a desire to have this passed so they can get deposits on the same plane as the national banks.

As to the building and loan associations, there are many of them which receive deposits and do a banking business under the guise of building and loan associations, and there is absolutely no reason why the stockholders of a few of these building and loan associations, that really do a banking business and take money on deposit subject to withdrawal upon checks or upon expiration of the time certificate, should escape liability. They are doing a banking business and receiving deposits within the purview of the provision, and I do not see why the stockholders of such an organization should not be subject to double liability.

As to the desirability of the measure at this time, it seems to me it is one of the most important practical measures in behalf of the people of the state that has been suggested here since we were called together, and after we have disposed of four or five propositions I do not think we should turn everything else loose. I think this proposition is a highly meritorious one and it should be passed.

Mr. JONES: I was a member of the Banking committee and a member of the sub-committee to investigate the question which the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] raised in the discussion of this matter. Judge Worthington was also on that committee.

Judge Worthington, when the question was first raised in the committee, expressed as his first impression of the question just what Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, has stated in your hearing. It did not strike me that way on first blush and I expressed a contrary opinion, and that is the reason probably why I was appointed on that sub-committee. Judge Worthington made a thorough investigation and submitted the result of his labors in a written memorandum. I did the same, and the conclusion that both of us reached was that there was no doubt that this provision, if enacted, would apply to existing banks the same as to banks that should hereafter be organized. It only takes a little reference to some fundamental principles to make that apparent. As suggested by one member a charter issued by the state in favor of a corporation sounds in contract, and on first impression one would say that such a contract can not be changed at the will of one of the parties, that it takes two to consent to the change of the contract just as it took two to make the contract; but we found when we came to examine the question that all cases decided by our supreme court that had arisen under the constitution of 1802, had repudiated that doctrine upon the theory that the people, being supreme, the state making the corporation had a right to unmake it, that that was power belonging to the people, and the legislature could not surrender it. Therefore, the supreme court of Ohio held, notwithstanding there was no constitutional provision to that effect, that the legislature could unmake and modify these charters. We found also in the case of the Piqua Branch of the State Bank of Ohio vs. Treasurer of Miami Co., 16 Howard, 369, that it was organized under a special statute enacted in 1845, which gave it certain privileges, among which was the right to be taxed, not as other persons were going to be taxed, but it was to pay as taxes six per cent on its net earnings, I believe, and there were some other provisions in its favor. An act was passed in 1851, requiring the property of the bank to be taxed by a different rule. In the litigation which followed, the contentions of the Piqua bank that the legislature could not change its charter were decided against it by the supreme court of Ohio, and the bank carried the case to the supreme court of the United States. That court held that the charter issued by the state was in the nature of a contract between the corporation and the state, which the state, without the consent of the corporation, could not change. There were a number of other cases in which the same question had been raised. When the constitutional convention of 1851 met there was a provision put in the constitution to meet that situation. That was one of the principal things that induced the incorporation of the provision I am about to refer to in the constitution of 1851. The supreme court of the United States, having held that a charter was in the nature of a contract and could not be altered or abridged without the consent of the corporation, it was provided in section 2 of article XIII as follows: "Corporations may be formed under general laws, but all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed." Therefore if gentlemen will take the pains to examine the decisions since 1851, they will find in every single one of them the court has held that there is a reservation of legislative power over those charters of corporations created under the authority of the constitution and the laws that might be enacted under it, to revoke, repeal or recall the charters at any time the legislature saw fit." So it has resulted since then that every corporation coming into existence does so with the knowledge that its rights under its charter may be changed, or that they may be entirely taken away from it. In other words, there is no longer any contractual relations between the state and the corporations such as existed prior to 1851 under the decision of the supreme court of the United States.

I can not take the time now to cite to you the cases in support of the proposition, but it is a mere matter of running them down. That being the case, every bank or other corporation that is now in existence receiving money on deposit, will be affected by this proposed amendment. The language "receiving money on deposit" was taken from the banking statutes of Ohio and the national banking act, because "receiving money on deposit" has many times received the construction of the courts and has a well-defined and definite meaning in law. It simply means a corporation which is receiving money with the expectation of paying it out on demand or at an agreed time. A corporation such as a building and loan association which issues stock and receives money from time to time merely as payments on that stock does not come within the definition of a corporation "receiving money on deposit." It is only those corporations that receive money under an implied or express contract that they will pay it out on demand or at a specified time that will come within the provisions of this amendment.

As has been suggested here, national banks have double liability. All those who are interested in private banks, and there are about as many of them as there are state banks, have unlimited liability. A man who has a share of stock in a joint stock company engaged in the banking business is liable for every dollar he is worth, and it was thought that state banks should at least be on the same footing as national banks. This matter did not come from the state banks. There was no demand from that source, and there can not be any reason why they should want it, such as suggested by the gentleman from Defiance. The depositors are the only ones primarily interested in the matter. The argument to the committee for asking this amendment was that the interest of the depositors were liable to suffer by having men permitted to engage in the banking business under the special privileges allowed by statute and be entirely relieved from any personal responsibility. I think if it could be done—and I concede that under the existing sentiment on the question it can not be done—but if it could be done, I would make every man that engages in the banking business either as a corporation or as an individual, liable without limit for the debts of the bank. I do not think the state should grant either a partial or entire exemption from liability to those who receive the money of the people on deposit in banks. This certainly would be in the interest of the depositor. There can be no objection to having the man who is a stockholder in a state bank at least fully liable with a stockholder in a national bank. As has been suggested here, no state banker should have any objection to double liability.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Would you have any objection to placing private banks under the supervision of the banking department?

Mr. JONES: That is a matter that has no relevancy to the question at issue, but speaking on the question of liability, there can not be any complaint against the private banker, because he is liable for every dollar he is worth. He is not asking any special privileges. He is not doing business on any different footing from the merchant or the manufacturer. He is not asking any favors of exemptions or any privileges. He says to you, "I am willing that you depositors shall take every dollar I am worth to pay the debts of the business I am conducting," but the situation is different with reference to state banks. They ask special privileges. They are asking exemptions.

As I say, I do not think the state bankers as a rule will object to this double liability. Those that I have talked to say, "Certainly we are not objecting to it." Some of them were much in favor of it because it will prevent a criticism that is now sometimes directed against the state bank by those interested in national banks, that the national banks have more liability behind their concerns than the state banks have. Therefore, most of the state banks would not object to this liability, and certainly no depositor would object to it. Nobody, I think, could say for one moment that this provision would not be in the interest of the depositor. One gentleman on the floor asked, "Who is demanding this?" Everybody who has lost money in a corporation engaged in the banking business when there was double liability would certainly demand it, and everybody liable hereafter to lose money by reason of complete exemption from liability will demand it. A good many banks have failed in Ohio where depositors lost heavily. I know one within ten miles of our county seat which recently failed and wound up with a loss to the depositors of about $70,000, even after the double liability of the stockholders was enforced. There was a double liability upon $25,000 worth of stock and every stockholder who could respond paid up and it saved the depositors that much. That is one instance, and quite a number of others could be cited. It takes no stretch of imagination to see that in cases that may come, as they have come heretofore, when a large number of banks might fail, that it would be a protection to every depositor to have this double liability against the stockholders of state banks. In view of the fact the state banks themselves are not opposing it and the depositors can't oppose it, because it clearly is in the interest of the depositor, I think it certainly should be adopted.

Some objection is made on behalf of the building and loan associations. There can not be any objection on the part of the building and loan association that is conducting merely a building and loan association business. If a building and loan company is engaged in the banking business, is receiving money on deposit and is liable to have to pay it out on demand or at a specified time, it is doing a banking business and not doing a building and loan association business. It is securing money from depositors and giving the depositors in lieu of that money nothing but a contract obligation to repay it, just the same as a depositor in a state bank or in a national bank receives, and when a building and loan corporation puts itself in the attitude where it wants to substitute its promises to pay in lieu of hard cash, I submit there ought not to be any hesitancy about saying that a stockholder in such a corporation should be doubly liable. It certainly is not asking much to have them merely doubly liable upon their stock the same as stockholders will be in other corporations that are asking people to exchange hard cash for a mere promise to pay.

The delegate from Brown county [Mr. KEHOE] was here recognized.

Mr. THOMAS: I have been on the floor asking for recognition every time a speaker has yielded the floor, and I want to object to being overlooked by the president.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Cuyahoga has no rights superior to those of any other member.

Mr. THOMAS: But I have equal rights and I want them.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Brown has been recognized.

Mr. THOMAS: I have been on the floor every time trying to be recognized and I insist on my rights.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Cuyahoga county is out of order.

Mr. KEHOE: I, like the member from Highland [Mr. BROWN], am a little bit shy about sticking in my oar when the other members are talking. We are modest in our part of the state anyhow. But, gentlemen, I happen to be a member of this committee on Banking and I know something about this proposal and the way it came before this body. I offered Proposal No. 116, which contained the principal idea that is embodied in this proposal. The member from Warren [Mr. EARNHART] had in our committee a proposal something along the guarantee line, but we, of the Banking committee, in order to ease that down somewhat, concluded we would take the material we had offered and had in stock and give the Convention something that would be of an easy nature as compared with the original articles. Hence we have reported this Proposal No. 93. The proposal is simple. All that there is of it is good. I do not believe there is anything dangerous or harmful in it. If it were left to me I could stand it stronger than it is. In fact, I could stand for the bank guaranty. While some of my banker friends may cross their hands in horror, yet I absolutely believe if it were incorporated in the national banking laws today we would have the safest plan we would ever have and would be away ahead of the Aldrich plan, but I don't believe it would be a proper thing for the great state of Ohio to encounter the opposition that would come from everywhere if we were to adopt such a thing. That is the trouble with Oklahoma, Nebraska, Kansas and every other state that has attempted it. They are fighting the combined influence of the money power of the banks that oppose it all over the United States, and in those states where it is proposed as a remedy. Yet I say if it were in the national bank act and the national banks were under such a regime the whole United States, all the banks of the United States, would soon be under that system, and I can conceive of nothing better in the United States today than that. Do you know that you can not get a dollar of the state's money or the money of a township, county or municipality into any bank unless the bank absolutely guarantees its safe return? Why in the name of common sense, is it that the people's money—the money of the poor people—is not treated in the same way that the bigger money concerns are treated? It is not fair and it is not right. Although I am a national banker and interested in national banking and am running one I would be glad to see such a condition. I would be glad to see released that reserve now held intact in a bank, doing nothing—only remaining there. There are millions stored up in national banks, not in circulation and not in use, just standing there as a reserve against anything that might come along. Now, if we have an absolute guaranty there would be no run, there would be no panic and there would be no need of a surplus lying idle in our banks. In some large institutions the reserves are sealed up from the time the bank examiner comes around until he returns. If the seal is not open, he knows it is in there still untouched. All that money lies idle there for emergencies that might arise. I went through the panic of 1907 and I should not like to run into one oftener than every ten years.

Mr. HOSKINS: If you will yield for a minute I would like to send an amendment to the desk and you can discuss it.

Mr. KEHOE: No, I don't want to yield. I don't want any proposition to that effect in the state of Ohio. I don't want the state of Ohio to attempt to carry such a proposition. I do not want the state of Ohio to encounter the opposition that Kansas and Nebraska are encountering and be held up as a radical all over the country. I think the proposition is all right myself and I believe in it, but I have feeling for others. I am not the only pebble on the beach.

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to ask a question to find out how to vote. I see this language employed in the proposal "not one for another". As it is now would the depositors be better protected if this became a part of the constitution with "not one for another" in it? Would not the depositors receive less security with that language than they do now?

Mr. KEHOE: That language is copied from the national banking act.

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't care where it comes from. I want to know what it means.

Mr. KEHOE: That means that each stockholder stands for his own liability. I believe it is incorporated in the state constitution as a protection to the depositors, and as far as I can learn it is the wish of the state banks to comply with it. It puts them on the same footing as the national banks, and they will be in a position to compete equally and fairly with the national banks. The statement is constantly heard that the national banks are good for double their stock while the state banks are good only for single liability and that gives the national bank a little more prestige. There is also a feeling throughout the country that Uncle Sam looks after the national banks pretty carefully and that that has a tendency to make the stockholders and officers of the bank stand straight and do the proper kind of thing, although sometimes they do go wrong on the inside. Conversing with the superintendent of banks in this state, I find that he is highly in favor of this proposal to apply to state banks. It puts them in a better light in comparison with the national banks.

Mr. SHAFFER: What is your attitude toward the amendment of the gentleman from Defiance, excepting the stockholders of the building and loan associations?

Mr. KEHOE: That was discussed in the committee too. We think the plain building and loan associations, where they do not go into the banking business, are not included in this at all, but there are some building and loan associations that are doing business today, receiving deposits and holding them subject to check, and we think they should be under the same law as banks.

Mr. SHAFFER: In view of the large number of stockholders in the building and loan associations throughout the state, would it not add popularity to this proposal if we specifically except from the double liability the building and loan associations?

Mr. KEHOE: There is no objection to their being exempt where they do not attempt to do a banking business, but where they do attempt to do a banking business they should not be exempt and each member of the building and loan association—stockholder or shareholder—is the one that assumes the responsibility or liability.

Mr. SHAFFER: Where they borrow and thus become stockholders, to that amount under this proposal they will become liable?

Mr. KEHOE: Yes; if they are doing a banking business, but if they are doing straight building and loan association business they would not.

Mr. PECK: Does not this proposal make them liable for the face of their stock?

Mr. KEHOE: Yes.

Mr. PECK: Suppose a man takes stock for $1,000, to be paid in in the ordinary manner and on this he has paid $50 or $100; is he to be assessed on the face of his stock if the concern fails?

Mr. KEHOE: He would not be assessed at all unless the association was doing a banking business.

Mr. PECK: Does not that stock represent a liability rather than an asset? Is not that the trouble—that he has stock, but it is something he has to pay on? The stock doesn't amount to anything like stock in a bank.

Mr. KEHOE: No; there is a question whether it would come under that proposal.

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. PECK: That is it. You had better exempt it. You will raise a hornet's nest if you don't. You will wish you had never been born.

Mr. STOKES: Any company can take advantage of the sixty days' notice and they don't have to pay on demand.

Mr. KEHOE: That is the law.

Mr. STOKES: They don't have to pay on demand. They are entitled to sixty days.

Mr. KEHOE: Yes, and whenever they get in a close place they use that.

Mr. STOKES: But a bank has to pay on demand or close its doors.

Mr. KEHOE: Oh, no.

Mr. STOKES: I am not talking about savings banks, but about general banks. They have to pay out the money or close their doors, while the building and loan associations are entitled to sixty days' notice and you can not get your money in less than sixty days.

Mr. KEHOE: No, the national banks are not closed for refusing to pay. I know of a case where a depositor said, "You must pay or I will close you up," and they said, "Proceed; it takes sixty days or more to get action under the law, and by that time the whole trouble will be over." I know that some banks did that in the city, but we in the country didn't do it. We paid every depositor who asked for his money from day to day.

Mr. STOKES: But if you had refused to pay your depositors they could have closed you up?

Mr. KEHOE: Not except at the end of a process that would take about two months, but we didn't care to take advantage of that.

Mr. HALFHILL: This proposal seems to be one that deserves consideration of this Convention for the very good reasons that have been stated here, and if we do not take some step of this kind we are liable to be soon confronted in some form or manner with some attempt along the same line as in Oklahoma to get a state guaranty bank deposit law.

Mr. PECK: Do you think that will be a calamity?

Mr. HALFHILL: I think the adoption of a state guaranty bank deposit law in Ohio would be a calamity.

Mr. PECK: Well, I will put Mr. Kehoe's judgment against yours.

Mr. HALFHILL: I am not talking to you particularly, and I am not caring whether I can convince you or not. I am talking to the Convention, and the purpose of my address is to impress upon the Convention that if it passes this you will not be subjected to, or have to meet a state guaranty bank deposit law. I think for the reason suggested by Mr. Beatty, and all of us who are acquainted with him in northwestern Ohio know that he is a good business man, that a state guaranty bank deposit law in Ohio would be a calamity, because the rates of interest here are very low. It is only where you have speculative rates of interest and where our legal rate of interest can be exceeded two or three times, as it is in some of the western states, that such a thing can become necessary in the first instance, and you could not make the business of banking worth while in the state of Ohio if you had liability here by way of contribution to that sort of an indemnity fund. Here are the national banks, and there is a double liability of stockholders on them; here is the state bank with the single liability; here are the building and loan associations, and if they are doing only building and loan association business, and not engaged in banking this proposal does not apply to them, and it ought not to apply to them; but I can not see any good reason—at least there has been no good reason furnished that I have heard—why, if a building and loan association is doing a banking business, it would not properly be within the purview of this proposal.

Now, I know, and I am certain some of the rest of you know, that building and loan companies in many places are conducting banking business. It is true, they don't conduct commercial banks in the sense that you write checks on them, neither do they discount bills, or do a regular commercial business, but they do take deposits of money and they do issue time certificates, and they do state on the time certificates that they will pay you certain rates of interest, which increases proportionately if you leave the money there a certain number of months. If you leave it there as much as six months they will pay you five per cent interest. That becomes an obligation and the contract is binding upon all the property of that building and loan association and is secured thereby, and every depositor or holder of such certificate knows that he has a first and best lien against all the property of such association, including the surplus or any assets it has.

I take it that practically every building and loan association that is doing anything like an extensive business in the larger cities is organized so that it can and does conduct a savings bank business, and when it conducts a savings bank business then it takes advantage of the sixty days after demand for payment, which the law has provided, if it is hard-cramped for funds; and it could not be forced into liquidation or compelled to pay instant, and to that extent it comes in just as an ordinary savings bank would come in under the same law. You can organize a savings bank or savings department under the same law. You take an ordinary commercial bank, a bank of loan and discount, and you can organize a savings department there and this savings department would come under the savings bank law, just as it is applied to the building and loan associations, which can organize a savings bank in connection with its business; so that the savings bank law applies to building and loan associations just the same as any other bank, and if they are doing a savings bank business why should not this proposal apply? That is what I want to know.

Now, it has been suggested that by this proposal the building and loan stock you own becomes a liability rather than an asset. It certainly does not become a liability rather than an asset, unless you are engaged in a business more hazardous than the regular building and loan business, and the only other business that is more hazardous in which you can engage as such an association is the savings bank business, or receiving money on deposit. You can run a building and loan association as a building and loan business and that was the idea when it originated under the laws of the state of Ohio; and they have been very beneficial and have helped many poor people to get a home; and if you are running them legally as building and loans the officers will find it practically impossible to lose anything for the security is first mortgage on real estate; but if you are engaged in banking along with the building and loan business, it is possible to lose money. Therefore, if they are engaged in the banking business they ought to come within the purview of this proposal.

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. WINN: May I ask a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: When I get through with the remarks I am making I will try to answer any question that is put to me.

I think it was pretty thoroughly explained here, at least I believe it was, that this particular proposal would apply to existing banks. I think there can be no doubt about that. You have heard—many of you who are not of the legal profession, at least have heard—of the famous case of the trustees of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward, reported in fifth Wheaton, in which Daniel Webster was of counsel, and in which case the supreme court of the United States laid down the doctrine that a charter issued direct by a state legislature was a vested right, and that the state could not repeal it or modify it as an ordinary corporate contract created under general laws. That was just what happened in the early days of Ohio under the first constitution, and that is exactly why this great big bank in the city of Cleveland, referred to here in debate, the Society for Savings, is in existence now and not subject to any particular control, because it got its right to start in the first instance by a special charter issued by the legislature under the old constitution, and it is kept alive under that old charter, by virtue of the law laid down in the case of the trustees of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward; and I am informed there are a few insurance companies doing business in Ohio which got their charters under the old constitution and they consider them very valuable.

But as was explained here by a member of the banking committee, this proposal applies to existing banks which undoubtedly come within the purview of a corporation created under general law, and such a corporation the legislature at all times under the present constitution reserves the right to control, for such general laws may be altered or repealed; and it is not impairing the obligation of any contract to enact a fundamental law of this kind. So far as the liability that attaches after the enactment of this fundamental law is concerned, it most assuredly will apply to every existing corporation in the state of Ohio, notwithstanding the declaration of Mr. Winn. I do not think that he had considered this carefully at the time any more than I had at that moment. It was thoroughly new to me when the proposal came up for discussion here tonight.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: When I get through—the time is so limited. I am therefore in favor of this proposal. I believe it will work well with the banking corporations of the state of Ohio. I have had several letters and several interviews about it, and I have had no objection, except from one man who is counsel for a state savings bank and trust company, and I don't think the reasons given by him are valid. I personally am interested in just the kind of institution that he was talking about, a state savings bank and trust company, and I am perfectly agreeable, so far as I am personally concerned, for this proposal to become a part of our organic law. I think it will be a benefit and create added confidence for state institutions to be put upon a par with the national banks as to double liability of stockholders, so I hope this proposal, without any amendment, will be passed by the Convention.

Mr. WATSON: I want to ask a question purely for information. You spoke a while ago about the liability of stockholders of a building and loan association that becomes insolvent—

Mr. KING: I rise to a point of order—the gentleman directing the question should rise to his feet.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken.

Mr. WATSON: If a building and loan association doing a banking business breaks up, will that carry with it the laboring man who has borrowed money from the building and loan association? Will his property become part of the assets?

Mr. HALFHILL: I think whenever the building and loan association undertakes to carry on a banking business every stockholder in it, whether a laboring man or a rich man, or whoever he is, becomes responsible. His responsibility is fixed by law.

Mr. WATSON: Does he become a stockholder when he has a loan in the building and loan association?

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not see how he could be otherwise. From the very theory of the organization of building and loan companies, when he subscribes for shares and becomes a borrower he becomes a stockholder.

The PRESIDENT: The member's time has expired.

Mr. HOSKINS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 93 as follows: At the end thereof insert the following: "And the legislature is hereby authorized to establish a system of guaranteeing deposits in state banks."

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: I move that the amendment be laid on the able.

A DELEGATE: The member from Auglaize has the floor. Will the member yield for a motion to recess?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

DELEGATES: No.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am not going to discuss the merits pro and con of the original proposition. It has been thoroughly discussed and well presented and the merits of the case on both sides are before you. The double liability for state banks is probably only a substitute for the real thing, the thing that ought to be. The money of the nation or the money of a state is the lifeblood of that nation or state. It is the circulating medium of the state. All of our prosperity depends upon this thing we call money. We take that to the bank and deposit it. What is the present situation in Ohio? We say to the depositor,—the laboring man or the farmer or anyone else who deposits funds in the bank—that the state examines these banks, that they are under state supervision, and that fact is advertised. We give, in other words, a guaranty by our law to the depositing public that these banks are examined by the state banking department just as the national banks are examined by the national banking department. Now, when we say this to the public, that creates an obligation upon the part of the state, a moral obligation to make that examination good, to make that implied guaranty that we hold out to the people good, and I believe that any subterfuge of actually making that guaranty good is falling short of the real remedies the people demand at the hands of the legislature or at the hands of this Convention. Now if our state treasurer has millions of dollars of state money and he receives bids in the shape of the payment of interest for that money, and he awards it to the one offering the highest interest, he doesn't take that down and deposit it as an ordinary depositor without security. The laws of the state of Ohio compel that bank or association to put up municipal bonds or government bonds as a guaranty of the deposit of the state money, and yet the bank that receives such deposit of state money will put on its window "State Depository." They will put that on their letter heads, conveying the impression that the state of Ohio is trusting them as a depository of state funds, when the state of Ohio is not trusting them at all, but is requiring an iron-bound contract for the return of the money. Those desiring to become customers or depositors of the bank are simply fooled by this advertisement upon the front window and letter heads which says the government has chosen that bank as a depository for its money, when in fact the state government has exacted from them the most absolute guaranty for the return of the money. Really the public has been misled by the advertisements and signs. A man will say: "If the state can put its money in this bank I can," and on the face of this he walks in and makes the deposit without one single safeguard for that deposit. This amendment I have submitted simply puts the matter up to the legislature to devise a system for the guaranty of deposits in state banks. I believe that is the real true remedy for the situation.

Mr. ELSON: What is your idea as to where the authority shall be, where the money shall be to reimburse the depositors?

Mr. HOSKINS: That is a question of detail, but I can give you my idea. My idea is that when we are subjecting the banks of the state to supervision that a very small tax be placed upon the deposits or upon the stock of a bank or some other equitable means might be devised, and let this go into the guaranty fund. I think you will find out, if you take the failure of every national bank in this country for fifty years and figure out the losses to the depositors of those banks and calculate the amount of the assessment that should be put on each bank to make good the losses, that that assessment would be so small that the banks would not miss it. Some one a while ago spoke of wild-cat banking, that this would encourage wild-cat banking. Wild-cat banking is the last thing on earth it would encourage, because, first, when you organize a bank you must put $100,000 into the the capital stock, and there is not one cent going out of the guaranty fund until that $100,000 is exhausted. Why should a set of officers or directors in a bank be supposed to start out on any such idea as that, that they will lose $100,000 of their own money to get a chance to take advantage of this guaranty fund?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: What is there to hinder one who has charge of it from taking the paid-up capital stock and running away with it before he does any business at all and leaving it to the other banks to settle?

Mr. HOSKINS: Did you ever know of such a case as that?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No, but there is nothing to prevent it.

Mr. HOSKINS: If you properly organize your bank, that man who is going to run away with the funds will be under proper bond before he gets his hands on a dollar. What prevents the national banker from running away?

Mr. WINN: What is there hindering a cashier or any other officer having charge of a bank, state or national, from running away?

Mr. HOSKINS: Not a thing.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Who specifies the amount of the bond an officer of a bank shall give?

Mr. HOSKINS: No one but the directors as a rule.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: They can make it larger or smaller according to prearrangement.

Mr. HOSKINS: It seems to me you are attempting to make an argument instead of asking a question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you think it sounds economic for the state of Ohio to guarantee the credit of those who loan money and not guarantee the credit of any other particular line of business, such as selling merchandise?

Mr. HOSKINS: I think whenever the state of Ohio undertakes to supervise the man who lends money before it authorizes that man to lend money or engage in the business it can and should guarantee him. It doesn't regulate or control the man selling goods.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is not the authorization to do business police regulation?

Mr. HOSKINS: No.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is no difference in the principle between that and the state doing anything else?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes; there is. The bank is an artificial person which the state under law permits to be created. The state undertakes to supervise and the state ought to be responsible.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The political subdivisions undertake to supervise anything.

Mr. HOSKINS: Under police regulation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That does not change the principle of the thing, whether you call it police regulation or anything else.

Mr. HOSKINS: It does not undertake to supervise natural persons.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Whether artificial or natural it makes no difference.

Mr. THOMAS: The amendment offered by the member from Auglaize is a simple amendment.

The PRESIDENT: Has the member from Auglaize yielded the floor? If he has not he still has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON: I would like to ask the member from Auglaize a question: The only objection you have to Proposal No. 93 is that it does not go far enough and give depositors enough protection?

Mr. HOSKINS: I think that is so.

Mr. ANDERSON: If your amendment fails are you in favor of Proposal No. 93?

Mr. HOSKINS: I never said I was opposed to it.

Mr. ANDERSON: If your amendment fails you are in favor of it?

Mr. HOSKINS: I signed the report to bring it out.

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. ANTRIM: Can you name one single successful precedent for guaranteeing bank deposits?

Mr. HOSKINS: That would necessitate going into a discussion of Oklahoma.

Mr. ANTRIM: There were a great many failures before that.

Mr. HOSKINS: There have been failures in the national banks too.

Mr. ANTRIM: I mean the failure of the plan in New York and Michigan—

Mr. HOSKINS: You can make your speech, you will have fifteen minutes to do it in.

Mr. THOMAS: The amendment I desired to offer on the question is simply the one that has been offered by the member from Auglaize. I do not think any better argument can be made for that amendment than has been made by the distinguished commoner of Nebraska who addressed us on the subject a few weeks ago, and the members who heard that argument made on behalf of guaranteeing bank deposits should not need any other argument to make them vote for it. It is the poor man who suffers, the working man who suffers from the bankrupt bank, and not as a rule the middle man. About one-half of the business men and the corporations that have money in that bank get some sort of inkling, either through the stockholders or some one else, that there is something liable to happen; they get their money away and it is the poor devil who is saving enough to keep him during his old age or to pay for a little home that suffers every time. He deposits his money in a bank because it does business under a state charter, and in some way he imagines, because the banks are doing business under a national or state charter, that the nation or state is guaranteeing him that he will get his money back, and yet the laws governing the banking business permit men to go into the banking business and fleece the people of a particular community deliberately, as was done in the case of the South Cleveland Banking Institution when they loaned nearly if not quite a million dollars to another banking concern and took the lifetime savings of scores of poor people for the purpose of holding up that institution. That is not the only instance that can be mentioned, but there are others, and there were just as many bankrupt banks under double liability of stockholders as there have been since that was changed to single liability. It is not a bit different. I insist that the time has come when the state of Ohio in granting charters to men who are doing banking business should guarantee the depositors that their savings, when they are needed, can be gotten back, so that the poor man will have a chance, as he should have, in the closing days of his life.

Mr. LAMPSON: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is not a bank failure a method of dividing up the poor man's savings?

Mr. THOMAS: But the trouble is it is always dividing up the poor man's savings with the other fellow; there is never any divide coming to the poor man.

Mr. LAMPSON: They simply don't all get in on it.

Mr. ELSON: I want to make a motion, but I want to say a word first. It seems to me that it is just as impossible for the state to guarantee deposits in a bank as it is for the state to guarantee stock in a business. There are many businesses that have charters in the state outside of banks, and no one seems to want us to guarantee those other businesses. The fact has been referred to that the government in depositing money in a bank guarantees itself. That is true, but the government is simply an outside agency—the government is the whole people organized. It is true that the government could afford to lose better than any individual or class of people, but the government's money is in the hands of certain officials and it is those officials who give bonds to make good in case of loss, and it is on that ground that the government must guarantee itself. That is a kind of responsibility of these particular officials. It is not the government exactly as in the state guaranty scheme. It is merely a coercive mutual insurance. I believe in mutual insurance and in coercive insurance. I move to lay this amendment on the table.

Halenkamp,

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

At end of proposal strike out the period and insert comma and add: "and provided further, no person, partnership, association or corporation, not organized under the laws of this state or of the United States, shall use the words 'bank' or 'banker' as a designation or name under which business may be conducted in this state, unless they first submit to inspection, regulation and examination as provided or may be provided under the banking laws of this state."

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. Woods was recognized.

Mr. PECK: Will the gentleman yield to a motion to recess?

Mr. WOODS: Yes.

Mr. PECK: I move that the Convention recess until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

The motion was lost.

Mr. PECK: All right; good-night, I am going.

Mr. WOODS: This amendment means just what it says. You all know there are three kinds of banks in this state: First, national banks, which are examined under the laws of the United States; second, state banks, subject to the inspection and regulation under the laws of the state of Ohio; third, private banks. The number of these banks is just about the same in the state of Ohio. The private banks are not regulated by any law of any kind. I have a right to stick up over any door of any place that I own or rent "Farmers Savings Bank", or "Woods Savings Bank", or any other kind of a "bank" I see fit. This amendment provides that before I commenced doing business as a banker, unless I have a charter from the state of Ohio or the United States, I must submit to an examination, inspection and regulation under the banking laws of this state, and I could not use the word "bank" or "banker" in doing any such business unless I do so submit. This is simply to make me, or any other man who goes into the banking business, do business under my real name and not under some other name. It will not hurt anybody unless he is trying to do business under a name that he should not bear. I am not trying to put anything over on anybody, but I want the people of the state to face the music and do business in their own names. I have a right to lend money, but I ought not to be permitted unless I am inspected by the state or United States to use the word "bank" or "banker".

Now this can not be taken care of any place in the constitution except here. I was a member of the house when we passed the bank inspection bill, but we couldn't take care of the private banks. The people of this state—the ordinary individuals—never stop to think there is a difference between a state, national and private bank. They see "Bank" over the front door and they go in there and leave their money. Some private banks are all right and there won't be any trouble about standing the inspection from banks that are all right. It is those that are not all right that can't stand the inspection. I am now a receiver in bankruptcy of a private bank where a man went to Texas with about $60,000 of the money of the people in my county. All the money he left was two counterfeit silver dollars. If there is any good we can do for the people of this state it is to stop the people from doing business under names of this kind when they ought not to do it. They can still do a banking business under this; it won't prohibit them from doing that, but it will prohibit them from using the words "bank" and "banker".

Mr. HALFHILL: Do I understand the gentleman to say that the legislature could not make the provision that nobody could use the word "banker"?

Mr. WOODS: I think that is right.

Mr. HALFHILL: It certainly is within the legislative power to do that.

Mr. WOODS: We tried and we came to the conclusion we could not do it.

Mr. NYE: I am a member of the Banking committee. This whole matter of private banks was considered by the Banking committee and it was thought best that this Constitutional Convention ought not to put anything into the constitution that would recognize the private banks, and therefore we left it out. I therefore move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. WOODS: And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 26, nays 67, as follows:

FitzSimons,

So the motion to table was lost and a further vote being taken the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Defiance.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TALLMAN: I have an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "shares" at the end of line 11 insert the following: "provided that the stockholders of building associations, that do a banking business, shall be liable in an amount equal to the amount paid in on their stock, in addition to the amount so paid in."

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. STOKES: I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. TALLMAN: I have the floor. I have not yielded it yet, and the gentleman making the motion to table it is not in order.

Double Liability of Bank Stockholders and Inspection of Private Banks.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: The representatives of state banks we have here who are engaged in the banking business have said they are in favor of double liability being imposed on their stockholders because it gives additional credit and solidity. It puts them more upon a par with national banks. It therefore has a tendency to draw business and depositors to their institutions.

Those who borrow money from them are required to give security, and it is certainly right that the depositor who deposits his money in a state bank (often without any interest) should have for his security not only the assets of the bank, but the personal liability of the stockholders as well, to the extent of the stock owned by them.

Why should any exception be made of building and loan associations who do a banking business? The stockholders in these associations should be subject to a double liability, to the amount at least that they have paid in on their stock. The association receives money on deposit, very frequently without paying any interest at all, and sometimes a mere nominal interest. The money so received, the association lends to home builders (often at seven per cent) and takes a mortgage security upon their property, requiring the home builder to pay the cost of furnishing an abstract of his title in addition. The profits derived from the loan of money deposited in these associations by persons who are not stockholders and who have no interest in the association is shared by the stockholders of the association, just the same as in the case of stockholders of state banks. Now there is no difference. This Convention proposes to make a difference. To discriminate against one and favor the other, to burden the stockholders of one that does a banking business with a double liability and let the stockholders in the building and loan associations that do a banking business go free, no matter how extensive the banking business such associations may do, is not just. It is not proposed by this amendment to make the stockholders of building and loan associations liable for any double liability except for deposits made with it, or for money borrowed by it, to be reloaned again at a higher rate of interest, and I confess that I am not able to see the propriety of saddling this double liability upon the stockholders of all corporations doing a banking business except one. On the contrary, the double liability should apply to all corporations that do a banking business.

Mr. WALKER: I move the previous question.

Mr. WINN: I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELSON: Let us take a rising vote on it.

The PRESIDENT: Who joins in the demand for the yeas and nays? The yeas and nays are not demanded. All those in favor of ordering the main question will rise to be counted and the contrary will rise.

The main question was ordered by a vote of 74 to 7.

Mr. WINN: It requires a two-thirds majority.

Mr. LAMPSON: It requires two-thirds of those voting.

The PRESIDENT: The motion for the previous question is carried and the question is first on the adoption of the amendment offered by the member from Belmont.

A vote being taken the amendment was not agreed to. The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the adoption of the proposal as amended.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 66, nays 23, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fluke,	Miller, Ottawa,

The roll call was verified.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 93—Mr. Earnhart. To submit an amendment to article XIII, section 3, of the constitution.—Relative to the protection of bank and other deposits.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Dues from private corporations shall be secured by such means as may be prescribed by law, but in no case shall any stockholder be individually liable otherwise than for the unpaid stock owned by him or her; except that stockholders of corporations authorized to receive money on deposit shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such corporations, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value, thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares, and provided further, no person, partnership, association or corporation, not organized under the laws of this state or of the United States, shall use the words "bank" or "banker" as a designation or name under which business may be conducted in this state, unless they first submit to inspection, regulation and examination as provided or may be provided under the banking laws of this state.

Mr. DOTY: I move to adjourn.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that we recess until 9:30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. DOTY: I move that we adjourn until 10 o'clock in the morning.

The motion to adjourn was carried, and the Convention adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

FIFTY-FIFTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

Columbus, Ohio, Thursday April 11, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and was called to order by the president.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. EVANS: Several weeks ago I introduced Proposal No. 86 and it was referred to the committee on Taxation. I now ask that Proposal No. 86 be recalled from the committee on Taxation and placed at the head of the calendar.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Scioto under the rule calls up Proposal No. 86, and the question is on the engrossment of that proposal.

Mr. WOODS: There are something over three hundred proposals and if we commence this sort of work there is no telling when matters will be considered. I think we should stop this sort of thing right here.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I am opposed to this procedure. This calendar might as well be indefinitely postponed if matters are to be taken up in this manner. I hope the proposal will not be recalled.

Mr. KING: The member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] has a right under the rule to call for the return of Proposal No. 86 from this committee, it having been there over two weeks.

The PRESIDENT: The right has been exercised before in some other matters.

Mr. WOODS: I move that the proposal be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I second the motion.

Mr. DOTY: I was reading over in the corner a communication from my constituents when this matter was precipitated upon the Convention. Of course, the question of indefinite postponement goes to the merits of this proposal. I want to state for the committee on Taxation, of which I have the honor of being chairman, that the committee has had as many meetings—perhaps more; certainly as many meetings—and I think more public hearings than any other committee in this Convention. I do not say that to cast any reflection on any other committee, but simply as a matter of fact. I think if I had the committee's roll call I could show that the attendance upon our meetings has been very large. Out of twenty-one on the committee the average attendance has been from fourteen to sixteen. We have met sometimes three times a day, and we have attempted to give a hearing to every member who has introduced a proposal. It is barely possible that one or two proposals introduced toward the end have not had that consideration, but we have attempted to do it for all the members. This proposal was introduced somewhat early. The member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] had a hearing, and there was a report signed at one time upon this particular proposal by our committee to the effect that it should be reported to the Convention without recommendation. It was our purpose at that time to report this proposal back for the consideration of the Convention without prejudice to the proposal itself and without committing any of the members for or against the proposal itself. After that report was agreed to the committee took other action and agreed to report with recommendation certain other proposals with some modifications which were to be prepared by a sub-committee. That sub-committee is at work upon the proposal now. This particular proposal was looked upon by some of the members of the committee—speaking generally and not as to detail—as being the ideal proposal before our committee, but there were not enough members of the committee to agree to make that favorable report. I myself am one of those who preferred the Evans proposal to any other particular proposal, and for the reason that this proposal may be said to include every proposal that has been introduced in this Convention upon the subject of taxation, in some way or other, except two proposals, one introduced by the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] and one by the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL], which called for the inhibition of the sigle tax.

I believe there were also two others, a proposal by the member from Warren [Mr. EARNHART] and a proposal from the member from Franklin [Mr. HARBARGER] looking toward the restoration of public bonds on the tax list, and this Proposal No. 86 as it now stands does not include the principles they were advocating.

At the time we intended to bring this proposal for the consideration of the Convention to carry out the principle of it, I had in mind to offer an amendment which would take in the principle proposed by Mr. Earnhart and Mr. Harbarger and any others who desired to restore bonds to the tax list. This proposal leaves the question of taxation entirely to the general assembly. I have not the exact facts here now as to just how many states do that, but as I recall the figures of the thirteen original states eight still maintain the principle of allowing the legislature to tax in any way it sees fit, and that sort of program in those eight states has been going on for many years, over one hundred years in most of them. As I recall it, that provision comes down from the original constitution and that part of it has been perpetuated through any revisions made since that time. No person who appeared before our committee has been able to show that any legislature in any one of those states has done any particular harm or invaded the rights of the people, and some of them have made progress in tax reform and some of them have not. The power of taxation, however, is not limited in any of those states. The United States constitution only provides two limitations on the taxing power of congress. Ohio has a string of them. Now whether you believe the present system is a good system or that some other system is a better system, it strikes me that at least the best way of carrying on taxation is to make it easy to experiment. That cannot be done with an iron-clad rule, such as we have now. We call it the uniform rule. It is not uniform and it never was uniform. It never can be made uniform. It is called the uniform rule or general property tax.

Proposal No. 86, Relative to Taxation.

Mr. LAMPSON: Don't you think it would leave every legislature open to the opportunity to make a new experiment?

Mr. DOTY: That is exactly what I do think, and I want to say if we were to pass a law providing that all the chemists in the world could experiment in only one way the chemists would never put out anything new.

Mr. LAMPSON: Would not that very fact of itself continue to affect the value of all property all of the time, fluctuating up and down according to the proposed system of taxation in the legislature?

Mr. DOTY: The fluctuation would be in proportion to how much experimenting we did. The state of Rhode Island has no limitation on taxation and the fluctuation there has not been any greater than in this city.

Mr. LAMPSON: The policy has been pretty well settled?

Mr. DOTY: Not so well settled but that they have at times proposed systems that played hob with their present system. It they had the limitations that we have they couldn't make any change, and couldn't do anything but to follow in one rut. If the chemists had had to do that we would never have had any discoveries worthy of the name in that line.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As chairman of the Taxation committee, are you willing to agree that this proposal be taken from the Taxation committee and be discussed now in view of the fact that two sub-committees are now considering the question of uniform taxation and classification and that they are expected to report back to the full committee with instructions to report out one of those propositions?

Mr. DOTY: I do not get the specific question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As chairman of the Taxation committee are you willing that the proposal be taken from the committee and be discussed now?

Mr. DOTY: I have no objection individually if the Convention has none. As I understand the situation the proposal is before the Convention and a motion has been made to indefinitely postpone the proposal. I don't think this proposal should be taken from the committee. We have had no opportunity to make a report on it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Are you going to argue the question of taxation on the propriety of the proposal's being indefinitely postponed?

Mr. DOTY: It is not for me as chairman of the committee or for any member to discuss the action of the member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] when he is acting in his own right. The matter is past me and it is before the Convention.

Mr. LAMPSON: And the immediate question is a motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. DOTY: And that brings up the whole question.

Mr. LAMPSON: To a limited extent.

Mr. DOTY: To any extent that the Convention wants to discuss it.

Mr. WOODS: What do you want to do with the proposal?

Mr. DOTY: I want to discuss it.

Mr. WOODS: You don't want to pass on it and act on it right now?

Mr. DOTY: I have no choice; the member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] calls it up.

Mr. LAMPSON: If the Convention refuses to indefinitely postpone, certainly.

Mr. DOTY: The whole question is whether we shall call this up now and discuss it and that goes to the merit.

Mr. LAMPSON: The next question would be whether the proposal should be engrossed.

Mr. DOTY: I think this is a question that the Convention understands pretty well.

Mr. KING: Will you yield for a motion to refer to the committee on Taxation?

The PRESIDENT: I recognize the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK].

Mr. PECK: Has not the committee on Taxation reported to the Convention some other proposal involving substantially this same question?

Mr. DOTY: I think I have stated that we had a sub-committee at work on the proposal of Judge Worthington, and Judge Worthington being sick this week we did not get a report on that.

Mr. PECK: Is not the report and the discussion now, before we have a report from the committee, premature?

Mr. DOTY: That is a question of opinion. The motion before the Convention involves the subject matter of this proposal. I am not trying to precipitate myself.

Mr. FESS: As I understand the rules of the Convention permit Captain Evans to call out this proposal from the committee. It is, therefore, before the Convention and the motion by the member from Medina [Mr. WOODS] to postpone it indefinitely must open the entire question to discussion. That is according to parliamentary law, and if the motion is carried the whole thing is defeated, and this means that this motion to postpone indefinitely supersedes all other motions, and we are in the Convention now to discuss this question simply on the opening up of the entire matter. Therefore, would it not be proper to withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely and to refer it to the committee? We are not here now to discuss it and there is no way to avoid it.

Mr. DOTY: I can not assume in advance what the Convention is going to do, but if they are going to indefinitely postpone a proposal that has merit in it without knowing what the merit is, I think I should explain the proposal.

Mr. WOODS: If the Convention is willing to recommit, are you willing that it be recommitted?

Mr. DOTY: I am always willing. I am always willing to discuss a matter, too. I don't care much about it either way.

Mr. ELSON: We expect to spend several days discussing taxation. It is the biggest thing before us. Now shall we have two discussions, one now and another later? It seems to me that the motion to recommit is the proper thing.

Leave of absence was here granted the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] until Tuesday.

Mr. DOTY: I do not want to do anything that will tend to put this proposal out of business. Judge Worthington's proposal is reported back to the committee and a majority have agreed to report it. Of course, that is all subject to the approval of the majority of the sub-committee. Mr. Worthington, Mr. Colton and Mr. Redington are the members, and we expect to be able to sign their report. If that proposal should be defeated it may be that our committee may feel that it is our duty to bring this proposal, or some other similar proposal, to the attention of the Convention, because, as the member from Athens has said, I think we all fully agree that this question of taxation is one of tremendous importance. Our committee has given no end of time to the consideration of all these proposals, and we did not anticipate that any member would take this proposal away from the committee. We have not reported any back for indefinite postponement, as other committees have, because we did not want to put upon the record anything that they might object to, and I think nearly every member who has a proposal before the committee understands that situation. We did not know that there was any likelihood of anybody taking a proposal away from us.

Mr. COLTON: Are you willing that this motion to postpone shall be withdrawn and that a motion shall be made to recommit to the committee?

Mr. DOTY: That is a question with Captain Evans. He should answer it. I am willing to yield long enough for Captain Evans to say what he wants done.

Mr. EVANS: I have done this at this time at the request of a number of members of the Convention. I am the author of this proposal and Mr. Doty from Cuyahoga has just said that it covers and embraces every proposition which has been put in or could be put in. It covers the whole subject. It is the result of forty years' study, and it embraces what some of the most wealthy and prosperous states have and what they have flourished under. It covers the whole subject of what ought to be or may be exempted. I have not examined any other proposal that covers, in my opinion, the matter to the same extent. I have looked over the calendar and I see a number of small subjects on the calendar. It is time that we should have a great subject for next week and this is one of them. In my judgment it ought to be before the Convention at this time, and in order to have one great subject for next week I have called this proposal out, and I would like to have it brought up and placed at the head of the calendar. That was my object in making the motion.

Mr. DOTY: Does the member object to recommitting?

Mr. EVANS: I desire to have it before the Convention next week.

Mr. DOTY: Do you make that motion?

Mr. EVANS: You can make it. You understand it thoroughly.

Mr. DOTY: I wish I did.

Mr. RILEY: Does the chairman see any objection to taking up the matter now?

Mr. DOTY: I have no objection to any course. If we want to do what the members suggest, I want to carry it out.

Mr. RILEY: Both sides seem to be ready, and I don't think there is any necessity for postponing or referring. You don't think any further light will be cast on it?

Mr. DOTY: The situation to me is this: This matter is before the Convention, and while I am precipitated into this thing and haven't any written speech, I probably never would have. There are some things about this matter I am as well prepared on as I ever shall be, and the matter is before the Convention. I do not, however, seem to be able to get anybody interested in the matter.

Mr. WOODS: I said that I would have my motion withdrawn and then we could have a motion to recommit.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Scioto is the one to answer that. The matter is here and I have no control over it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: If the proposal is re-committed would it come out next week?

Mr. EVANS: I have moved to withdraw this from the committee. I wish that this proposal might come out of the committee and be placed at the head of the calendar. That was the motion I made.

Mr. LAMPSON: Before it can be placed at the head of the calendar it would have to be engrossed.

Mr. DOTY: Have I the floor?

The PRESIDENT: The member from Allen was seeking the floor. I will recognize the member from Allen.

Mr. HALFHILL: As chairman of the committee on Taxation, Mr. Doty, are you not able to commence and discuss this question now and go right on?

Mr. DOTY: About as ready and able as I ever shall be. I am willing and ready to talk taxation on very slight provocation.

Mr. HALFHILL: Our calendar seems to be increasing right along and the day of adjournment is not far off. If this matter is now before the Convention why not discuss it? Is it a discourtesy to your committee to go on into it?

Mr. DOTY: It is not a question of courtesy or discourtesy. The gentleman from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] is within his rights.

Mr. HALFHILL: If we bring up a proposal and discuss it, is it not open to amendment by your committee?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; any kind of parliamentary proposition any member may put up. The whole question is before the Convention. The question of the merits of this proposal is now before the Convention.

Mr. HALFHILL: You are agreed and the author of the proposal agrees. Don't you think that the Convention had better agree to go ahead?

Mr. DOTY: I don't know what the unexpressed opinion is.

Mr. EVANS: Will you yield to a motion to postpone until Tuesday and to make it a special order?

Mr. DOTY: I am willing to yield, but not my rights to discuss.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Scioto moves that this matter be postponed until Tuesday and made a special order for that day.

Mr. DOTY: Do I have the floor if that motion is voted down?

Mr. ANDERSON: If this is made a special order and goes on the calendar it does not mean that we have taken any action on the merits, does it?

Mr. DOTY: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: It simply means that whatever we have finally adopted will bear the name of Evans?

Mr. DOTY: Not necessarily so. If he is as smart as you are, it will. If somebody else is smarter, it won't.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Scioto moves that the proposal be engrossed and placed at the head of the calendar and made a special order for Tuesday at two o'clock.

Proposal No. 86, Relative to Taxation.

Mr. LAMPSON: That motion does not take precedence over the motion to commit.

Mr. DOTY: The motion to postpone does.

Mr. LAMPSON: The first part is that it be engrossed.

Mr. WOODS: I am absolutely opposed to the proposal and I do not want to do any thing to let this pass one parliamentary stage.

The PRESIDENT: If this motion is lost, the member from Medina will be recognized to renew his motion.

Mr. THOMAS: Is it in order to move to amend Captain Evans' motion? If so, I move that this proposal be recommitted.

Mr. DOTY: But that is not an amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The question is shall the proposal be engrossed and made a special order for Tuesday at two o'clock?

Mr. LAMPSON: And on that the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. DOTY: I didn't understand that the member made a motion to engross?

Mr. EVANS: Yes, I did.

Mr. MARSHALL: I would like to amend and make it Monday a week. I feel that I would like to hear all that is said on this taxation question and I cannot be here next week.

The PRESIDENT: The first question is on the engrossment.

Mr. LAMPSON: And on that I have demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOTY: I demand a division of the two questions and upon that I have a few remarks.

Mr. FESS: I would like to know if it is necessary to involve "to engross" in that motion?

Mr. DOTY: No; of course not.

Mr. FESS: I think that is the trouble.

Mr. DOTY: I didn't understand the member to make a motion to engross.

Mr. FESS: Neither did I.

Mr. DOTY: I think the question should be divided and I would like to have it divided.

The PRESIDENT: In view of the explanation made by the vice president I think the question should be, "Shall the question of engrossment of this proposal be made a special order for Tuesday at two o'clock?"

Mr. EVANS: That is all right.

Mr. ELSON: If that carries, will the whole subject of taxation be brought before the Convention and threshed out at that time once for all?

Mr. DOTY: It may be.

Mr. ELSON: It is unusual to do that before a report from a committee.

Mr. DOTY: No, we did that on Mr. Anderson's suggestion as to the liquor proposal.

Mr. LAMPSON: Upon that question I have demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 18, nays 80, as follows:

The motion was lost.

Mr. DOTY: I cannot interpret just what this vote means. If I should interpret, the Convention now decides to start in on taxation and go forward. That is one thing.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Medina [Mr. Woods] withdraws his motion with the understanding that he was to be permitted to renew it or any other motion, and the member from Medina will be recognized.

Mr. DOTY: I am willing to do this if I can maintain what few rights I have left.

Mr. KILPATRICK: A point of order. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDENT: The member from Medina [Mr. Woods].

Mr. WOODS: I move to lay this proposal on the table.

Mr. DOTY: I demand the yeas and nays on that. That is not according to the agreement. That precipitates the whole matter.

Mr. WOODS: I don't want to precipitate it.

Mr. ELSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. DOTY: I was trying to get out of a tangle and I was interrupted with a point of order.

Mr. WOODS: So that there can be no misunderstanding I want to move to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. DOTY: Now I will explain. The vote we have had and the one we are going to have will interpret what the Convention desires. I move that this proposal be recommitted to the committee on Taxation and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

A vote being taken viva voce the president announced that the nays seemed to have it.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member insist upon his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

The PRESIDENT: It has not been seconded.

Evans,

So the motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next thing in order is Proposal No. 211—Mr. Taggart, relative to the elective franchise.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman please yield for a second to allow me to ask for unanimous consent to move that 2,500 copies of the Peck proposal relative to the judiciary be printed as we have passed it?

Consent was given and the motion was carried.

Mr. TAGGART: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: Let me say in the outset that this proposal, although it seems to come from the committee simply for the purpose of consideration by the Convention, had a majority of the committee in favor of its adoption. The minority, not desiring to present a minority report and yet not willing to concur in the majority report, suggested that the proposal be sent to the floor of the Convention for the consideration of the Convention itself. It is needless to say that this is the most important proposal that has up to this time been before the Convention.

The constitution of the United States in its opening words declares:

We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America.

And the present constitution of this state, under which we have lived for sixty years, provides that "We the people of the state of Ohio * * * do establish this constitution." In section 2 of the bill of rights it is provided that "All political power is inherent in the people" and "Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit."

In many of the states of the Union similar declarations are made in their constitutions.

Now the question occurs, who are we to understand are included in the term "the people"? For it is by these words that all conjure when they go upon the hustings. Everybody is in favor of "the people," but whom do you mean when you speak of "the people"? In whom is the sovereign power of a state reposed when it is said to be reposed in "the people"? It is not reposed, I submit, in the voters, or those designated as representatives of the people, because the people in the aggregate include male and females, infants and adults, and in this aggregation the sovereign power of the state resides. It is only a few of the whole people who are the delegated persons called on to enact the laws, or to select those who are to enact the laws, to execute the laws and to interpret the laws. So you have at the foundation a delegated portion of the people who exercise the sovereignty, but the sovereignty at all times resides in all the people.

Now it is manifestly impossible that the whole people could exercise this sovereignty, and therefore certain machinery is devised whereby certain individuals are designated to accomplish this result, and the designation of the individuals is what we understand to be the conferring of the suffrage or the elective franchise.

This selection is indeed sometimes very arbitrary and not based at all times on logical reasons. Aliens are excluded, no matter what their moral worth or intelligence may be, and although some of the greatest interpreters of our constitution are foreigners, yet they cannot at any time exercise the right of suffrage or the elective franchise. Females are generally excluded from this right of suffrage. Minors are excluded, although the War of the Rebellion on both sides was fought by boys under the age now fixed for the exercise of this right. The unfortunate, whose reason is partially clouded, for obvious reasons is excluded. So that the number in whom is reposed this trust is comparatively limited. In the state of Ohio in round numbers there are 4,700,000 inhabitants, yet the highest vote ever cast in this state was 1,123,000. Therefore there was but one-fourth of the entire people who exercised this privilege.

Now, it is too often stated that this elective franchise is a mere privilege or right, personal with the individual in whom it is reposed. But it is not a mere right or privilege. It is a trust reposed in this class of inhabitants for the benefit of all the rest of the community—all the rest of the people. There is no legal reason upon which it can be classed or denominated anything other than a trust, obligation or duty. If it is a mere personal right, if it is a mere privilege, you cannot perhaps compel' it. But it is more than a mere privilege or right; it is a trust or obligation for the benefit of the individual himself and everyone else concerned, within the geographical limits of the state. If it is a mere personal right it can be sold, bartered or given away at the option of the person himself. Yet every state in the Union, when an elector attempts to exercise this as a mere personal privilege by barter or sale, condemns him as a felon and incarcerates him in jails or penitentiaries. If, therefore, gentlemen of the Convention, this is a trust, obligation or duty, then every elector and voter is a trustee for the benefit of himself and everyone else. Where else, gentlemen, can you find a trustee who, violating his trust, failing to exercise his trust, is not called on and compelled to perform that trust.

A trustee of a meager, beggarly sum of ten dollars, if he fails to perform that trust, can be called before a court and compelled to perform it. But here are all the vital interests of the state and of every individual in the state involved and a failure to perform that trust may seriously affect the whole course and progress of a state. That whole course and progress may be impeded or changed by a failure to perform it. What logic is there that argues you cannot compel the performance of that trust so far as you impose it in this proposal, that the elector shall be present and in attendance at all the elections held by authority of law?

Mr. OKEY: Do you think the legislature can enact a law compelling a man to vote?

Mr. TAGGART: No, and this does not compel a man to vote. You cannot compel him to exercise the suffrage by making a choice of men or measures, but you can compel him to be in attendance at the election, and the presumption is, if he is there he will vote.

Mr. ELSON: As a punishment for non-voting, would you contemplate anything in the way of disfranchisement, temporary or permanent?

Mr. TAGGART: That is for the legislature. If you ask for my personal opinion I would have a graded disfranchisement. If a voter fails to attend at one election disfranchise him for the next. I would not fine him or visit on him any pecuniary penalties. I would not have a poll tax, but if he failed to vote at an election I would disfranchise him at the next election. That is a detail that can be worked out in the general assembly. Now, this is not the mere argument of the schools or the sentiment of a mere doctrinaire. It is of practical importance. If you will look to it, you condemn men for selling their votes and yet you can accomplish the same act of corruption by paying a man to refrain from voting or remaining away from the polls; you accomplish at least one-half of the same result. The stay-at-home vote includes largely workmen, farmers, business men and professional men, classes of our citizenship who ought to perform this duty. Professional politicians and office holders and those dependent on them always vote. Take the votes in the various cities of the state, for example. I have compiled a few of them.

In this county in 1906 the vote was 35,000; in 1908, 54,000; in 1910, 45,000. There were 9,000 trustees who failed to perform their duties.

In Hamilton county in 1906, 94,000 voted; in 1908, 114,000 voted; in 1910, 100,000 voted. There were from 13,000 to 20,000 voters who failed to register and failed to perform their duty.

In Lucas county in 1906 there were 24,000 votes cast; in 1908, 39,000; in 1910, 29,000.

In Mahoning county in 1906, 10,000 votes were cast; in 1908, 21,000; in 1910, 15,000. There were from 6,000 to 10,000 voters there who did not vote.

In Montgomery county in 1906 there were 30,000 votes; in 1908, 43,000 votes; in 1910, 37,000 votes; 13,000 votes were short there. Twenty to thirty per cent of the votes were not cast at these elections. We must presume that had the votes been cast the result might have been different and we do not know what serious effects may have resulted from the failure of these men to perform their trust.

The adoption of this proposal would remove all excuse for the use of money at election time under the pretence and guise of securing the attendance of voters, but in fact distributed as a corruption fund.

Mr. HALFHILL: What do you think is the best means to compel the attendance of the voter?

Mr. TAGGART: I think that it is within the wisdom of the legislature to compel attendance, and this will secure the largest attendance.

Mr. BOWDLE: Let us suppose that the republican organization is in charge of a community and the organization should attempt to use the courts for the purpose of disfranchising a man. Would not the republican organization be thereby manufacturing democrats?

Mr. TAGGART: I don't know. That might be a desirable result in some localities. In certain other localities it might be proper for the democrats to produce some republicans.

Mr. FESS: Is there any state in the Union where they have this requirement?

Mr. TAGGART: Not that I know of, and yet that is nothing against this reform. Every reform we have, every salutary law and every salutary constitutional enactment, had a beginning. This is no new doctrine which has suddenly come to plague us or reform this people. I see in the picture group of the general assembly of 1877 a photograph of General Aquila Wiley, one of the greatest soldiers in the state and one of the best lawyers and judges. He introduced a bill in 1872 in the general assembly for the purpose of compelling the electors to attend election. It was argued against his bill that it was unconstitutional because of a penalty fixed for the failure to attend at the election. I am attempting to meet that very objection so that the legislature of the state may and shall provide that all electors shall attend and perform their duty.

Mr. DOTY: Is not the tendency of this sort of a provision toward limitation of the franchise?

Mr. TAGGART: No.

Mr. DOTY: For instance, if we have an election tomorrow in town and sixty per cent of the voters vote and forty per cent do not; the forty percent would be disfranchised.

Mr. TAGGART: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Then we have lessened the franchise that much. Then we have another election, and if only ninety per cent of those sixty per cent voted that would cut off over five per cent more of the original?

Mr. TAGGART: Your arithmetic is all right.

Compulsory Attendance at Elections.

Mr. DOTY: So, is not there a tendency toward a limitation of the franchise?

Mr. TAGGART: I think not.

Mr. DOTY: You have admitted my arithmetic is correct?

Mr. TAGGART: But with this law promulgated, and known, the citizens would recognize their civic duty and would perform their civic duty. The records show that within seven or eight per cent of those under compulsory elections attend at the election. They may not vote but they attend, because every citizen will perform his civic duties better if he is compelled to than if he is not.

Mr. DOTY: Is it not a fact that every citizen will attend to his civic duties when you make it easy for him to perform those duties?

Mr. TAGGART: Does he perform his civic duties when he fails to attend?

Mr. DOTY: I mean with reference to voting.

Mr. TAGGART: Does he not perform his civic duties when he pays his taxes, when he is called on jury duty, when he is sent across the state as a witness in a criminal case or twenty or forty miles to testify in a civil case? And yet you compel him to attend, and but few citizens voluntarily pay taxes, serve on juries, or join a sheriff's posse.

Mr. DOTY: I don't deny that we may do it, but I am getting at the advisability of doing it and the effect of it. If my arithmetic is right and we keep on a few years we will cut down the franchise so that only a small part of those who now have the right to vote would still have it.

Mr. TAGGART: No, because with the graded disfranchisement those that were disfranchised the first year could be restored after one year, and having been once disfranchised they will be ready to perform their civic duties. They will not want their rights taken away from them again, and they will be more zealous to perform their duty. Your arithmetic is all right, but your deductions and conclusions are all wrong. Now I need say very little more. It seems to me this ought to receive practically the unanimous indorsement of this Convention and ought to be submitted to the electors of the state, receive their indorsement at the polls and become a part of the organic law of the state. I have trespassed as long as I should and I thank you for your attention.

Mr. WATSON: Does not the right to vote carry with it the duty to vote?

Mr. TAGGART: The right to associate with you or any other citizen carries with it the idea and duty that I shall be a gentleman, but it does not follow that I do at all times perform that duty; so the right and the duty to vote at all times may be co-existent. It is the duty of every trustee to perform his trust, and yet there are recreant trustees. There are stewards who fail to perform their duty.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I have thought for a long time that the provision in the constitution for a law to this effect would be a splendid thing, but on reading this proposal I feel that it will not cover that part of the evils which have been most practiced in my observation. Down in my county I have seen on election day scores of voters lined up along the fences and drygoods boxes the whole day long, sitting in groups to be voted. They were in attendance as required by this proposal, but they were not voting, and under this proposal they would be under no obligation to vote. They were simply holding off the whole livelong day waiting for some one. At the last minute some one appears with a bag full of silver dollars and worms his way through them; in a little while they all are voting. I have seen that done time and time again in Hillsboro, which is in Highland county, adjoining Adams county, and I have always felt the need of some provision that would cure the situation. I believe that this proposal of the gentleman from Wayne [Mr. TAGGART] does not quite reach it. The gentleman stated in his remarks that a proposal which would have for its object the coercion of voters would not be constitutional. I do not know whether it will be constitutional or not under the federal law, but I have taken the risk and I offer an amendment to that proposal.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines 4 and 5 and insert: "The general assembly shall by appropriate legislation, compel participation of all qualified electors in all elections held by authority of law."

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I wish to state further that those persons whom I have seen by the scores waiting all day to be purchased, and whom I have seen purchased outright, open and above board, without any disposition to hide it, year after year, would under this proposal be cut out of that nefarious method of having their votes bought. They would be compelled to vote without the persuasion of which they have usually been the recipients.

Mr. MAUCK: You suggest that the general assembly shall do certain things. How are you going to enforce your command?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: In this case I think the demand would be made good by public opinion. I do not know of any way of compelling the legislature to do a thing, but it would be the duty, under the constitution, of the legislature to enact such laws and it would be their sworn duty. I believe public opinion would compel the legislature to enact the law.

Mr. DOTY: The action of the Convention the other day seemed to kill the short ballot proposal and that necessitates our passing this particular proposal. We have, at least so far as we can judge the action of the Convention, killed the short ballot, although the Convention may reverse the action of the other day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Does referring a matter mean that it is killed?

Mr. DOTY: Sometimes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Does the referring or recommitting of the taxation proposal mean that it is killed?

Mr. DOTY: Not necessarily, but it may.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You said that the short ballot was killed?

Mr. DOTY: No; I didn't say that. I said so far as I can judge the temper of the Convention was that the short ballot proposal was killed. I may be at least allowed to judge that, although my judgment may be poor, and for the purpose of my remarks I am still going on to judge it that way. Assuming that my judgment is correct and if the short ballot is killed—and I am sure the gentleman has enough imagination left that he can imagine with me on that proposition—assuming that is the temper of the Convention, that the short ballot proposal is or will be killed, I think we ought to put this proposal in the constitution. If we make it as difficult as possible for the citizens to vote by making the ballot so long that it is difficult to vote, we must have a spur behind them to make them perform the duty. I am in favor of this proposal. I was in favor of the short ballot, and, speaking consistently—as we are advised once in a while—every body who was in favor of the conglomerate ballot ought to be in favor of a burr under the saddle to make people use that ballot. Whenever the city of Cleveland has an election in which the people are interested in the election of one man, even, when there is no long ballot to be voted, but the whole of it hinges upon one man, there is no trouble in getting the people out to vote. The people come out if the issues are drawn, and if they are of sufficient importance to elicit the support and antagonism of the people they will come out and vote if you make it easy for them to register their will; but when you make a ballot long and the issues are distributed all up and down the ballot, the people won't vote. The vote at the last election shows just how they varied. The majorities of the successful candidates varied from eight thousand to over one hundred thousand and they were scattered, showing a grouping on the part of the people to do something, to meet this issue here and that issue there, and select this man and that man. But it was so difficult that apparently only a few could register their desires. And so the people will stay at home when you have that kind of a conglomerate ballot. They say, "What is the use? The politicians have fixed the tickets up anyhow. We have no voice and it makes no difference who is elected and we will stay at home."

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you think there is any difference in the short ballot between a state ticket and municipal ticket which are long conglomerated ones?

Mr. DOTY: There is no difference in principle.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is there any practical difference whatever?

Mr. DOTY: In the municipality, even if you do have a long ballot, you are much more apt to know everybody on the ballot, even if there are twenty-five, than you are to know twenty-five or thirty on a party ticket when they are scattered all over the state.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you recognize that one may favor a short ballot and object to this proposition?

Mr. DOTY: I can readily see that some citizens might have those notions, but in the matter of consistency I cannot indorse their consistency.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I rise to a point of order. The discussion is on Mr. Taggart's Proposal, No. 211, and not on the short ballot.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Hamilton was against the short ballot and he does not like to hear it mentioned. Of course the discussion is upon this proposal, but if there is any subject in this state, whether we have considered it or not, that touches on this, it is within the province of any member to bring it up in the discussion.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I rise to a point of order. We have some rules as to time and I have been watching the clock.

The PRESIDENT: The point is not well taken.

Mr. DOTY: How much time have we?

The PRESIDENT: We are talking under the fifteen-minute rule.

Mr. DOTY: If I had been let alone I would have been through now. I only want to say that we can pass this proposal and if the people adopt it you simply have another law on the book that is not worth having and we well know it. The member from Wayne may take a horse to water, but he can't make him drink. That is the way with this voting proposition. If people are allowed to exercise their privilege or right of voting in the same direct way you will find them using their power easily and certainly. But you can't get all the people to vote. There never was an election in Ohio where one hundred per cent of those entitled to vote voted. In Cleveland when we have the most hotly contested elections for president and mayor I don't recall ever seeing a vote of over ninety-five per cent. Are you going to disfranchise that five percent because they were sick or out of town or at work and not able to get to the polls? If we get the proportion we are accustomed to under the long ballot and you will shorten the ballot so that the power of the people can be used with discrimination, you will have no cause for attempting this clumsy method of producing the result the member desires to bring about.

Mr. MALIN: I move that the proposal and amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

So the proposal and amendment were laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The next proposal is No. 212, which the secretary will read.

The proposal was read the second time.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will read the minority report.

The SECRETARY: It will be found on page 5 of the journal of March 4. It is as follows:

A minority of the standing committee on Legislative and Executive Departments, to which was referred Proposal No. 212—Mr. Johnson, of Williams, having had the same under consideration, recommend the following substitute:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

ARTICLE II.

"SECTION 16. Every bill shall be fully and distinctly read three different days, unless in case of urgency three-fourths of the house in which it shall be pending, shall dispense with the rule. No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, and no law shall be revived, or amended, unless the new act contain the entire act revived, or the section or sections amended, and the section or sections so amended shall be repealed."

HARRY D. THOMAS,
FRANK G. HURSH.

Mr. THOMAS: I shall take only a few minutes to add to what I said the other evening in favor of abolishing the governor's veto altogether. The argument made on behalf of the governor's veto, so far as I have heard it, is that it prevents hasty and ill considered legislation. I want to repeat, in part at least, what Judge Ranney said on this subject in the convention of 1851. I think he states the matter in a far better manner than I can. Judge Ranney said in substance:

Now, so far as the first proposition is concerned, I will agree with the gentleman that it is most desirable that the convention should fix upon some expedient by which hasty and ill-considered legislation shall be prevented hereafter.

I would concede this at once. But what is the cause of this serious evil? It arises from the fact, in my humble opinion, that the people of Ohio have heretofore delegated too much power to the departments of government.

Where will you go to apply the remedy? Will you look to the nature of the disease? It has arisen from the fact that the legislature has exercised powers which never ought to have belonged to it.

Therein has been found the great evil of our system. Now where shall we go to find the remedy? The remedy is found in retaining among the people very many of the powers which have been exercised by the legislature, the power to confer office.

At that time the constitution provided that the legislature elect a number of the officers. Judge Ranney continued:

Again, sir, I would not give to the legislators the power to enact all laws until they have been submitted to a direct vote of the people. That will cut down their power again. Take from them all the power of local government, and you have left nothing for the legislature to do but make general laws to which all should be subject under such a state of things. I cannot conceive that there would be any great danger of the legislature being led into the enactment of any deleterious laws.

I wish to see pursued in practice that the powers of government should be divided, that distinct branches of government should be charged with distinct duties, and I wish to see them made responsible for their exercise and their respective duties clearly defined.

Judge Ranney called attention to Mr. Jefferson's opposition to the veto, and in making reference to the dignity that belongs to executive officers, such as governor and other officials to whom the veto power might be given, said that he had not much use for dignity in any form and wound up as follows:

I conclude by declaring here that I shall vote against all vetoes, everywhere, in every form, and upon all occasions.

At the present time there are five checks against ill-considered and hasty legislation by the legislature.

1. The constitution of the United States.
2. The constitution of Ohio.
3. Supreme court of the United States.
4. The supreme court of Ohio.
5. Division into two separate bodies of the legislature.

And it strikes me that these ought to be sufficient to prevent any hasty legislation of any character without the necessity of the governor's veto.

This state got along without the governor's veto for a period of over one hundred years and there never was any particular complaint, after the legislature ceased electing officers, that the power of the legislature was any more abused in making laws than it has been since the governor has had the veto power, and this taking away from the hands of the people through their representatives the right to legislate for their own benefit and placing it in the power of one individual, whether it be the governor or any one else, to say the people shall not have what their chosen representatives have determined they should have is entirely contrary to the declaration of independence and the powers of government that, in my opinion, the people should reserve to themselves. We have decided here upon giving the people this veto power in the future and it seems to me that is sufficient without any governor's veto.

Mr. MOORE: The veto power given to the president of the United States by a constitutional convention was merely the lingering relic of monarchy which they did not have the nerve to abolish entirely. They created a legislative department to make the laws and then the judicial department and then they seemed to fear the people would legislate themselves into trouble and they gave the president the prototype of a king, the power to veto the laws under certain circumstances. They clothed the president with power to execute the laws and to make reports to the legislative body and to advise the legislators as to the necessities based upon his experience in trying to execute the laws they had made. They did not intend that the executives should become legislators as they have become in modern times. For half a century the state of Ohio managed to drag along without the governor's veto, and that veto was given to us by the use of the Longworth law, which we all understand was an infamous law, and the people who voted to give the governor veto power did not find out—a great many of them—that they had voted to give him that power until some time afterward. I feel about giving the veto power to an executive as Abraham Lincoln did when he said, "In this I hear the footsteps of returning despotism." And with the initiative and referendum I feel as though all the people should make the laws and no one man in the commonwealth should have as much power as two-thirds of the legislative body. I trust this minority report will be carried.

Mr. CASSIDY: I move to lay the substitute on the table.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 69, nays 31, as follows:

The roll call was verified.

So the motion to table was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee. If there is no objection it will be considered agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I move that the report be engrossed and discussed now. Why postpone it when we are ready to discuss it?

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: Has the proposal been engrossed?

The PRESIDENT: No.

Mr. DOTY: It has to be engrossed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: My motion was that it be engrossed and that we proceed with it now.

The PRESIDENT: That was the motion.

Mr. PECK: Will the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] please tell me what is engrossment. I have been trying to find out what sort of a business that is ever since I have been here. Nobody ever sees it done. You just hear a motion to do it.

The delegate from Williams [Mr. JOHNSON] was recognized and yielded to Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, for a motion to recess.

Mr. DOTY: This matter is not straight; we ought to straighten it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: The gentleman is out of order. It was decided that I have the floor.

Mr. DOTY: True, if you want to go on all wrong you may.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I have yielded for a motion to recess.

Leave of absence was granted to the delegate from Wyandot [Mr. STALTER] for Tuesday.

The motion to recess was carried and the Convention recessed until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order pursuant to recess by the vice president.

Mr. DOTY: I have examined the journal and I find that the amendment has been engrossed. Under the rule it would not come up for two days. In order that it may come up regularly I move that the rules be suspended and the proposal be read the second time now.

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: It is so ordered and the secretary will read the proposal.

The proposal was again read.

Mr. Johnson, of Williams, was recognized.

Mr. DOTY: I want to make a privileged statement. It appears that some weeks ago when it was decided that we should attempt to have Friday sessions there was an implied promise not to force a vote on Friday on any matter. I want to serve notice that so far as I am concerned if there are Friday sessions I shall be here and I shall attempt to bring about a vote on any subject I can, and I shall begin tomorrow if there is a session tomorrow. I want to give notice that I withdraw from that deal.

Mr. BEYER: I wish this question might be decided.

Mr. DOTY: How can we decide it?

The VICE PRESIDENT: It is not a matter before the Convention. It was only a question of privilege and the gentleman from Williams is recognized.

Mr. CASSIDY: Will the gentleman yield for a moment? Some of our creditors are making life a burden for the members of the Convention and I would move that we suspend the consideration of the pending matter five minutes.

The motion was carried.

By unanimous consent Mr. Cassidy submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Claims against the Convention, to which was referred Resolution No. 98—Mr. Cassidy, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its adoption when so amended:

In line 5 strike out the figures "$161.65" and in lieu thereof insert the figures "$135.30."

In line 6 strike out the figures "$168.50" and in lieu thereof insert the figures "$167.85."

Strike out line 9, "T. J. Dundon & Co., labor supplies, $5.00."

Add at the end of said resolution the following:

"George F. Jelleff, labor and materials, $20.85."

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of that report.

The question being "Shall the resolution, as amended, be adopted?"

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I shall occupy but little of your time.

Proposal No. 212 is designed to change the veto power of the governor and make it less arbitrary than it is at present. The constitution as it now stands not only requires a two-thirds vote to pass a law over the governor's veto, but it must also have in every case as many votes as it received upon its first passage. Cases might arise in which the general assembly might repass a law by a two-thirds vote and yet the constitution as it now stands would prevent it from becoming a law. Not only that, it might repass it by a three-fourths vote and yet it could not become a law if it did not receive as large a vote as it received upon its first passage. Such a provision in the constitution gives the governor too much authority, if he desires to use it. Let me illustrate: In a house of representatives composed of 120 members and a senate of 30 members, a bill is passed receiving 110 votes in the house, and then it goes to the senate and receives 30 votes. It is presented to the governor and he vetoes it. It must then be returned to the general assembly; the house may repass it by 100 votes and the senate repass it by a unanimous vote and yet it cannot become a law. Mr. President, I do not know who wrote that constitutional amendment, but it is one of the most arbitrary and unjust provisions in the constitution of any of the states of this Union. In fact, the general assembly of this state might pass a bill unanimously in each branch and the governor might veto that bill; one member of either branch of the general assembly might become sick and, although every other member of each branch might be present and vote to repass the bill over the veto, yet it would be impossible to do so.

It is, however, unnecessary to discuss this branch of the subject more at length because during the short time that the veto power has been in existence in Ohio it has been found unsatisfactory, and on January 31, 1906, a resolution was introduced in the senate providing for the submission of a constitutional amendment which was designed to correct this evil. That resolution passed the senate by a vote of 32 to 1, and on March 6 this senate resolution passed the house unanimously, receiving 93 votes. This proposition to amend the constitution was submitted to the voters at the November election in 1908. The vote of every county in the state showed a large majority in favor of the amendment. Of those who voted more than five to one were in favor of the proposition, yet it did not carry because so many who voted for state officers neglected to vote on this amendment. A good, fair constitutional provision in regard to the veto power of the governor will not only have the merit of being just, but it will make votes for the proposed constitution among all lovers of justice and fair play.

Mr. President and Gentlemen, in this proposal I seek to make another change in the veto power. Under the present constitution it requires at least two-thirds of each house to pass a bill over the veto. I desire to change it so that three-fifths may repass a bill over the veto. Many of the states in the Union require a two-thirds vote, which I think gives the governor too much arbitrary power. In fact, it might be best to allow any bill to be repassed over the veto by a bare majority of all the members elected to each house, and perhaps the trend of modern constitutions seems to be in that direction. In my opinion, however, it is best not to make the changes too radical at present. There is a difference of opinion as to what the veto power is for. In my opinion its main use, if not its only use, should be to check hasty and ill-advised legislation. In fact, the constitution of Maryland reads as follows: The veto is given "to guard against hasty or partial legislation and encroachment of the legislative department upon the coordinate executive and judicial departments. Every bill that shall pass shall be presented to the governor."

The general assemblies of Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Minnesota, Oregon, South Dakota and perhaps some other states can pass a bill over the veto of the governor by a vote of two-thirds of those present. The Virginia constitution of 1902, provides that two-thirds of those present may pass a bill over the veto, but the two-thirds must be a majority of the members elected. In Maryland and Nebraska a bill can be passed over the veto by a three-fifths vote. In Arkansas, Connecticut, Indiana, Kentucky, New Jersey, Tennessee, Vermont and West Virginia the general assembly may pass a bill over the veto by a majority of the members elected to each house. These facts will show the modern trend in regard to the veto. As before stated, I think the main, and perhaps the only, use of the veto should be to prevent hasty or ill-advised legislation. It may be claimed that if the people approve of the initiative and referendum that we do not need the veto. In my opinion it would be as necessary then as now, and perhaps more so. The governor of a great state like this will surely possess more ability than the average legislator, and he will surely have just as sincere a desire to serve the people. In the confusion and tumult that sometimes exist in legislative bodies, is it any wonder that sometimes laws are passed that are detrimental to the best interests of the people? Sometimes such laws may be passed by the influence of a few schemers and it certainly can do no harm to have the governor review the work. I am sure that if the work of the general assembly of Ohio were reviewed by a first-class governor there would be less likelihood of the people to make much use of the referendum, even if they had the power, as they otherwise would do.

When this proposal was reported to the Convention on March 4, it was asserted by the member from Cuyahoga county [Mr. Dory] that it would give the governor an absolute veto. It does nothing of the kind. I will not say that he knows that it does not, but I know that when he makes that assertion he does not comprehend the scope of the proposal. A great many people take delight in setting up a straw man and then knocking it down, and I sometimes think my friend from Cuyahoga county, to whom I have just referred, likes that sort of business. No, there is nothing arbitrary about this veto unless the general assembly should rush some bill through at the end of the session so that the governor could not report it before adjournment. The general assembly has no right to rush bills through during the last days of the sessions, and if it does so it should take the responsibility. What is an absolute veto? It is one that cannot be overcome. The governor has no veto of that kind as proposed in this amendment. I hope this proposal will pass.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: All right.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I may be stupid—I think I am—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: You can not be more so than I am.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: The amendment in committee provided for the omission of the period after the word "governor," and the insertion of the following words: "Except that in no case can a bill be repassed by a smaller vote than is required by the constitution on its first passage." It requires a majority. Why was that put in?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: This amendment was put in to make it foolproof. There are bills in cases of an emergency that require a two-thirds vote to pass in the first instance. I never believed that the supreme court would knock that out, but to please the committee, not myself, I inserted that amendment to refer to bills requiring a two-thirds vote on the first passage.

If there is a single objection to this proposition that cannot be answered, I will myself move to indefinitely postpone it.

Mr. PIERCE: Has the gentleman from Williams any good reason to assign why a bare majority should not be sufficient to pass it over the governor's veto?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I have a reason and I am afraid it is a thin one, but I would rather always expose myself than for the other fellow to do it. We had this veto proposition passed and recommended by the republican party in 1903 on its first passage and the whole republican party wanted it. I suppose there is a great demand for this proposal, but I thought when I presented it to the committee that all I dare ask for in the way of reform was the three-fifths. My own personal opinion is that it would be best to have just a majority of those elected to repass a bill over the veto, but the reason I did not provide for that was that I thought the people who do not believe in the veto would be so pleased to get this liberal provision that they would vote for it as against the veto as it now is. When we get the initiative and referendum our socialist friends can vote the whole thing out and I will be happy. If I thought it would make more votes for it I would like to have it require only a bare majority to repass it over the veto because that is my position. I believe that our first duty in submitting a constitution to the people is to submit one better than the present, and the next is to submit one that will carry. I don't think we should violate our conscience to get one adopted by the people, but if we can get one reform up to a certain point and can't do better we ought to take what we can get. I would rather take three-fifths than leave it two-thirds, and I had hard work to get three-fifths from the committee. There were several proposals and mine was the most liberal. I had a right to suppose, if the delegates represented their different sections, that this was as much liberality as I dare ask for.

Mr. DOTY: Don't you think that if we have the veto power there ought to be a provision in it that shall make it impossible for the governor to veto without a review by the legislature?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: No; if the legislature, after having its attention called to any proposition, is willing to take the responsibility I don't know why it should be deprived of the opportunity to pass it.

Mr. DOTY: I agree with that, but perhaps I didn't make myself clear. I may make it clearer by an illustration: The general assembly adjourns today at noon, sine die. Up to noon today in the last three days they have made fifteen new laws. The governor has ten days from today at noon to approve or veto those fifteen laws. The legislature, having adjourned sine die, will never have a chance to review the governor's veto.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I see what you are aiming at. Why should not the legislature of the state of Ohio take a recess for a few days? What prevents it? You are assuming that the legislature wants to put something over on the people when they adjourn and the governor won't allow it. That whole thing can be handled by adjourning for a few days, so that the governor can report the bills.

Mr. DOTY: The member has inadvertently misstated what I had in mind. What I object to is the ability of the governor to put something over on the people.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Has he ever done it?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Do you mean to say that it has ever been done by a governor of Ohio?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Can you imagine a legislature of Ohio so stupid then that they would give the governor of this state another opportunity? I cannot.

Mr. DOTY: That doesn't affect the governor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I see the point, but I don't want to put that in there. The legislature has a remedy in its hands by refusing to pass any laws during the last ten days of the session.

Limiting Veto Power of Governor.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to ask if most of the bills that do need careful inspection by the governor are not those that are passed in the last ten days and that they need inspection to see that there is no skullduggery.

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it not possible for the legislature to have stopped ten days sooner?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; theoretically it is, but practically it is not.

Mr. KNIGHT: Haven't they the power to remain in session for ten days after the last bill is passed?

Mr. DOTY: They have, but they ought not to have. I see here two former members of the legislature besides myself. Just ask them if they think such a provision would be carried out.

Mr. KNIGHT: Then it is not the fault of the people of Ohio if the legislature won't stay on the job.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I have had some little experience and I know they could always get my vote on a proposition of that kind. It might be because I am so stupid.

Mr. DOTY: I don't think so.

Mr. JONES: Why not carry into your proposal the provision now in the constitution with reference to submitting to the succeeding legislature the bills vetoed by the governor at the close of a session?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I believe it is one of the most pernicious things in the whole matter, and I think I could clearly show you why.

Mr. JONES: I would like to know what is the pernicious thing about the provision?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: There might be a new legislature. Some years ago when I was in the legislature they passed a law requiring business men to file their names and addresses in the recorder's office. They got a whole lot of books for that purpose and they repealed the law next year. So the legislature might not want a law that was passed by a preceding one. The people don't suffer because the legislature doesn't pass laws; it is because they pass laws not in the interest of the people. What do you want to refer things to the next general assembly for? I don't believe in stringing it out when we don't see the necessity for it.

Mr. JONES: If this right is given to the governor to veto after the legislature adjourns, ought not the next legislature be given the power to pass the law over the veto?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I don't think we should arrange for anything like that. I believe it is more practical and sensible to have the legislature refuse to pass laws in the last few days of the session and thus obviate the whole difficulty you are talking about. From the ordinary man's standpoint I believe that is better than the provision in the present constitution.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is not the point of Mr. Jones accomplished this way: There is nothing to prevent the subsequent general assembly from introducing and passing the measure de novo.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: In my opinion that is a good deal more businesslike.

Mr. KNIGHT: Sometimes we have pretty nearly a brand new legislature. Would it be wise to let them pass it by a single vote?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I think it would be wiser to pass an entirely new bill. I may be wrong, but that is where I stand.

Mr. JONES: Then in respect to those bills sent to the governor and not returned until after the legislature adjourns, do you not in effect give the governor an absolute veto?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: It gives him an absolute veto if the legislature puts itself in the governor's hands, but I deny its right to do that.

Mr. JONES: Is not one of the main things that we have been seeking to provide against improper action on the part of the legislature?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: If we assume it is improper action on the part of the legislature the governor ought to veto it and the legislature should not have a right to do it again. I am not assuming that we have a scoundrel in the governor's chair. If his judgment is wrong, it is better to give him the right to veto and then correct it at the polls the next election than to hook all of this on so that the interests will get together and elect another legislature for the purpose of passing the law.

Mr. KRAMER: You suggest that you are in favor of allowing the legislature to pass the law by a bare majority?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: That is my personal view.

Mr. KRAMER: Do you think that would be fair, inasmuch as the people just a few years ago voted by a majority of a hundred and twenty thousand to give the governor an absolute veto, that now in a year or two you try to take it away?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: It might not be fair; at any rate I am opposed to it because it may be making it too liberal for the people to satisfy the radical members of this Convention, and certainly you have seen from this discussion that this is liberal enough.

Mr. WATSON: On the matter on which Mr. Kramer asked a question is it not almost impossible to defeat any amendment to the constitution when each of the political parties puts it in its platform and it is voted for as this was?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: If both political parties put it in the platform and on the ballot you can not avoid it. You take boss rule every time when both of the parties try to beat the people.

Mr. DOTY: If it is put on the ballot and we had the short ballot would not the people have a chance?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I don't know. It is hard to tell what an election will bring forth. We can have all sorts of theories as to what this or that will do but nobody can foresee exactly what will come to pass. I want this proposition to stand on its own merits. My friend from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] said that we have four or five checks now against the passing of bad laws, and we don't need another. The constitution of the United States was named as the first one, and then he spoke of the constitution of Ohio. Now I am sure that no one could suppose that the legislature came here for the express purpose of passing an unconstitutional law. I didn't know that the governor's veto was to decide the constitutionality of the laws, but whether they were first class and in the interest of the people. There are many laws passed that are constitutional, but the people don't want them.

Limiting Veto Power of Governor.

The time of the gentleman here expired and on motion was extended.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I am so pleased with your kindness, gentlemen, I never in my life paid much attention to kickers and have never tried to please them, but you will pardon me now if I stop to satisfy the kickers.

Mr. KNIGHT: I hope the proposal will pass as presented here. It distinctly removes from the veto power as now contained in the constitution two features which make it more drastic than in any other state in the Union. One has been referred to by the gentleman who just preceded me, and the other is the provision which allows the governor to veto any section of a bill that he pleases. You can take the life out of any bill by cutting a section out of it. That provision is contained in no other veto power in any state in the Union, so far as I know, and the proposal of the gentleman from Williams [Mr. JOHNSON] excludes that and limits the veto power to vetoing entire measures and items in appropriation bills. I think we are all agreed that it is desirable to have some sort of pruning process on some of these appropriation bills which are logrolled through usually during the last few days of the session. If we can make this veto power a moderate one that will work for the good of the people, and take out the extreme features of the present veto power, I think we shall have accomplished good for the people of Ohio, and I hope no change will be made in the substance of this proposal.

I want to suggest, with the entire consent and approval of the gentleman from Williams, that I have an amendment to restore a line or two that has been left out. And that is this: There is no provision in this for any official recording of the veto message of the governor, which message will contain the only official statement of his reasons for objecting to the measure. This provision is contained in the constitution of forty-two states of the Union and is in the veto clause of the present constitution. It seems not to be in this one, and therefore I offer this amendment to restore it.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 14, after the second word "which," insert the words "shall enter the objections at large upon its journal, and."

Mr. KNIGHT: The idea of that is that the veto message shall be spread at large upon the journal of the house.

Mr. THOMAS: Is not that done now?

Mr. KNIGHT: The present constitution requires it, but the pending amendment does not contain any such provision.

Mr. ELSON: I want to put a question on a subject that is long past, but I want to inquire about the governor vetoing items. Did any of you ever know of the governor tearing a bill to pieces by vetoing some sections?

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes; the corrupt practices act.

Mr. ELSON: Does not the gentleman know that in the corrupt practices act if the governor had not vetoed certain items the bill would have been absurd and absolutely unworkable?

Mr. KNIGHT: Very well, then; he had his option to veto the entire thing or send it back and let the legislature remedy it. I object to the executive having a right to tear a bill to pieces.

Mr. SHAFFER: I want to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out in line 15, the words "three-fifths" and insert the words "a majority."

Strike out in lines 17 and 18 the words "three-fifths" and insert the words "a majority."

Mr. SHAFFER: I think the time has come when we are ready to take up the progressive idea embodied in this amendment. This preserves the governor's dignity and the right to a veto and in his veto he can state the reasons why he vetoes it. He can go upon the record and the legislature then has the additional responsibility for its action when it votes upon that matter again, but it should only require a majority of all the members elected to each branch. It seems to me it embodies all the safeguards that are necessary and will bring about just what the people desire.

Mr. STOKES: I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT: You refer to the last amendment?

Mr. STOKES: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: On that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 49, nays 42, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fess,	Miller, Crawford,

So the amendment offered by the gentleman from Butler [Mr. SHAFFER] was tabled.

Mr. DOTY: As the law is now, no extended reports are spread on the journal of either house. That has been the rule. So far as the advisability of providing that the governor's veto shall be spread upon the journal of either house under the ordinary practice there are very few messages from him—

Mr. KNIGHT: Are the Doty rules to be applied to the constitution. There is nothing in the constitution to say what shall be spread?

Mr. DOTY: That is the way it is done and it is provided somewhere I think in the constitution, but not having read the constitution recently I cannot say positively—

Mr. KNIGHT: It is not in the constitution.

Mr. DOTY: It is in the constitution somewhere and it is a wise provision from a practical standpoint. Now, as to the advisability of having the governor's messages put upon the journal. Very few of those messages vetoing measures come in in time to be acted upon by the general assembly.

A word on the question of sending vetoes to the next general assembly for consideration and passage. The law requires that each bill shall be read three separate times in each house. When a vetoed bill comes to the next general assembly it hasn't been read in that house at all. So far as that house is concerned it is absolutely new matter.

Mr. KNIGHT: I wonder if the gentleman has read the amendment. It does not contain any proposition such as that. It provides that after the legislature adjourns the governor shall file them with the secretary of state, but during the session of the legislature they are to be spread on the journal.

Mr. DOTY: There is an objection to putting extraneous matter on the journal. It is a lumbering up of a matter that is already lumbered up too much. This is simply putting on a lot of material that doesn't belong there. As to sending it to the secretary of state, you will find that the secretary of state will simply deliver the messages to the next general assembly and they will go in and be piled in with a lot of other stuff.

Mr. HURSH: I move to table the amendment.

The motion to table was put to a vote and lost. A further vote being taken, the amendment offered by the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] was agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have a second amendment, not dealing with substance, but simply to bring the question in line with the usage in most of the states. After it is read I will explain the amendment. This also is consented to by the proponent of the measure.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the period in line 19 insert the words, "In all such cases the vote of each house shall be determined by yeas and nays and the names of the members voting for and against the bill shall be entered upon the journal."

Mr. KNIGHT: The object of this is simply that there shall be a record by roll call of the way in which the members vote on the repassage of the bill. The journal will then contain both the governor's reason for vetoing the law and the official vote in each house. The present constitution leaves this out. Without this a viva voce vote might be taken and it seems desirable to check up the members of the legislature. Something over thirty states in the Union require this. This is not a new feature, but simply in order that the record may be complete. I can see no objection to it and the gentleman from Williams [Mr. JOHNSON] agrees to it.

Mr. ROEHM: This says that it shall be done by a three-fifths vote. Would not that absolutely require a roll call?

Mr. KNIGHT: Then it doesn't add anything, but makes it specific.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: The gentleman stated the matter to me, and while I do not think there is any necessity for the amendment I knew the objection might be raised. I think as my friend from Montgomery [Mr. ROEHM] that you can't make a record except by a yeas and nays vote, but I agree with the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] and I have no objections to the amendment. I do not see any harm in it, although I do not think we need it.

Mr. THOMAS: It has been said that the governor never vetoes a law on account of the unconstitutionality.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I understood that; I may be wrong. I think I said it was not the special function of the governor to look after the constitutionality, but to see that the people were protected.

Mr. THOMAS: He did it two years ago.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: You ought to elect a farmer governor then.

The amendment offered by the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of line 10 strike out the period and insert a comma and add, "but no repeal of any law shall become operative or effective unless the statute or act sought to be repealed is specifically mentioned."

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I introduced Proposal No. 285 at the solicitation of some of the members of our bar in Crawford county, seeking to accomplish the purpose of preventing the legislature from enacting laws wherein they could provide that "any statute inconsistent herewith shall be repealed." They feel that that burden should be placed upon the legislature and not upon the litigants. They told me it works a hardship in many cases.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is part of the proposal which just repeals the constitution as it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Are you asking a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am rising to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT: State the point.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think this amendment put in in this way is out of order. It is new matter. The proposal does not refer to this same thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: The object in presenting the amendment at this time is not to show any discourtesy to the committee. I don't know how they feel about the proposal, but I do know we are endeavoring to save as much time as possible. If I can get this provision into the present proposal it will satisfy the desire of those who have asked me to introduce it, and it seems to me that it is a matter that ought to be given some careful consideration. I believe there is considerable merit in it, and I hope the attorneys present will express themselves upon this, as I am only acting under the advice of some members of the bar of our county.

Mr. WINN: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I have not had time to think very much about this amendment, but my attention was called to it once before, or to some proposal in our proposal book aiming at this same purpose. It will take only a moment to see the importance of it. It is not an unusual thing to find in our statutes measures concluding like this: "And all statutes and parts of statutes and all sections and parts of sections of a statute in any way conflicting herewith are hereby repealed." That is a lazy means of repealing laws. This proposal says in plain terms that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, and no law shall be revived or amended unless the new act contains the entire act revived, or the section or sections amended, and the section or sections so amended shall be repealed. And as every conflicting section is repealed by this particular provision, it is a habit of the members of the legislature to go ahead with their bills and then say at the end, "all sections or parts of sections in conflict herewith are hereby repealed," and the lawyers that have to deal with such a law as that know how almost impossible it is to find out just what has been repealed by this language. By this amendment it is proposed to have the law say in expressed terms "and section so and so of such and such an act is repealed," pointing out which one is repealed.

Mr. PECK: I want to say that there is a practical difficulty about this which has not been touched upon. You pass a new law and you say nothing about some other law that the general assembly doesn't know about. Under ordinary construction of language as laid down in the books, whether there is any mention of a previous law or not, or whether there is any such general clause as is alluded to at the end of the bill, the former act would be held repealed by implication. The doctrine of repeal by implication is that where there is an existing act and the new act flatly contradicts it the former is necessarily repealed. Now suppose you pass this provision here and the general assembly passes a law and undertakes to say what laws it intends to repeal, but overlooks something and passes this law, and then you have on the statute books two statutes conflicting with each other. Which shall take effect? I don't think you can get away from the doctrine of repeal by implication.

Mr. WINN: I want to ask you, if sometime, somewhere, some lawyer will not have to hunt that out?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Let him do it. He is paid for it.

Mr. PECK: He can't get away from it.

Mr. WINN: This would be the result of it, unless that particular section or particular statute is set out in the act, then it is not repealed by implication.

Mr. PECK: But they both are standing.

Mr. WINN: They both stand anyway.

Mr. PECK: No. Under the law as it stands now there is a repeal by implication, and the first statute is repealed by the enactment of the last. With this you would have them both standing, conflicting.

Mr. WINN: The legislature would not pass laws of that sort.

Mr. PECK: But unfortunately they do.

Mr. WINN: If members of the legislature know that unless they were particular to point out the sections of the statute that would be repealed their work would go for nothing, the statute books would not be encumbered by a lot of conflicting statutes.

Mr. PECK: I don't think it is altogether due to their carelessness or inefficiency. There are provisions of statutes hidden away in some verbiage that nobody notices. They come to the front unexpectedly to everybody and when you come across them you have a new act on the subject which takes effect. Of course, the idea generally is, and the rule laid down by the books is, that the latest law in point of time takes effect. That is the doctrine of repeal by implication. You will find it laid down in all the books on statutory laws that where two laws conflict the latest one in point of time takes effect. I don't see how you can get rid of that by this provision, because, as a matter of fact, if you do find there is a preceding law that has been overlooked and not mentioned I believe the court would ultimately decide that it was necessarily repealed and that the latest law on the subject must take effect.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: This was just what I wanted to avoid in this proposal, the lawyers getting at logger-heads. I want to say what Judge Peck said, but I can't say it nearly so well. I am going to say this; I know it won't be looked upon as bright or smart by the lawyers of the Convention, but I don't care. The constitution now says that a statute or a section to be repealed should be mentioned and it was my uniform custom when I was a member of the general assembly to do that. But we are to have a general assembly composed of all classes. If a farmer, doctor, or business man or some one who doesn't understand these things has something good for the people of Ohio, simply because he doesn't know what the law is—of course he ought to know—but simply because he doesn't know the law generally he should not be denied getting that through for the people. And yet if he would pass it without mentioning the things the whole law would be in question. This is a legislative matter. Let the legislature provide for things of that kind, if the difficulty arises, that need to be taken care of. There is nothing in the present constitution or in the new one that will prevent the thing that the gentleman from Crawford proposes, but I would rather that this would be kept out for the reason that Judge Peck has mentioned, and also for the reason that the members may be just as capable of passing a first-class law for their constituents if they are not versed in the technicalities of the law. I insist this amendment should not go in. It is said that it has been a law for sixty years, but if a law is a law for years and years and is wrong it should be repealed and a better one put in its place.

Mr. CASSIDY: I want to ask you a question on the proposal. Does not your proposal, if adopted, take away from the governor the power to veto a section of a bill?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: It does, except an item in an appropriation bill. What is the use of letting him veto a section of a law? If a law is bad let him veto the whole thing and let the legislature repass it.

Mr. CASSIDY: Do you propose to take away from the governor the power to veto a section or part of a law?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Yes.

Mr. HARBARGER: I move that the amendment offered by Mr. Miller, of Crawford, be laid on the table.

Mr. HALFHILL: On that I demand the yeas and nays. That is too important to be disposed of in that manner.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 63, nays 21, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Anderson,	Fox,	Marshall,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 212 — Mr. Johnson, of Williams. To submit an amendment to article II, section 16, of the constitution. Relative to amending veto power of the governor.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 16. Every bill shall be fully and distinctly read three different days, unless in case of urgency three-fourths of the house in which it shall be pending, shall dispense with the rules. No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, and no law shall be revived, or amended unless the new act contains the entire act revived, or the section or sections amended, and the section or sections so amended shall be repealed.

(a) Every bill passed by the general assembly shall before it can become a law, be presented to the governor for his approval. If he approve it, he shall sign it. If he does not approve it, he shall send it with his objections in writing, to the house in which it originated, which shall enter the objections at large upon its journal, and may then reconsider the vote on its passage. If three-fifths of the members elected to that house then agree to repass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections of the governor to the other house which may also reconsider the vote on its passage. If three-fifths of the members elected to that house then agree to repass it, it shall become a law notwithstanding the objections of the governor except that in no case can a bill be repassed by a smaller vote than is required by the constitution on its first passage. In all such cases the vote of each house shall be determined by yeas and nays and the names of the members voting for and against the bill shall be entered upon the journal. If a bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days, Sundays excepted, after being presented to him, it shall become a law, unless the general assembly, by adjournment prevents its return; in which case, it shall become a law unless, within ten days after such adjournment it shall be filed by him, with his objections, in the office of the secretary of state. The governor may disapprove any item or items in any bill.

Limiting Veto Power of Governor — Regulating Sale of Stocks, Bonds, Etc.

making an appropriation of money and the item or items, so disapproved, shall be stricken therefrom, unless repassed in the manner herein prescribed for the repassage of the bill.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next proposal is No. 174.

Mr. WOODS: Before we enter upon the consideration of that I want to move that when we adjourn tonight we adjourn to meet Monday evening at seven o'clock.

Mr. DOTY: I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to table was lost.

Mr. WATSON: I demand the roll call on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 53, nays 36, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I would like to ask as a special privilege that those who voted no, but have their grips out in the cloak room packed, be allowed to have their votes counted in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT: When we adjourn we will adjourn until Monday evening.

Mr. KERR: I now move that we adjourn.

Mr. STILWELL: I demand a roll call on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Are the yeas and nays regularly demanded?

A proper number joined in the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 21, nays 60, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Harris, Ashtabula,	Partington,	Winn,
Henderson,	Peck,	Woods.

So the motion was lost.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next thing in order is Proposal No. 174 — Mr. Mauck.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. MAUCK: I think this proposal justifies not only my introduction of it but also the favorable report made upon it by the committee on Judiciary. However, I shall not press it further, and for this reason: We have adopted a method of procedure by which we propose to submit all proposals to the people separately. To submit so many different proposals as are proposed here separately will create the utmost confusion. For that reason I have voted against both of the proposals submitted. In the utmost fairness, therefore, I propose to move to indefinitely postpone my own dearest proposal.

Mr. WOODS: The author of this proposal may be ready and willing to indefinitely postpone it, but I for one am not. We were sent down here to do certain work. We were not sent down here to do one or two things and then go back home. This proposal is a good one, and the proposition that the general assembly should have the right to regulate the sale and transfer of stocks and bonds of corporations that are creatures of this state should be written into the constitution, and that is one of the things we were sent here to do. Having been sent here to do these things, I for one am in favor of sitting here as long as it takes to do them. I am not going to vote against any proposal that is right because some other proposals are going to be submitted separately. I said when we decided to submit separately that it was a mistake. I said we ought first to act on the proposals and then decide how to submit them. But now let us face the music. Let us adopt these things that we ought to adopt and then if we see fit to put some of them together we can do so. Now this proposal is right. I do not believe there is a man on the floor who can say there is anything wrong about this proposal.

Regulating Sale of Stocks, Bonds, Etc.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to ask this question: Is it not a fact that section 1 of the bill of rights is not the proper place for a declaration of this kind? Ought it not be incorporated elsewhere? I ask that for information. I think it should be among the regulations of corporations —

Mr. WOODS: If I were writing this proposal I probably would put it in the other place in the constitution, but we have not now this provision in the constitution. I want it in there. If I can get it in this place it satisfies me and will accomplish its purpose, although I might have been originally in favor of putting it in some other place.

Mr. HOSKINS: The committee on Corporations has prepared a proposal that seems to contain everything this contains and one that takes care of some other matters, and it seems to me it goes in the regulation of corporations instead of the bill of rights.

Mr. WOODS: I don't doubt that the committee on Corporations has done wisely, but I am on this Judiciary committee. We considered this proposal and everybody on the committee was for it. It ought to be passed in five minutes. We are going to have an election where these things can be voted on. If there is anything that is important, the one thing is that the general assembly should be given the right to regulate its own creatures. There is nothing indefinite about the thing. It is plain; it means just what it says. If you adopt this proposal it will be approved by the people and will influence the people to approve some other proposals.

Mr. ANDERSON: When the question came up as to the manner in which to submit this constitution, whether each proposal should be submitted separately or the constitution as a whole, I opposed the proposition to submit separately because we were not ready, just as the delegate from Medina suggests, and we couldn't tell in advance the best course to pursue. We were then told whatever action we took could not in any way interfere with the acts of the Convention, and that after we got ready to adjourn and had completed our work we would decide what was best to do.

We were not sent down here for the purpose of determining in advance what we were to do some weeks or months hence to the exclusion of good proposals such as this. I am one who believes that when we finish our work we should submit it as a whole with "new constitution, yes" and "new constitution, no." We are not sent here for the purpose of legislating alone in favor of the great mass of people, but we are sent here for the purpose of legislating in favor of the people who need help. Proposal No. 174 is offered to extend to the legislature certain powers that it does not possess. I agree with the gentleman from Medina that this ought to be voted through immediately. I know the tendency — and I know why it is — that we have this rushed to get through. We have got a resolution passed that we should adjourn at a certain time and there is a disposition to slight matters. We shouldn't do it.

Mr. ELSON: If we adopt this, which we can do without much debate, and then discover afterward that it would be better to put it in another place, cannot the committee attend to that?

Mr. ANDERSON: That is the reason we have the committee.

Mr. ELSON: And it wouldn't take more than three minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; that is the fact. The question is, Is this proposal right or wrong? But I understand that we are trying to cut out all of the minor things that may come before the Convention, although they may be right, to defeat them so we may adjourn quickly and submit everything separately. It has been suggested by the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] if the committee on Corporations sends out something better than this proposal we could then adopt it. As a Convention we have the power to do with it as we please, but this proposal is before us now and we should properly consider it. Why, if some gentlemen have their way we would adjourn before the committee on Corporations brings in any report.

Take some of the measures that have been proposed by our labor friends. They have introduced some very important proposals. But there are certain delegates who want to adjourn. It is they who say that there are only two remaining proposals that should be submitted to the people, home rule and taxation. But there are more citizens of Ohio interested in two or three of the proposals introduced by the labor delegates than there are in home rule for cities.

Mr. WINN: I wish while you are on your feet you would explain what injury, if any, any person in Ohio has suffered, may suffer or it is possible for them to suffer because this was not heretofore in the constitution.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I would like to supplement that inquiry too. If it is in the power of the gentlemen from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON], I would like for him to enlighten us. If this is a good thing I would like for the gentleman to show it to us.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The gentlemen are out of order. The gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am not speaking so much in favor of the proposal as in reference to the apparent desire to not give it proper consideration. My remarks are directed to another phase of the question. I am rather inclined to be in favor of the proposal, but I intend to listen to the debate and obtain light from the men who are back of it. I have received some light from members who came before the Judiciary committee and I understand that in several instances fraud has been perpetrated by means that would be prevented by the passage of this amendment. I understand the legislature has endeavored to correct that and that those laws have been declared unconstitutional, and it is now sought by this proposal to make such laws constitutional.

Now, in reference to what the other delegates have just said about adjourning, I am as anxious as anybody to finish and go home. I am sacrificing just as much by staying away from home as any delegate, but it is our duty to obtain all the information we can in reference to these proposals and do the work that the people have sent us here to do. Now let us analyze the consistency of the action of this Convention. Resolutions were adopted stating we must adjourn at a certain time. To carry them out we adopt a rule that we will have sessions on Friday. The time required offering those resolutions and adopting them was much time wasted, because we have never observed them. Every rule adopted about holding sessions on Friday has been a pure bluff. If we want to adjourn at the time stated in the Beatty resolution, let us have sessions on Friday, let us have night sessions, let us remain here on Saturday, but let us be sure to give a full hearing and consideration to everything that comes before the Convention.

Mr. STEVENS: The matter before us is Proposal No. 174, although you would never suspect it from the remarks of the gentleman last on the floor. I simply want to read this proposal. It seems to me the mere reading of it will show we have reached the depth of the ridiculous, even if we never do get to the height of sublimity. "All men are by nature free and independent and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and seeking and obtaining happiness and safety." That sounds all right. Then we have, "The general assembly may, however, make such regulations as it may deem proper for the conveyance and sale of stocks, bonds, securities and other personal property." Isn't that ridiculous? Why, that last clause sounds as a calico patch would look on a pair of broadcloth trousers. I haven't a thing to say for or against the addition of those last three lines, which is the only change made in this. But if we are going to adopt it, let us adopt it in some reasonable place where it will fit the case, where it will sound right and where it will not add incongruity to an already too-much-patched-up piece of work.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT: Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, for a real question.

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't know what you consider a real question.

Mr. STEVENS: I will be the judge of that.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not a part of the duty of the Convention to take the ridiculous things out of our law?

Mr. STEVENS: Well, this thing is before us now, and it certainly is ridiculous. I thought when the gentleman spoke that he didn't know what the subject was and now I am sure of it. This reminds me of a little boy saying the Lord's Prayer, when he said, "Give us this day our daily bread and cake and pie." Leave the first clause as it is. It is a hundred years old in the state of Ohio, but why do we want to nail a patch on it like this last section?

Mr. PECK: This discussion grows out of ignorance to considerable extent. The supreme court decided unconstitutional a law passed by the legislature regulating the sale of stocks of goods and similar property on account of this section 1 of article I of the bill of rights. They said that it interfered with the right of property and that you couldn't pass a law which would say to a man who was engaged in business that if he proposed to sell out his whole stock in trade and he had creditors that he must give notice before he could do it. In other words it was found that this provision of our constitution was made a frequent means of defrauding creditors. A man would have a lot of creditors for a recently bought stock of goods, and he would sell the whole lot between dark and daybreak and the creditors would have to hold the bag. The legislature tried to remedy that, and the supreme court said that that law was unconstitutional because the right to hold property included the right to dispose of it and the right to hold was guaranteed by section 1 of the bill of rights. This simply provides that a remedy may be found for the fraudulent sale of goods we have had heretofore. It is the necessary thing and is the proper thing; it is the best thing we can have to protect our people against fraudulent sales.

Mr. HOSKINS: With all due respect to the committee on Judiciary I think the speech made by Mr. Stevens was a very proper one and the criticism he made was also proper. I think we should at least attempt to avoid doing ridiculous things and to attach this proposal to section 1 of article I would be ridiculous.

Mr. PECK: The supreme court has rendered it necessary that we do attach it.

Mr. HOSKINS: If you will just wait I will be through in a little while.

Mr. PECK: I will be here when you get through.

Mr. HOSKINS: I will vote for the proposal as suggested, but I do not think it ought to be lugged in here at an improper place. It hits a wrong chord. You spoil a little the music of the constitution. You make it sound out of harmony. That provision properly belongs in article XIII of the constitution, and there is a proposal reported out here that was introduced by Mr. Stokes, Proposal No. 17, which is now on the calendar.

Mr. ANDERSON: Why not take this matter up now and discuss it and dispose of it and then recommit it to the committee, as we do practically everything else?

Mr. HOSKINS: That is acceptable. I would be glad to have it as a substitute.

Mr. ANDERSON: I object to indefinite postponement though.

Mr. HALFHILL: If I understand the statement, the purpose of Proposal No. 174 is to reach and obviate a condition declared by the supreme court to exist when it held unconstitutional the statute forbidding the sale of stock.

The supreme court said a man selling out often defrauded creditors, but you couldn't pass a statute of that kind. This doesn't have anything to do with corporations. It doesn't reach the same point at all.

Mr. PECK: That is right. There is no reference at all to corporations. That refers to the sale of personal property.

Mr. HOSKINS. I have the floor. Was that supposed to be a question?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes; I was making a preliminary statement. Suppose we say that Proposal No. 174 reaches the sale of personal property such as I have stated, would this proposition that is objected to, Proposal No. 72, which relates only to the sale of the securities of corporations, in any way help this situation?

Mr. HOSKINS: We want to get right on this proposition. If this is not designed to cover the sale of property outside of stocks and bonds it is a different proposition from what I understand it to be. But at any rate this is the wrong place to insert it. I want to call attention to Proposal No. 72, which is intended to cover the whole situation as to these stock and bond concerns. I understand that is what you are seeking to do.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I don't understand that to be the aim.

Mr. HOSKINS: Then you are not getting at it right, and it is not drawn properly.

Mr. WINN: May I ask a question?

Mr. HOSKINS: Wait until I get through and I will then try to answer you. There were four or five proposals. There has been a demand for classification of corporations. There has been a demand to meet the fraudulent sale of stock of corporations and to correct the evils growing out of corporate organizations, and the power of the legislature has heretofore been limited. There were three or four proposals that the committee thought they would embody in one. There was one proposal by Judge King, one by Mr. Dunn and one by Mr. Evans, and we thought Proposal No. 72 would cover them all:

Corporations may be classified and there may be conferred upon proper boards, commissions or officers, such supervisory and regulatory powers over their organization, business and issue and sale of stock and securities, and over the business and sale of the stock and securities of foreign corporations in this state, as may be prescribed by law.

If you are simply seeking to reach personal property you should confine it to personal property other than stocks and bonds, because before this Convention adjourns, in my judgment, we must pass something that will permit the legislature to confer upon the proper board the right to supervise not only existing corporations, but the issue of their securities and the amount of stocks and the amount of bonds they may issue and sell in the state of Ohio. In other words, you will not be able to destroy these corporate evils unless we have some power that will regulate the sale of securities and stocks by those artificial persons known as corporations.

Mr. PECK: If you will read Proposal No. 174 you will find it does regulate personal property.

Mr. HOSKINS: I have read it since I got on the floor. I had supposed the way you started out that it was to regulate corporations.

Mr. PECK: It is simply to regulate the transfer of personal property, stocks of goods, etc.

Mr. HOSKINS: If you are seeking to reach personal property other than stocks and bonds in Proposal No. 174 it ought to say so.

Mr. PECK: It does say so. That is what I wanted you to read.

Mr. HOSKINS: Will the chair please tell me who has the floor?

Mr. PECK: If you just read it you will see it.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to know who owns this Convention. If you will just let me alone I will be through in a moment. There is no earthly use in getting technical or smart. We are just simply trying to reach the same object and I don't think because of years any man has any right to assume more privileges than any other member of the Convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The member will confine himself to the discussion.

Mr. HOSKINS: I wish you would confine the rest of them too.

The VICE PRESIDENT: I am doing the best I can.

Mr. HOSKINS: We tried to get a proposal similar to the Kansas blue-sky law. We have had a lot of blue sky sold in Ohio and we want to reach that. I do not think Proposal No. 174 ought to be passed in its present form. I am in sympathy with the object sought to be accomplished, but you should not pass it in its present form because it is not in proper form and is not in the proper place. When this question of corporations is reached we can then take up this whole matter.

Mr. WOODS: Are you in favor of Proposal No. 72?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Are you in favor of doing what Proposal No. 174 provides for?

Mr. HOSKINS: If I understand it, I am, and I have so stated.

Mr. WOODS: Do you think those two conflict with each other?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes; I think the provisions of Proposal No. 174 with reference to the power to regulate corporations are not broad enough. Your proposal is too narrow.

Mr. WOODS: Does not Proposal No. 72 apply just to corporations?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: I am for Proposal No. 72, but I don't think it takes care of all the things Proposal No. 174 takes care of.

Mr. HOSKINS: I admit that, as to your last three lines applying to personal property. When you get outside of stocks and bonds it doesn't fit the other classes of personal property and was not so intended, but the provisions of Proposals No. 72 and No. 174 would conflict on the question of stocks and bonds.

Mr. WOODS: Just another question: Does not article I of the bill of rights deal with personal rights, and when you regulate the sale of stocks and bonds, should not the regulation be handled so you could catch them even if it is an individual that is handling them?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Then haven't you to amend article I of the bill of rights to do that? I want to take care of this matter both ways. Why not pass both of them. It certainly can't hurt anything.

Mr. HOSKINS: If you are willing to trust the committee on Phraseology to straighten it out I will be willing to trust it too.

Mr. HALFHILL: I think there has been a little misunderstanding here on the relative province of Proposal No. 174 and Proposal No. 72. Proposal No. 174, notwithstanding the rather funny remarks about pinning that last sentence on to the bill of rights, is in my judgment absolutely and legally correct, and for this reason: A few years ago the legislature of Ohio passed a law which forbade one who was conducting an ordinary mercantile business from selling out that business without certain notice to creditors, and it was an attempt on the part of the legislature to prevent a dishonest person from stocking up with a lot of goods and merchandise and then making a sale, real or fictitious, and permitting his creditors to go unpaid. In other words, it was a righteous attempt to defeat a practice that was altogether too common and often fraudulent. But the legislature was without power to do that under the bill of rights, and it was held by the supreme court to be an interference with personal rights, and with the free transfer of property. Now this Proposal No. 174 is drawn, if I understand it correctly, so the last three words of it meet the very condition that the supreme court found that the legislature could not get around under the present constitution. If I am not correct on that point I want some member of the Judiciary committee to inform me.

Mr. PECK: That is the way the Judiciary committee looked at it and we adopted it for that reason.

Mr. HALFHILL: That being the situation this proposal contains a very important addition to the constitution because it relates to all personal property, whether held by an individual or corporation or partnership. Now then, to that extent Proposal No. 174 has met that condition which the supreme court of Ohio has declared to exist and unfetters the legislature so that it can proceed to pass this needed legislation. I undertake to say, and I believe if to be true, that all of this that is put in Proposal No. 174 pertaining to the regulation of conveyances and sales of stocks, bonds and securities, is not necessary in order to reach the end that is desired to be reached by what is called the "blue sky" law of Kansas which has been referred to by gentlemen in debate. I believe that that power is unquestionably found within the present constitution. But suppose it is not? Suppose the legislature were to endeavor to draw a statute which would be somewhere nearly as broad as the Kansas statute, so that these bits of paper with a gold seal on the corner that are peddled around the state as stocks and bonds could not be sold promiscuously as they have been heretofore, and suppose we should again encounter some decision of the supreme court which said the present constitution is not broad enough, then while we are amending the constitution we should put this provision into it, and I believe the Judiciary committee has combined the two features necessary to cover the entire question. I think this Proposal No. 174 should be adopted right now, because it is important, and then the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology may put it in some other place if they think it belongs there, but I think it belongs right where it is, and is properly a part of section 1 of the bill of rights.

Mr. MAUCK: In making the motion to indefinitely postpone I was sacrificing some personal and professional pride because I was giving something I thought I ought to have. Inasmuch as the question has been raised, and inasmuch as the gentleman from Tuscarawas has denounced this proposal as ridiculous and absurd, I propose to fight for it and I withdraw the motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I move to indefinitely postpone it.

Mr. MAUCK: You have not the floor to make that motion. I have the floor. The supreme court of Ohio, after two general assemblies had passed an act providing that bulk sales of stocks of goods should not be made in certain ways, declared the acts unconstitutional and when I observed that the failure to enforce such acts as that had resulted in great hardship to a great many wholesalers and retailers, it struck me that it would be a wise thing to give the general assembly the power to make such a law. In connection with that it struck me, inasmuch as the general assembly of Kansas made what is called the blue sky law—an act of that state regulating the disposition of stocks and bonds and other securities—that we could not have that last thing—that is, the regulation of stocks and bonds and other securities—if we could not have the regulation of personal property generally. This proposal was therefore framed with a view to giving the general assembly all of those powers, and I am gratified that the great big lawyer from Allen county joins with me in saying this proposal does actually accomplish what I thought it would accomplish and what it will accomplish, and I therefore withdraw the motion to indefinitely postpone and insist that this proposal be passed.

Mr. FACKLER: I think with the gentleman from Allen that this proposal can be amended so as to regulate the whole matter. I am preparing such an amendment. In order to see what this seeks to accomplish, let us review the legislation relative to it. The legislature passed a law providing that a man who owned a stock of goods and kept that stock of goods for sale—a shoe-store, a dry goods store or a grocery store—could not sell that stock of goods other than in the course of trade unless he first filed with the recorder a notice of his intention to sell. That was for the purpose of protecting creditors of a man engaged in that kind of a business. It had been found that many times a man would sell out his business between sundown and sunrise, take the money and get out, and the creditors would be left without any recourse whatever. In a case from Mahoning county the law passed to correct that evil was declared unconstitutional by reason of being in violation of section 1 of the bill of rights. This proposal seeks to provide a means whereby laws may be passed that will prevent that kind of fraud upon a business community. You are going to leave the business community subject to that kind of fraud unless you take the action that is offered here. I am in favor of this proposal after taking out of it all reference to stocks and bonds and then putting it on final passage.

Mr. PECK: Why take that out?

Mr. FACKLER: Leave it to the committee on Corporations other than Municipal.

Mr. PECK: Stocks and bonds are personal property.

Mr. FACKLER: Yes. I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of line 9, after the period. Strike out all of lines 10 and 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Laws may be passed regulating the transfer and sale of all personal property."

Mr. MAUCK: I would like to ask the gentleman what difference he thinks that makes in the proposal. Is there any difference in personal property of one kind or another which you seek to protect? Is the fact that I enumerate stocks, bonds and securities in order to be doubly sure something that you object to?

Mr. FACKLER: The object of this is twofold, to shorten the language and strike out "general assembly." Under the initiative and referendum proposal, submitted laws may be passed in other ways than by the general assembly.

Mr. JONES: I am in favor of the amendment just offered, but I call attention to the gentleman of an inadvertence. There is a misuse of language. The word "conveyance" has no application to personal property. What it really means is "transfer". With this change I have no objection whatever to the proposal. I happened to be assigned on the sub-committee of the committee on Corporations other than Municipal, and drafted Proposal No. 72. Part of it covers a number of proposals before the committee, and it met with the approval of the sub-committee and of the whole committee. The objects, however, sought to be accomplished by Proposal No. 72 are similar to this, to give the legislature full power over the organization of corporations and over their issue and sale of stock, and full power over anybody who offers those stocks and securities for sale. The further purpose was to provide that anybody selling or dealing in stocks for foreign corporations should be subject to licensed regulation and control. This other object is entirely a distinct one from that, and as has been suggested this decision of the supreme court prevents the exercise of the power that was attempted by the legislature with reference to the transfer and sale of personal property. This proposal, instead of fettering the hands of the legislature, is simply to untie the hands of the legislature and give it such power that it will be possible for the legislature to exercise it for the protection of the people, and I think both of these proposals ought to pass.

Mr. COLTON: I am heartily in favor of this with the understanding that personal property includes stocks and bonds. This will prevent the sale of worthless stocks and bonds of wild-cat gold mining property and it will prevent such stocks and bonds from being placed on the market. If this be done it will give great protection to the innocent people who might otherwise be induced to invest in them. I admit it looks incongruous to attach this to section 1 of the bill of rights. I regret that somewhat, and yet I would put that calico patch on the broadcloth trousers if the calico patch is the only thing at hand to close the rent and if the rent is one that seriously needs closing.

Mr. WOODS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "sale" insert "stocks, bonds and securities".

Mr. WOODS: I can not see what objection there can be to having those words "stocks, bonds and securities".

Individuals may sell them and I think the general assembly should be given this power. Certainly nobody has pointed out how the use of these three words can ever hurt anybody. I might come here from New York and undertake to sell stocks, bonds and securities of a New York corporation and why should not the general assembly have the right to regulate the manner and the way that I can offer and sell that stock to the people of Ohio? Many people here have been swindled out of all sorts of money because there was no way to get at these things. Those three words can not hurt anybody, and in my judgment it gives the general assembly power which may be used for good. I think we should leave those three words in there. I think it is a good thing, however, to change the words "general assembly" to "laws may be passed". Then adopt my amendment and the whole matter is in proper shape.

Mr. THOMAS: Then you must change the word "all" to "other".

Mr. WOODS: The Phraseology committee can straighten that out.

Mr. DOTY: We are getting familiar with that kind of talk. There are six other members of that committee, but I am on it and for the seventh member of the committee I want to say that I don't like this hop-skip-and-jump method of making a constitution by writing an amendment here and an amendment there and then leaving it to the Phraseology committee to put in shape. You complain of the legislature doing that and you want to do it yourself. It appears that if we would postpone action on this and put it on the calendar right after Proposal No. 72, with all its pending amendments, we could then consider the whole thing and dispose of it, but for heaven's sake let us have it so that some of us can know something about it and the whole thing can be kept straight. It is all very easy for you gentlemen to vote on this, that and the other thing and then say the committee on Phraseology can get it in proper form, but there is a limit to what you ought to put on that committee.

Mr. KRAMER: Oh, some of us are smarter than you think.

Mr. DOTY: I move the further consideration of Proposal No. 174 with pending amendments be postponed until tomorrow and that it be placed upon tomorrow's calendar right after Proposal No. 72 by Mr. Stokes.

Mr. KILPATRICK: I move that Mr. Doty's motion be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion was not seconded and is lost.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I think most of the troubles we are encountering could be obviated by adding two or three words to the present proposal. There is no question at all about the legislature of Ohio having had control of the subject, and I think they could pass a blue-sky law like Kansas, but the only question is whether the legislature can pass a law regulating the sales of bonds of foreign corporations, and I therefore move as a substitute for both amendments the insertion after the word "bond" at the end of line 10 of the words "domestic and foreign". That would give the legislature power over both sorts of bonds. There is no question that they have the power to regulate the sale of domestic bonds. The only question is whether they have the right to regulate foreign bonds too.

Mr. MAUCK: I am perfectly willing to agree to that amendment.

Mr. HOSKINS: I just want to say this: I hope the Convention will bear in mind that I am ready to vote for this proposal, but I believe three or four delegates could go out and reconcile all differences. I favor Mr. Fackler's amendment, and if you pass this I want you to remember that I am going to ask you to examine Proposal No. 72, because in my judgment the provisions of Proposal No. 174 only go half far enough; they do not meet the situation which the committee on Corporations wanted to meet, because they leave out some vital point. However, I am not prepared on the spur of the moment to draw an amendment to cover it. We had this submitted to the sub-committee and I want to warn you that in passing this proposal you have not covered the subject; you have only gone half way; you have a whole lot left. In the end we don't want two provisions in different sections of the constitution on the same proposition. What I would like to do is to reconcile those and get them in the same proposal. I am willing to pass this if you will give fair consideration to Proposal No. 72 when we reach that.

Mr. WATSON: I hope this will pass as originally drawn without so many amendments. It is designed to cover one point and I think it covers it. There is hardly a community in Ohio that has not seen some of its members pillaged by this method. I have seen it in my community and I have seen widows and orphans robbed. I have seen property taken away from fathers and sons. Whatever we do, let us pass this.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: I move the previous question on the whole matter.

The main question was ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The vote is first on the substitute of the member from Harrison.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. DOTY: The main question has been ordered. That motion is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT: I think not. The question is on the motion to table.

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion goes upon the second amendment by Mr. Woods.

Mr. JONES: I move that that be tabled.

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion now is on the amendment offered by Mr. Fackler.

Mr. WOODS: I move that that be tabled.

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion now is upon the proposal as amended. All in favor will signify it when your name is called.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 73, nays 3, as follows:

Proposal No. 174—Mr. Mauck. Relative to bill of rights.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That section 1, of article I, of the constitution of the state of Ohio be and the same is hereby revised, altered and amended so as to read as follows:

ARTICLE I.

BILL OF RIGHTS.

SECTION 1. All men are by nature free and independent and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and seeking and obtaining happiness and safety. The general assembly may, however, make such regulations as it may deem proper for the conveyance and sale of stocks, bonds, securities and other personal property.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Leave of absence until next Wednesday was granted to Mr. Evans.

Leave of absence until next Tuesday was granted to Mr. Stokes.

Leave of absence for all of next week was granted to Messrs. Marshall, Okey and Shaffer.

Mr. STILWELL: I move that we recess until 7:30 o'clock this evening.

Mr. KERR: I move that we adjourn until Monday at 10 o'clock a. m.

Mr. DOTY: You can't do that; we have already decided when we adjourned we would adjourn to meet Monday evening at 7 o'clock.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move that we adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was carried and the Convention adjourned until Monday evening at 7 o'clock.

FIFTY-SIXTH DAY

EVENING SESSION.

MONDAY, April 15, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the vice president and opened with prayer by the Rev. Harry B. Lewis, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The first order of business is motions and resolutions.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. DOTY: I think it is pretty well recognized that at least two of the standing committees that have not yet reported will have important reports to make, and it can not now be determined when they will make their reports. Of course, if they are not ready there will be time next Monday. If they are ready this week we should like to have the privilege of offering those reports when they are ready. Therefore, I move that the reports of the standing committees on Municipal Government and Taxation be received at any time.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. KNIGHT: I move to amend that by adding also the committee on Education, because immediately following the report of the committee on Municipal Government the committee on Education will want to make a report.

Mr. WOODS: I do not see why they should ask that. Some of us may not be here and this may be shot in at any time.

Mr. DOTY: All I ask is that I shall have leave to make the report. I know something about the scope of the report on municipal government. It will require reprinting. It can not be put on the calendar. The bill will have to be engrossed. There can not be any engrossing unless a majority of the Convention vote for it, and before it can be put ahead of anybody else a two-thirds vote will be required. I am not trying to get ahead of anybody.

Mr. WOODS: What is the purpose of making this motion?

Mr. DOTY: There will not be any chance between now and a week from now to make this report. We do not know when we shall be ready. I understand the committee on Municipal Government will be ready in a day or two and I hope the committee on Taxation will be ready in a day or two. We want to be allowed to put the reports in without a suspension of the rule. It will not take as many votes now as it would later under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WOODS: I believe in going by rule until we get through here. There has been a purpose here on the part of some to kill off everything after certain other things have been taken care of. If we go according to rule we will know when these things are reached. I won't object to these committees reporting whenever they are ready, but I hate to vote for something that gives the committee a right to do something whenever they want to. I can not see any reason for it. I think the chairmen of these committees can get up at any time and ask leave to make a report and it will be granted. I do not see why we should bind ourselves to let these committees report at any time. I am opposed to the motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am of the same opinion as the gentleman from Medina [Mr. Woods]. I do not think any committee should be privileged to break into the regular order of business. The importance of a report is a matter of individual opinion, possibly a little collective opinion, and I shall strenuously object to this motion. If this is intended to make any exceptions as to these two committees I certainly do object.

The motion was lost.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Kerr.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Judge Dwyer, of Montgomery, on account of illness.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. Hoskins for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week.

Leave of absence for Monday and Tuesday was granted to Mr. Norris.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next order of business is introduction of proposals. Unless there is objection we will not call the roll of the counties.

INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposal was introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 331—Mr. Walker. To submit an amendment to article VIII, sections 12 and 13, of the constitution—Relating to the board of public works.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Is there any other proposal? If none, the next order is reference of proposals to committees.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposal on the calendar was read the second time by its title and referred as follows:

Proposal No. 330—Mr. Dwyer. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

RESOLUTIONS LAID OVER.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next order of business is resolutions laid over. The first resolution laid over is Resolution No. 99—Mr. Pierce, which the secretary will read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. PIERCE: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention. I introduced this resolution last Monday night for the purpose of getting the Convention to work to get through with its labors. It has been said all the time during this Convention that there has been considerable complaint over our delay; that we are putting the people to a good deal of expense, and that we ought to get through with our labors and go home. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Wood [Mr. BEATTY] introduced a resolution to adjourn at a time definite, I think to adjourn within that time it is absolutely necessary for the Convention to settle down to work and try to get through with its labors. In this resolution I have provided for three sessions a day on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of each week. I apprehend there will be considerable difficulty in passing that resolution, especially that part of it relating to Friday, and, so far as I am personally concerned, I am willing that that part of the resolution may be amended. I believe with that exception we ought to hold three sessions a day. If we hold three sessions a day and do not make them too long it will not tire the Convention as much as it does the way we have been holding them. It is the long sessions that tire the Convention out. In my judgment we will meet at 9:30 a. m., hold a two of two-and-a-half hour session," adjourn until 2 p. m., hold a three-hour session, adjourn until 7 o'clock p. m. and hold until 9 o'clock p. m. It will not entail any hardship on any one in this Convention and I believe we should pass that resolution. I do not think there ought to be any serious objection to it on the part of the Convention because we all realize we have been in session fully three months, and we have accomplished only a very small part of the work to be accomplished by the Convention.

Only last week we saw an attempt in this Convention to get one question up and give it precedence over other questions. I was opposed to that and I shall oppose everything of that kind that comes up, because I want everything to take its regular order, and I believe that every proposal that is submitted to this Convention should be given due consideration and thought. We can not give the vast number of proposals now on the calendar and that will be on the calendar hereafter and perhaps that will be introduced later this consideration unless we buckle down and get to work.

I also provided in the resolution that the chairman of a committee or the chairman of the minority of a committee might talk not exceeding one hour and all the others not to exceed thirty minutes, unless unanimous consent is given. We have been limiting the time of speakers, but it has been the uniform rule that whenever a member's time expired someone would move to extend the time and the extension has been granted. When a man has prepared a speech no one wants to cut him off, and, through courtesy, the time is extended. But I believe we have reached the point when we ought to object to these extensions. I am satisfied that any man who has anything important to say can say it in fifteen minutes or half an hour at most, and if he can not say it in that time it had better be left unsaid. I know what little I have to say I can say in fifteen or twenty minutes and I believe every other member of the Convention can do the same thing.

If the Convention feels that this part of the resolution relative to holding sessions on Friday is too onerous I would be willing for some one to offer an amendment to cut that out because I realize every man in the Convention has work to do and things to look after at home. I know I have. I have been here every minute of the time and up to this time I have not asked leave of absence. Perhaps there are members of the Convention who are busier than I am and who are compelled to take the time to see to some of their outside affairs, and if it is necessary for them to have it let them have it. I have been here evenings, and I am satisfied from my observation that a great many people are in the same position that I am. They hardly know what to do with their time in the evenings. I believe we could employ it in discussing some of these questions. If it is necessary for members to be excused the president is always glad to excuse them, and I am satisfied there will not be so many who will want to be excused that we won't have a working number.

Therefore, I am going to insist upon the passage of this resolution with the possible exception of Friday's session. Perhaps I have given the chairmen of the different committees too much time and this may interfere with the resolution offered by Mr. Rorick that this Convention adopted. If it does, this resolution ought to be made to conform to that resolution.

Mr. DOTY: The member from Butler [Mr. PIERCE] has touched on one conflict that there is. If this resolution is amended by striking out the third paragraph, it would leave the Rorick resolution, on the last page of your calendar, the resolution in effect governing. You will find that this resolution doubles the time given to members, and I think the provision of the third paragraph would really defeat the purpose Mr. Pierce seeks insofar as affecting debate. I think the first two paragraphs ought to be adopted and the rule we now have in the Rorick resolution ought to stand. We have been working on it some days; we have become accustomed to it and we have found it to work well. I move, therefore, to strike out the third paragraph.

The delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] here took the chair.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] was read as follows:

Amend Resolution No. 99 by striking out the third paragraph.

Mr. ROEHM: I am opposed to that part of this resolution relating to night sessions, unless we are in the midst of something important and the members want to come back. I do not believe it is fair for a great number of important proposals to be placed before the Convention and argued and voted upon when there are only seventy-five or eighty members on the floor of this Convention. A proposal must have sixty votes to be passed and for that reason it is not fair to a proponent of a measure that it be considered before a small attendance. I would be in favor of the resolution provided there is some means by which we can and will compel attendance of members during the sessions. I therefore offer the following amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In the first paragraph of the resolution strike out the words "from seven to 10 o'clock p. m." Strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two". Strike out "a. m." following figures "12" and insert "m". Strike out the word "night" in the second paragraph.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the amendment offered by the delegate from Montgomery [Mr. ROEHM].

Resolution Relative to Sessions and Limiting Debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I want to say a few words in favor of that amendment. The question is one of physical endurance. We know a dozen members of this Convention have been compelled to go home and remain for a week or two weeks on account of breaking down from the work here, and it is ridiculous to suppose for one minute that members, after three months of arduous work can stand the strain of morning, afternoon and night sessions. Therefore, I trust the amendment of the delegate from Montgomery will prevail.

Mr. HALFHILL: I hope that amendment offered by the delegate from Montgomery [Mr. ROEHM] will prevail and I want to add a further suggestion. While it is true that a number of members have become sick from overwork, I would like to know when these important matters that are to be debated here can be prepared by those responsible for presenting them to the Convention? I have not found any time that has hung heavily on my hands here. I have not found time to properly prepare and present some things that I ought to have presented to the Convention. Of course, the more time you have to prepare, the better you can reduce and boil down your efforts. I am in favor of all reasonable limitations upon debate, but the work of this Convention has been very arduous. I do not believe there is any gentleman here who has taken his share of the work—and most of them have—who would give the number of hours to his private affairs that he has given to the state, and with the hours of time that are given the committee work and these long sessions we ought not to have any night sessions as a matter of rule; but if we get into a place where we have to have a night session in order to clean up some matter before the Convention, that is another thing. I object to night sessions of the Convention, not only because it is beyond the physical endurance of many of the members, but because we need some time to prepare work that is to be presented here.

Mr. HENDERSON: I would like to have the matter read again.

The resolution and the pending amendments were again read.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the amendment offered by the delegate from Montgomery [Mr. ROEHM].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the amendment by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

Mr. McCLELLAND: I have serious objection to the amendment proposed by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty]. The resolution offered by Mr. Rorick and passed by the Convention specifically excepts two questions which will involve the longest and most strenuous debate that we will have and upon those two subjects of taxation and municipal government there is no restriction whatever. I don't think it is safe for us to go into a discussion of those questions without a time limit. It seems to me the time limit offered by Mr. Pierce would apply to these subjects—I don't know how that would be—but the time limit in Mr. Pierce's resolution would certainly apply to them, and it seems to me that we should, before the speeches on those subjects begin, adopt some time limit, for we have found it is not safe to go into any debate without a time limit on any subject.

Mr. DOTY: Do you contend that the resolution we have under consideration changes the Rorick resolution? My amendment was to avoid conflict.

Mr. McCLELLAND: If your amendment is lost there will be a seeming conflict.

Mr. DOTY: As chairman of one of the committees referred to I am not going to speak an hour and what I am trying to do here is simply to avoid a conflict.

Mr. McCLELLAND: If Mr. Pierce's resolution applied to the same thing as Mr. Rorick's—

Mr. DOTY. I beg you pardon, but it doesn't.

Mr. McCLELLAND: I said, if it did. I know it doesn't, but if your amendment is not carried there will not be any time limit with reference to those two committees; and when we take up those subjects there will be unlimited debate. That is what I am referring to and what I want to guard against. We ought to have some amendments applying the provisions of the Rorick resolution relative to debate to those two subjects.

Mr. DOTY: I have no objection to withdrawing my amendment and letting you offer one.

Mr. McCLELLAND: I would substitute for the figures of the Pierce resolution the same figures we have adopted for all other subjects and apply them to those two committees.

Mr. DOTY: That is what my amendment would do.

Mr. McCLELLAND: No, it won't. Those two subjects are excepted by Mr. Rorick's resolution.

Mr. ELSON: It seems to me those two subjects can be taken care of when they come up. We can make rules on each subject after it arrives. For my part a great many of the proposals that will come before us can be disposed of in a very short time, and I do not think long debate is necessary. I do not anticipate a long debate on anything except taxation. I hope it won't be too long, but it will be long. The importance of the subject demands it. I do not think municipal government will be so long. I think we shall be generally agreed to pass the substance of the proposal when it comes up. On Thursday of last week we disposed of two or three important subjects in a very short time. In the afternoon we disposed of one in half an hour that was very important and it didn't provoke so much debate. My opinion is that many of the proposals that we shall adopt in the next week or two will be adopted quickly and there is no need of any debate.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to suggest that if the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] will withdraw his amendment I shall offer one in place of that embodying all the Rorick resolution except the last clause and offering it for this third section of Mr. Pierce's resolution.

I will read it for information:

Strike out the third paragraph and insert the following:

Be it further resolved, That hereafter debate upon all questions shall be limited as follows:

Author of proposal or chairman of the standing committee to which it was referred, thirty minutes upon the second reading of the proposal and five minutes upon any amendment thereto.

Resolution Relative to Sessions and Limiting Debate.

Other members fifteen minutes upon the second reading of the proposal and five minutes upon any amendment thereto.

Upon resolutions upon questions of adoption, five minutes for any member.

Upon all debatable subsidiary motions five minutes for any member.

No member's time shall be extended except on two-thirds vote.

I leave off the last paragraph of the Rorick resolution.

Mr. DOTY: If this Convention desires to repeal the so-called Rorick resolution you can do it, but this won't do it. If you want to do that you have to take off the last clause.

Mr. KNIGHT: I will add then, "Resolution No. 91 is hereby repealed."

Mr. DOTY: That will do it.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM. Without objection the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] is withdrawn and the delegate from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] offers an amendment which the secretary will read.

The amendment was again read.

The question is on the adoption of this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOODS: It does seem to me we should be careful what we do in matters of this kind. I have gone through two houses and along toward the end of the session they do just such things as this, and then after they have done them they complain. I don't want to take up unnecessary time, but if we are going to wade into subjects like taxation and some other things like that I may want to say something. I don't believe I want to take more than fifteen minutes, but I don't want what remarks I have to make cut off. I may wish to talk more than fifteen minutes. I am not in favor of tying ourselves up. There is not a man in this Convention who is more eager than I am to get away, but I am willing to stay here and do right all that we do. If we are not going to do right let us not do at all. I say to you in all frankness if you pass this resolution you will be sorry for it when you adjourn and then carefully consider the work of this body. It is a mistake and you will agree it is a mistake after you have done it.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I don't think it is practical to secure an attendance of the members of the Convention on Friday afternoon. In my case if I go home on Friday afternoon I have to start in the middle of the afternoon to make it. If I wait until the end of Friday afternoon's session I can not get away until Saturday and then it takes nearly all of Saturday to get home. I believe you can not compel attendance with that rule, and I think on Friday afternoon there wouldn't be a quorum under this resolution. I believe if we pass it at all and make it so the adjournment will come Friday noon we can get better work. If this resolution is passed at all, it should be changed, and I hope in its present terms the resolution will be defeated.

Mr. STEVENS: It seems to me that a resolution to limit debate ought to be carefully considered. I refer particularly to that part which will limit debate to five minutes on any amendment to any measure. The experience of this Convention has taught every man in it that it is very liable to happen that an amendment to a proposal is more important than the proposal itself. That has happened time and time again, and will happen hereafter, and to limit debate on amendments to five minutes when the amendment may contain more important matter than the proposal itself, is certainly unreasonable and not consistent with the best interests of the Convention. I am in favor of limiting debate. I am only sorry it was not done the first day of the Convention, because I do not believe there is a man in the Convention who can not run dry in one hour. At least, we have seen a number of them do it and then start all over again. I hope the resolution in its present form will not be passed.

Mr. HENDERSON: I agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Highland [Mr. BROWN], that we who are farmers need some time to get home, and to hold an all-day Friday session doesn't give us the proper opportunity. I think the resolution is objectionable in its present form.

Mr. READ: We have had some experience of the fact that regulations do not regulate. I do not believe it is possible to make any regulations at the present time to compel this Convention to do more work or rush through faster than we have been doing. I agree with the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] that we have work to do outside of the Convention as well as in it, and this outside work takes time. I do not find time dragging on my hands. There are quite a number of important proposals to come before the Convention. They should be considered carefully in your own study, and you should come here with the result of that investigation. We have seen from our experience last night that if we attempt to run this Convention all day and night people get tired. The members take little interest in what is going on. They sit around, but often their minds are not on the work and the work is not as well done as it would be if we had less time in the Convention and more opportunity for study. I do not believe we should try to run this Convention through so hurriedly. We hear that the sooner we get through the better the people will be pleased with our work. For my own part I don't pay any attention to such foolish and unfounded remarks. There is nothing in them. The people whose opinions are worth anything care more for the kind of constitution we produce than for the length of time we take in doing it. We have been in session fifty-five days. The second constitutional convention was in session one hundred and thirty-five days and the third one hundred and eighty-eight days. I do not believe it is possible for us to finish this work in less than forty-five days more and I don't believe in these night sessions. I think we can do better work by meeting Monday night and Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday and then adjourning and having the remainder of the time for study. Then we can come back fresh and start in with the work. I don't believe in rushing the thing through. I am not in favor of any resolution to regulate or limit the time or to attempt to close the work of the Convention in any definite time. I move that Friday be exempted from the rule of all-day sessions and that on Friday the adjournment be at noon.

Mr. KRAMER: This makes the third time we have solemnly resolved to stay here on Friday. The first time we did it, I think it was done in good faith. I know now that it is not in good faith. The very crowd that are trying to stay here on Friday will be the first bunch to break for home on Thursday evening. I am willing to stay here on Friday, but I am not willing to stay on Friday when there are only thirty or forty stayers, and you fellows who are talking about staying on Friday know that you won't stay until Friday afternoon, but that you will only stay until Friday noon. What is the use of thirty or forty sitting around here in the hot summer and pretending to do something when we can't? We have tried it before. I think there is one unfortunate clause in that resolution and that is to the effect that we have been here three months and have only done a small fraction of the work. I think a great portion of the work has been done.

Now I am in favor of limiting debate. Every one knows that every man in the Convention can say all he has to say in thirty minutes on any subject. When he has talked that long the Convention is not going to listen to him much longer. You know that. You know that these speeches an hour and a half or two or two and a half or three hours in length get into the debates, but they do absolutely no further good and only encumber the record.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you mean to say that anybody can deal with the question of taxation in anything like thirty minutes?

Mr. KRAMER: I think thirty minutes is long enough.

Mr. HALFHILL: Well, how about five minutes on amendments?

Mr. KRAMER: I think five minutes possibly is a little short, but any man can, in thirty minutes, lay down his premises and draw his conclusions to the perfect satisfaction of the members of the Convention. I don't know about the five minutes. I am like the member from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS]. I am afraid that is cutting it a little too short. But it is just like every other body, we are always going to extremes. We have done that heretofore in having unlimited debate and now we want to go too much the other way.

Mr. ROEHM: I am opposed to Friday sessions. I have voted against them even when the yeas and nays have been called. I have gone on record every time to adjourn Thursday night, but I have noticed that a great many of those who vote no when the yeas and nays are called vote aye when it is a viva voce vote, and they are the first ones to take their traveling bags and break for home on Thursday. The reason we don't have a quorum on Friday is that those who vote no on adjourning over Friday adjourn Thursday and get out first. I am in favor of having the time just as it has been so far as Friday sessions are concerned. On Thursday when we get ready to adjourn, those of us who vote aye should be privileged to get away, and those who vote for a Friday session should be compelled to stay here.

Mr. BOWDLE: I am against this resolution in its present form and I look on the matter much as does the gentleman from Medina [Mr. WOODS]. I think up to this time each one has made his speech for his constituents and for the record and we are now doing a good deal of work. I have this sad reflection, that under the proposition now before the house I, as a minority of the Judiciary committee, am going to make a minority report on the subject of divorce. In my judgment divorce is an infinitely more important question than the initiative and referendum, infinitely more important than whether the circuit court sees the witnesses or not, infinitely more important than changing the labels on the court. Divorce is the great question in America. And yet on that subject I am to be limited to five paltry contemptible minutes. I am willing to be limited to thirty minutes. I quite agree with the gentleman from Richland that pretty near all good things can be said in thirty minutes. Possibly taxation is such a magnificent subject that it may require two hours, but if the liquor traffic question were worth two weeks, and the judiciary matter was worth four or five days, then the greatest question before the American people, the question of divorce, is worthy of more than five minutes. However, I shall vote for this resolution now before us if two-thirds of those here will enter into a solemn covenant that they will extend my time from five minutes to thirty minutes on the subject of divorce.

DELEGATES: No.

Mr. BOWDLE: Inasmuch as the agreement is not forthcoming, I am going to vote against this resolution as often as opportunity allows.

Mr. PRICE: I have been here, I don't know how many Monday evenings, listening to resolutions to hold Friday sessions, but I have seen but one Friday session. Time will soon be up tonight, and we haven't done a thing. I move this resolution and all amendments be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next resolution laid over is No. 101.

Mr. DOTY: I call attention to the fact that the member from Scioto is not here. I move that we informally pass that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The member expressed to me, and I don't know to how many others, that he was willing that the resolution be disposed of.

Mr. DOTY: Do you mean the member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] said he is willing to let the Convention dispose of it as they saw fit?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Yes.

Mr. CORDES: I move that the resolution be tabled.

The VICE PRESIDENT: It has not been read yet.

Resolution No. 101 was then read as follows:

Resolved, by the Fourth Constitutional Convention of Ohio, That the report of the historian and reference librarian of this body, as to the proposed contract with the Ohio News Bureau Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, is hereby approved, and said historian and reference librarian is directed, on behalf of this Convention, to execute this contract.

The VICE PRESIDENT: What should be done with the resolution?

Mr. CORDES: I move that it be tabled.

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next resolution is No. 102.

Mr. DOTY: That is a resolution providing that we do not have a session tonight so we can go to the banquet. As we are having a session, I move that we indefinitely postpone that.

Introduction of Resolution — Reports of Standing Committees.

The motion was carried.

Mr. COLTON: Order No. 3 was passed over and I would like to introduce a resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the resolution will be received.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 103:

Resolved, That the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology be authorized to print such of its reports on the various proposals as it may deem necessary before presenting them to the Convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The resolution goes over under the rule. Are there any reports from the standing committees?

Mr. STILWELL: Yes.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. Stilwell submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Labor, to which was referred Proposal No. 34 — Mr. Thomas, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"The contracting or sale of prison labor or the product of prison labor, by the state or by any political subdivision of the state is hereby prohibited, and no prison made goods shall be sold in the state unless the same are conspicuously marked, 'Prison made.'"

All persons confined in any penal institution in the state, so far as may be consistent with discipline and the public interest, shall be employed in some beneficial industry for the use of the state or its political subdivisions, and where a prisoner has a dependent family his net earnings may be paid to said dependents for their support."

The report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT: If there is no objection this report will be engrossed.

Mr. STILWELL: I move that it be printed.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Fackler submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Initiative and Referendum, to which was referred Proposal No. 291 — Mr. Watson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"SECTION 1. At the time when the vote of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of any revision, alteration or amendments made to the constitution by this Convention, the following article, independently of the submission of any revision, alteration or other amendments submitted to them shall be separately submitted to the electors in the words following, to wit:

SECTION 1a. Every elective public officer of the state of Ohio or of any of its political subdivisions, may be removed from office at any time, by the electors entitled to vote for a successor of such officer, through the procedure and in the manner herein provided for, which procedure shall be known as the recall, and is in addition to any other method of removal provided by law.

SECTION 1b. Upon the filing of a petition as herein provided, asking for the recall of any such elective official, the question of recalling said official shall be submitted to the electors entitled to vote for a successor of such official, at the next succeeding annual November election, occurring not less than ninety days after the filing of said petition. The number of signatures necessary upon said recall petition shall be as follows:

(a) For the recall of an official for whose successor all of the electors of the state are entitled to vote, twenty (20) per cent. of said electors.

(b) For the recall of an official for whose successor the electors of any district, county, municipality or part of a municipality are entitled to vote, twenty-five (25) per cent. of the electors of such district, county, municipality or part of a municipality.

SECTION 1c. The basis upon which the required number of petitioners in any case shall be determined, shall be the total number of votes cast for the office of governor at the last preceding election therefor, by the electors of the state, district, county, municipality or part of a municipality entitled to vote for a successor of the official sought to be recalled. All petitions asking for the recall of a public official shall be filed at the same time and in the following places, to-wit:

(a) For the recall of an official for whose successor the electors of the entire state are entitled to vote, in the office of the secretary of state.

(b) For the recall of an official for whose successor the electors of a district comprising more than one county and less than the entire state are entitled to vote, with the board of deputy state supervisors of elections of the most populous county in said district.

(c) For the recall of a county or municipal official, with the board of deputy state supervisors of elections of the county whose electors are entitled to vote for a successor to such official or in which the municipality of which the incumbent is an official, is located.

SECTION 1d. The general election laws shall apply to recall elections in so far as applicable. Any recall petition may be presented in separate parts, but each part shall have attached thereto the affidavit of the person soliciting the signatures to the same, which affidavit shall contain a statement of the number of the signers of such part of a petition and shall state that each of the signatures attached to such part was made in the presence of the affiant, that to the best of his knowledge and belief each signature to such part is the genuine signature of the person whose name it purports to be, that he believes the persons who have signed the same to be electors and that they signed said petition with knowledge of the contents thereof, that each signer signed the same on the date stated opposite his name, and no other affidavit thereto shall be required.

Every recall petition shall contain a general statement of not more than two hundred words, giving the reasons for such recall. Each signer of a recall petition must be an elector of the state qualified to vote for a successor to the official sought to be recalled and shall place on such petition, after his name, the date of signing and his place of residence. In the case of a signer residing outside of a municipality he shall state the township and county in which he resides, and in the case of a resident of a municipality, in addition to the name of such municipality he shall state the street and number, if any, of his residence and the ward and precinct in which the same is located. The names of all signers to such petitions shall be written in ink or indelible pencil, each signer for himself.

The signatures upon such petitions so verified shall be presumed to be in all respects sufficient unless not later than forty days before the election, it shall be otherwise proven, and in such event ten additional days shall be allowed for the filing of additional signatures to such petition. No recall election shall be held invalid or void on account of the insufficiency of the petitions by which such election was called. After one recall petition and election, no further recall petition shall be filed against the same officer during the term for which he was elected, unless the petitioners signing such petition shall first pay into the public treasury which has paid such election expenses, all the expenses of the preceding election.

Separate ballots shall be provided for the expression by the electors of their vote for or against the recall of officials sought to be recalled. There shall be printed on the recall ballot, as to every officer whose recall is to be voted on at said election, the following questions: "Shall (name or person against whom the recall petition is filed) be recalled from the office of (title of the office)?" following which question shall be the words "Yes" and "No" on separate lines, with a blank space at the left of each, in which the voter shall indicate by making a cross-mark (X), his vote for or against such recall.

In case any official against whom a recall petition has been filed shall die or resign, all further proceedings in the election shall be stayed. If a majority of all the votes cast by the electors entitled to vote for a successor to such official at the election at which the recall of the official is voted upon are in favor of the recall of such official, his office shall be deemed vacant and shall be filled according to law.

SECTION 1e. At the election at which this amendment is submitted to the electors, a separate ballot in the following form shall be furnished to each elector desiring to vote:

RECALL OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

	For recall of public officials.
	Against recall of public officials.

Separate ballot boxes shall be provided for the reception of such ballots. The elector shall indicate his choice by placing a cross mark (X) within the blank space opposite the words "For the recall of public officials" if he desires to vote in favor of the amendment above mentioned and within the blank space opposite the words "Against recall of public officials" if he desires to vote against the amendment above mentioned. If the votes for the recall of public officials shall exceed the votes against the recall of public officials, then the section above mentioned shall be section—of the schedule of the constitution regardless of whether any revision, alteration or other amendment submitted to the electors shall be adopted or rejected."

Mr. HALFHILL: Before that report receives any action at the hands of the Convention I move that the minority of the Initiative and Referendum committee be given until day after tomorrow to prepare and file with the secretary a minority report. The purpose of that is to not stop the printing of this report of the committee. The meeting of this committee was called for last Wednesday evening and it conflicted with the session of the Convention. At that time several members of the committee did not feel like absenting themselves from the Convention, so as to attend the session of the committee at which the committee finally agreed on this majority report. This contains the report of twelve members; I believe that is all that signed it. Now there are some of the minority that desire to present some sort of a report. It may be very brief; it may be a report which only recommends indefinite postponement, but the minority want to put themselves on record in the report. That is the purpose of the motion.

Mr. DOTY: You ask until day after tomorrow?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Until four o'clock?

Mr. HALFHILL: The first of the session will be enough.

Mr. DOTY: Then I move that further consideration of the report be postponed until four o'clock Wednesday and that it be made a special order for that time.

Mr. HALFHILL: There is a motion before the Convention. Do you want to make that motion?

Mr. DOTY: No; you can make it.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then I withdraw my motion and you can make your motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion is to postpone and make it a special order for four o'clock Wednesday.

Reports of Standing Committees — Eligibility of Women to Certain Offices.

Mr. MOORE: Will this report be printed?

The VICE PRESIDENT: In the journal.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Knight submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Education, to which was referred Proposal No. 65 — Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends its indefinite postponement.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. McClelland submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Education, to which was referred Proposal No. 187 — Mr. Watson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back, and recommends its indefinite postponement.

The report was agreed to.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 163 — Mr. Miller, of Crawford, which the secretary will read.

Proposal No. 163 was read the second time.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I shall not attempt to consume much time in the discussion of this proposal as I think I will be able to state clearly the object of it in a very few minutes.

As you know, this proposal was introduced by request of the Ohio federation of women's clubs, and we are assured that there is no selfish purpose in the proposal as originally introduced. The including of notaries public was at the suggestion of a member, through a proposal, and the committee that had these under consideration, inserted that feature here. I have no objection to it at all, as I understand that other states allow women to hold notary commissions, and it is not only an advantage to the women, but often quite a public convenience for stenographers and bookkeepers to have these commissions. The real purpose of this measure is to permit women to be selected on boards and as superintendents of those institutions where women and children are interested and cared for. To show how free from selfish interests the ladies are in this matter, I will only need to say that the original draft of the proposal, as first suggested by the ladies, made eligible, not only the women of Ohio, but any woman who is a citizen of the United States, thereby clearly demonstrating that the object sought was the securing of the very best trained women for the heads of correctional institutions where the interests of women and children are involved, and not merely to afford an opportunity for women to secure employment.

The real purpose of confinement in a penal institution is now recognized everywhere to be the reformation of the offender, whenever possible, as much as the immediate protection of society.

The great majority of cases of juvenile delinquency and violation of law can be traced more or less directly to the home environment, lack of mother love and care, the direct cause often of poverty, and just about as often of over indulgence of well-to-do parents, granting the child every thing it may desire except the most important of all—real interest, love, confidence and companionship of the parents.

Lack of these will soon force the child to seek amusement outside of the home, and when he goes hence unprepared and without the admonition and watchfulness of the parents, he has embarked upon an exceedingly dangerous voyage. Dr. White said that "The shores of this perilous strait of human life are strewn with wrecked manhood and womanhood," and when these unfortunate wrecks become offenders of the law and find themselves in some correctional institution what do they need? Not the iron hand of a master to wield the rod or commit to solitary confinement. No; with but few exceptions they need a little real kindness that will shine through the clouds of their misguided lives, a little real interest manifested by some one in their behalf, a few words of encouragement, dropped now and then, a little motherly love to touch the dormant spirit of obedience and virtue that will respond in many cases to humane treatment.

We are only asking in this proposal that these womanly and motherly influences be allowed unrestricted opportunities in those public institutions of the state and its subdivisions, where the educational and moral interests of women and children are emphasized.

Ohio is now one of the few states that is not keeping pace with the reasonable demand and good policy of the great majority of the states in permitting women to serve on boards and as superintendents of institutions that are recognized as purely correctional.

I might name a few of the institutions that women are at the head of in the different states, and my information is that in all of them their work is eminently satisfactory:

Reformatory Prison for Women, Massachusetts; Women's Reformatory, Bedford, N. Y.; The Indiana Women's Prison and the Indiana Girls' School, Clermont, Ind.; Chester County Hospital for Insane, Westchester, Pa.; The New York Foundling Asylum; The Michigan Children's Home Society; reformatories for girls in California, Delaware, District of Columbia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, West Virginia, Wisconsin and also a reformatory for Negro boys at Hanover, Va.

I desire to read a letter from the superintendent of the New York Reformatory for Women, at Bedford, New York, Dr. Katharine Bement Davis, who is conceded to be one of the most capable and successful women reformers:

Mr. GEORGE W. MILLER,
Constitutional Convention,
Columbus, Ohio.

My Dear Sir: I have your letter of March 22 in reference to positions to which women can be appointed in the state of New York. In reply would say that at the present time there are four state institutions of which women are the superintendents. These are the New York State Reformatory for Women at Bedford Hills, the Western House of Refuge for Women at Albion, New Eligibility of Women to Certain Offices.

York State Training School for Girls at Hudson and the Thomas Indian School for Indian children at Iroquois. The last named institution formerly had a man as superintendent. I believe the general consensus of opinion is that it is quite as well managed under the present superintendent as it ever has been. The other three institutions have never had anything but women superintendents and I think their management compares favorably with that of the institutions managed by men. On our boards of managers we have both men and women for all institutions in which women and children are cared for, and in one institution at least, which cares entirely for boys, namely, the State Agricultural School for Boys and Industry. It seems to us unquestionable that not only are the institutions as well managed, but certain scandals which occurred from time to time in states where institutions for women and girls were managed by men have been avoided.

If we can give any further information which will be helpful we shall be glad.

Very sincerely yours,

KATHARINE BEMENT DAVIS,
Superintendent.

I also desire to read a letter from the Superintendent of the Indiana Women's Prison:

George W. Miller,
Columbus, Ohio.

Dear Sir.: The board of trustees of this institution is composed of women appointed by the governor for a term of four years. The Indiana Girls' School, at Clermont, Indiana, also has a board composed of women appointed in the same manner.

I think that women are better able to manage an institution where women are confined—at least we feel that in this city they are—and presume the same can be said of all the others in this state.

I am sending you a copy of our last report, which has just been received from the printer, and you may be able to get some idea of our work here.

Yours truly,

E. K. RHODES,
Superintendent.

I shall read a few facts from the report of Women's Prison of Indiana—first, as to the law governing that institution; and, second, as to the management. Section 6163 of the Indiana law is as follows:

The general supervision and government shall be vested in a board of managers consisting of three persons who shall be women, to be known and designated as the "board of managers of the Indiana Reformatory Institution for Women and Girls." The members of the first board, to be appointed under this act shall be Mrs. Emily A. Roache, Mrs. Rhoda M. Coffin and Mrs. Eliza

Hendricks, whose terms of office shall be respectively two, four and six years, said terms of office to expire in the same order as the names occur in this act. As vacancies subsequently occur in the board their successors shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of all the senate, and shall hold their offices for the term of four years from their appointment, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. The term of each manager shall be designated in her certificate of appointment. At the expiration of the term of service of any members of the board of managers one manager shall be appointed in the same manner, whose term of office shall continue four years from and after the expiration of the term of her predecessor and until her successor is appointed and qualified. All vacancies in said board shall be filled by appointment by the governor, subject to approval by the senate at its next succeeding session. The person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be entitled to hold her office for the unexpired portion of the term of the person whom she may be appointed to succeed. Said managers before entering upon the discharge of their duties, shall take an oath or affirmation faithfully to perform the duties of their office; which oath or affirmation shall be filed and preserved in the office of the secretary of state; provided, however, that the governor, auditor and secretary of state shall constitute a board of audit whose duty it shall be to examine, audit and approve of the accounts and acts of said board of managers appointed under the provisions of this act.

Section 8168 reads:

Said board of managers may, with the approval of the governor, appoint a suitable superintendent of said institution and all necessary subordinates (not exceeding a number to be fixed by the governor) and fix their respective salaries; and shall have power, with the like approval, to make and enforce all such rules, regulations, ordinances and by-laws for the government and discipline of said institution and for the admission of girls into the reformatory thereof, as they may deem just and proper.

The superintendent and all the subordinate officers of said institution shall be females; Provided, however, that if a married woman shall be appointed superintendent or to any subordinate position, the husband of such appointee may, with the consent of the board reside in the institution, and may be assigned such duties or employment as the board of managers may prescribe.

I find in this report, under the head of "Penal Department," that the work of the women consists of washing and ironing, sewing, quilting, cooking, gardening, care of live stock and lawn, and all necessary labor connected with the institution, even to the interior painting, and the manner in which they perform their tasks shows that they are taught "that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well."

Eligibility of Women to Certain Offices.

Under the caption "Correctional Department" the report says:

This department is accomplishing a much needed work, and it is to be hoped that its value may be more generally recognized in all the counties of the state. So far as possible, considering the length of the sentence, the women in this department are given the same instructions as the women on the penal side. They are being taught to do housework, to cook and to sew. They are doing excellent work not only for the institution but for outside patrons as well.

Together with the penal women they attend the chapel services, and have Sabbath school and prayer meeting. For many it is the first time in their lives that they have been so surrounded with helpful influences.

In this connection I wish to read from the report of the special legislative committee created by house joint resolution No. 20 and senate resolution No. 24 of the 79th general assembly of Ohio, which report refers to the Indiana Women's Prison and the Indiana Girls' Industrial School, both of which the committee inspected:

Indiana has an institution which the committee visited, and which, while it differs quite materially from the Bedford Reformatory, has the same ultimate purpose in view.

In conclusion they say:

While it would be a matter, perhaps, which the present legislature itself could not consider by reason of the constitutional restriction, we believe that an institution of the character proposed should be partly, if not wholly, under the management and control of women, a policy adopted with the greatest success in other states and one in which we are signally failing to conform to the most enlightened experience of the day.

Governor Harmon, in transmitting the report of the committee to the general assembly in a special message, February 6, 1911, says, "Public sentiment has become acute on the subject which the report of the committee brings to you."

Much time and study have been devoted to it by women of the state generally and by many of the men. Ohio established the first industrial home for delinquent girls, but long ago lost its lead to other states. The report confirms the unanimous judgment of officials and others as to the proper course to pursue at the girls' home and I concur in all its recommendations.

There is no doubt that women should be put in charge of both prison and reformatory.

The Girls' Home at Delaware is now under the management of a woman, Miss Charlotte Dye, who was recommended by the women of Ohio, and who at the time was a resident of Indiana. Miss Dye had five years of experience in correctional institutions of Illinois and four years in Indiana. Reports from every source clearly demonstrates that Miss Dye is eminently qualified for the work and that the condition at the home is now greatly improved.

The girls are taught how to do all kinds of useful work—care of their rooms, cooking, sewing, gardening poultry raising, fruit raising and many other things—that will fit them for some usefulness in future life.

Corporal punishment has been abandoned, other and better means are employed to discipline; their style of dress has been changed and made, not more expensive but neater and more tasty; their mode of living has been improved; their rooms are kept neater, and many of them have exhibited a credible pride in keeping their persons and rooms in exact order; refining influences have been thrown around them and real interest manifested in their future welfare. There are 380 girls at the home now, and over 600 out on parole. These latter are kept under the constant care and watchfulness of four parole officers who are women; they know all about the girls out on parole; they visit them and write to them and let them know that some one is deeply interested in their welfare. This influence on the lives of those girls cannot be estimated.

The sooner we recognize that the surest way to drive offenders of the law to lower depths of degradation is to cease to show any interest in them and to constantly remind them of their failures and make them feel that they are without friends, the sooner we will be in a position to accomplish greater good in our correctional institutions; and I want to say in passing that there is room for a great reform, in this respect, in our present day social conditions.

This proposal only makes it permissible to appoint women on boards or as superintendents where the interests and care of women and children are involved, and who will attempt to argue that the state should not have the right to secure the service of women where their influence is so urgently needed? We now have them at the head of some of our most prominent schools. We have them all over our state as teachers in every department, and who would desire to presume that their work is not of the higher order?

Now, if we should want their influence in the management of our women's prison, soon to be erected, or in the Boys' Industrial School, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' School, the School for the Blind, or in any other institution, or as members of any board where the best interests of women and children demand their services, then why should the state be denied this privilege? Gentlemen, as I said in the beginning, the spirit that prompted this proposal has been a purely altruistic one, free from every thought of selfishness, looking only to the bettering of our state institutions, to strengthen good and lessen evil, to give self-help and unfold the possibilities of honest endeavor and a clean life.

I sincerely hope that the proposal may receive favorable consideration by the Convention.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 5, strike out all of the remaining part of said proposal beginning with the word "provided" and substitute the following: "provided that nothing in this section nor in the constitution shall prevent the appointment of women who are citizens, as notaries public, or as members of boards, or to positions in those departments and institutions established by the state or any political subdivision thereof, where the interests or care of women or children or both are involved."

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I have offered this substitute amendment at the request of the Legislative and Executive Departments committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, and I am requested to offer an explanation. Three proposals providing practically the same or similar things were pending in the committee at the same time as the proposal by Mr. Miller, of Crawford, a proposal similar in character offered by the delegate from Montgomery [Mr. STOKES] and one offered by Mr. Harter, of Stark. The committee has given the proposals careful consideration and with a constantly growing interest in the matter involved. This substitute offers concisely the conclusions of the committee in regard to the matter. There were slight differences in the verbal expressions of the different proposals, but they were along the line of enlarging the scope and opportunity for women in connection with the reformatory, benevolent and industrial institutions in Ohio.

I said our interest had continually and constantly increased in the subject. We took it up first in committee. Later, after we had reached the agreement which was substantially unanimous in the committee, we were informed that representatives of the Federation of Women's Clubs of Ohio desired a hearing because they were not exactly satisfied with what the committee had agreed on. We gave the hearing very readily and the ladies appeared before us and explained to us that we were not opening the doors sufficiently, that women were not only capable of doing more than we were offering them the opportunity to do, but they were doing it in other states and doing it well, and so far as the opportunity was offered they were making good in Ohio. They pointed particularly to the matron of the Girls' Industrial Home at Delaware and the good results every day appearing from that change. Later, when we thought we had agreed upon an amendment which would be satisfactory, we were told that we were still a little short of what we ought to offer to the women of Ohio. Subsequently another delegation of ladies addressed the committee and they assured us that we should make no exception, that we ought to make the women of Ohio eligible to appointment on any board or to any position of responsibility in Ohio. They talked exceedingly well and convincingly, but the committee are of that conservative temperament that they were not inclined to yield quite all that was asked, and so in this substitute which accompanied the report—

Mr. WOODS: I want to ask the gentleman whether he is a married man or not?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think I have already substantially admitted I was under good training. I do not know that it is necessary for me to argue on this matter, but I express the unanimous opinion of the committee when I say that we stand behind the substitute that is offered. This extends to women who are citizens of Ohio an opportunity to become notaries public, to be appointed as members of boards or to positions in those departments and institutions established by the state or any political subdivision thereof where the interests and care of women or children or both are involved. We thought it should stop there, and as to whether or not we were wise, you must be the judges. It certainly is a very great advance from existing political conditions in Ohio, and I believe that the time and the state of the public mind, and the fact that the women have made good along all of these lines, justify us in taking this advanced position and taking it now.

Mr. STOKES: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: The constitution of 1851, article XV, section 4, provides that no person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector. The proposal provides for amending this section so that women could be appointed to any position in those institutions of the state where the interests of women and children are involved. The committee amended the proposal so that women who are citizens could be appointed notaries public, members of boards or to any position in those institutions established by the state or by local subdivisions thereof where the care of women or children or both is involved.

The conditions revealed by an investigation of the Girls' Home at Delaware three years ago made necessary a change in the management of that institution. The investigation was the direct result of the agitation of the members of the Ohio Federation of Women's Clubs, an organization having a membership of fourteen thousand of the most learned and best equipped women of the state, giving their money, time and talent, without compensation, unselfishly to the task of creating a public sentiment that would compel better conditions in those institutions of the state where the interests of women and children are involved. These women are not suffragists, they are not asking for any office; they are mothers, conducting their own homes, with the great mother heart and mother instinct, and no one better knows how to make these homes of the state homes in their truest and best sense. The investigation into the Delaware home revealed a condition that at once caused a change in management. From every part of the state there was a demand that a woman be put in charge, but under the wording of the constitution, that no one shall be elected or appointed to office unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector, a woman could not be the appointive head of the home. A woman was, however, made the active head of the home; it is now a model of its kind. The proposal as amended will make it possible that the real head of institutions of this kind may be a woman, and not only can a woman be the head of this institution at Delaware, but of any and all institutions in the state or any subdivision thereof having care of women or children or both.

Mr. ANTRIM: Am I to understand the only difference between your proposal and that of Mr. Miller, of Crawford, is that you admit the word library before "board"? Is that it?

Mr. STOKES: We throw down the bars and throw the door open absolutely, so that women can be appointed to all of these positions where the interests of women and children are involved.

In my county of Montgomery we have a county children's home conducted by a board of three men. In the city of Dayton we have a juvenile court home conducted by the county commissioners, all good men and true, and yet not one will deny that women might perform the duties involved in their management equally as well as men and in many cases much better. Men are a busy set and they are unable to give all the necessary time to the many details involved in the proper management of these homes. And who better than a woman can see the little wrongs or find the insanitary conditions or see the dirt and microbes lurking for want of time on the part of men to peek into the dark places and bring to light a condition that should not exist?

I wish to read a letter that I have received from the Russell Sage Foundation, located at 105 East 22nd St., New York city, an institution founded by the Sage millions and devoted in part to child-helping. This letter gives the location of institutions in the various states, of reformatories for women, girls and children. The president of the organization is Mrs. Russell Sage, and on the board of directors, among others, is Miss Helen Gould:

April 9, 1912.

Mr. W. W. STOKES,
Southern Hotel,
Columbus, Ohio.

Dear Sir: Mrs. James R. Hopley has forwarded me your letter of April 3, requesting the names and places of institutions now presided over by women.

A complete list would be a very long one. I can only give you a few, as follows:

Reformatory Prison for Women, Sherbon, Mass.; Women's Reformatory, Bedford, N. Y.; Women's Reformatory Prison, Indianapolis, Ind.; Chester County Hospital for Insane, Winchester, Pa.; reformatories for girls as follows: Morrison, Cal.; Marshalltown, Del.; Washington, D. C.; Geneva, Ill.; Clermont, Ind.; Mitchelville, Ia.; Beloit, Kan.; Hallowell, Me.; Lancaster, Mass.; Adrian, Mich.; Sauk Center, Minn.; Chillicothe, Miss.; Geneva, Neb.; Trenton, N. J.; Hudson, N. Y.; Delaware, O.; Darling, Pa.; Howard, R. I.; Salem, W. Va.; Milwaukee, Wis.; also reformatory for negro boys, Hanover, Va.

There is a multitude of orphan asylums and children's homes under the superintendency of women; for example, the New York Foundling Asylum with 2,000 children, under the superintendency of Sister Teresa Vincent. Women are also found as the executive officers of many important charitable societies, such as the Boston Associated Charities, the San Francisco Associated Charities, the Michigan Children's Home Society, and the Hampshire County Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, in Massachusetts.

There is now general agreement between social workers that institutions which care for girls or women exclusively should be under the superintendency of women.

Yours very truly,

H. H. HART.

I do not wish to take the time of the Convention in further explanation of the proposal or to speak of what different states are doing along these lines, but I do wish to impress upon the members of the Convention the necessity of Ohio's standing in the very fore front in giving the women of the state an opportunity to hold these important positions and to show, not only to the people of Ohio but to the world, what they can accomplish in responsible positions. It is only placing the matter in the hands of the appointing power having the authority for that officer to exercise a wise discretion, and if a woman will make the better officer, to open the door to her. I hope the proposal may be adopted.

Mr. KING: Gentlemen of the Convention: I have only a few words to say on this proposal. I was surprised at the enumeration of proposals on the part of the chairman of the Legislative and Executive Departments committee, as they had evidently overlooked a proposal which would have saved them the trouble with the Federation of Women's Clubs and other organizations. The ladies came to me and asked me to introduce a proposal similar to the Miller proposal. I told them they were too modest by half, that I could discover no reason why the bars should not be let down and why women should not be eligible to every appointive office within the gift of the appointing power in Ohio. I put in a proposal intended to accomplish that purpose. It is Proposal No. 260:

No person shall be elected to any office in this state unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector, but this provision shall not be construed to prevent the appointment of women to any position filled by appointment.

I would leave it to the judgment of the appointing power to determine as to the fitness of the applicants, whether male or female, for any appointive position in the state. I would do this in perfect confidence, because as long as women are not electors and the men do the appointing, we can well trust the women to take care of our noble and valorous sex and the women would be appointed only when the circumstances were such as to vindicate their competency and fitness for the peculiar position they were called on to fill. I can see no reason on earth or under the constitution why there should be a distinction as to appointive offices, and so when you commence to write a proposal putting in these different things you find trouble with your language.

Mr. PECK: Why don't you offer yours as a substitute?

Mr. KING: My proposal ought to be amended, but it is the basis for what I would like to see done. I move, as a substitute to strike out all after the words "as follows" and substitute Proposal No. 260.

The VICE PRESIDENT: How was the amendment of the delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] offered?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: It is offered as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Do you offer it as a minority report?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: No. The committee offered an amended proposal, which was put upon the calendar, and mine is offered as a substitute for that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Then we will consider it as an amendment and this amendment will be in order.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I move that we recess until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock. A number of members would like to go to the banquet tonight. We have been here for two hours from a sense of duty and not because we wanted to be here, and I think in justice to that number we ought to recess until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

Eligibility of Women to Certain Offices.

Mr. PECK: We can put this thing through in fifteen minutes.

Mr. DOTY: The amendment offered by the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] is not before us for action. He still has the floor.

The amendment offered by Mr. King was read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and the pending amendment and insert the following:

"No person shall be elected to any office in this state unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector, but this provision shall not be construed to prevent the appointment of women to any position filled by appointment."

Mr. FACKLER: May I ask the gentleman from Erie [Mr. KING] a question?

Mr. KING: Certainly.

Mr. FACKLER: Do you think your amendment would permit women to act as notaries public?

Mr. KING: I certainly do.

Mr. FACKLER: Is that an appointive position?

Mr. KING: Yes; an act of the legislature was held unconstitutional because it violated this particular subject. They passed it once permitting women to be notaries public.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I now move that we recess —

Mr. DOTY: Just a minute. I move that this matter be postponed until tomorrow. These amendments are complex and the member from Crawford [Mr. MILLER] desires further time to examine them. I also move that this retain its position at the head of the calendar.

The motion was carried. "

Mr. PECK: I move that we adjourn. We want to have a little time for our committee meetings tomorrow morning. We haven't been able to get a committee together to hold a meeting for a week.

The motion was lost.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I move that we adjourn until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

The motion was carried and the Convention adjourned until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

FIFTY-SEVENTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

TUESDAY, April 16, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. P. H. Chapple, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Harter, of Huron.

Leave of absence was granted Mr. Watson on account of illness.

Consideration of Proposal No. 163 was resumed.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the substitute of the member from Erie [Mr. KING] to Proposal No. 163.

Mr. KING: I have redrafted that amendment and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment heretofore offered and substitute my redraft for it. It presents the question fully and fairly.

Consent was given, the former amendment was withdrawn and the following amendment was offered:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and the pending amendment and insert the following:

"No person shall be elected to any office in this state or appointed to fill a vacancy in any such office unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector, but this provision shall not be construed to prevent the appointment of female citizens of this state to any office or position of honor, trust or profit, which office or position is by law only to be filled by appointment."

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I would like to state briefly my opposition to the amendment offered by Judge King. I feel that I am speaking for the Ohio Federation of Women's Clubs in this matter, and I favor the Harris amendment as reported as a substitute for the report of the committee. The reason the women of the state do not ask for all the appointive positions to be opened to them is that they think if the woman's suffrage proposition goes through they will be eligible not only to appointive but to elective positions. Should the woman's suffrage proposal be defeated, they are afraid that this proposal will fail too. Therefore, they favor this modified form of allowing appointments to positions in institutions where women and children are concerned. They do not care to hazard their chances by demanding too much.

Mr. STEVENS: If it were not already agreed to submit the proposition of woman's suffrage to the people of Ohio I would be in favor of the King amendment. I am in favor of woman's suffrage. We are going to submit that question of equal suffrage, and if that carries it will, of course, carry with it all the privileges that are contained in the King amendment. On the other hand, if the proposition for equal suffrage should meet with the opposition of the voters of Ohio, the King amendment would fall with it and be destroyed by the same vote that destroys equal suffrage. The King amendment and equal suffrage are governed by the same principle. Consequently I believe the people who are in favor of equal suffrage would have more chance by having all their eggs in one basket. I favor the Harris amendment, because it is entirely possible for the Harris proposition to carry and the equal suffrage proposition to fail. In that event the equal rights for women would make a step forward anyhow. If we adopt the King amendment and lose the equal suffrage we will lose both. We have two chances with the Harris amendment and only one the other way. I hope the King amendment will not prevail, not because I do not think it is a good thing, and not because I would not favor it as an abstract proposition, but I hope the King amendment will fail and the Harris amendment be carried.

Mr. STOKES: The women's clubs of Ohio, representing a membership of 14,000, that agitated this question, were not for opening the way for women to hold office, but for opening a way to put women in charge of these institutions where the interests of women and children are involved. The agitation of this matter was caused by the condition of the Girls' Home at Delaware, and they do not want to enlarge the sphere of women so far as holding office, but only to the extent of bettering the condition of women and children in certain institutions and I hope and trust that this report of the committee will be adopted. It has been before the committee as many as half a dozen times. The women from different parts of the state have been before the committee and have argued the different questions, and not any of them have taken the position that they want the Convention to adopt a measure as broad as the King amendment. While I agree with him in many respects in the amendment, I disagree with him this time because the women of Ohio do not want it, and I hope the King amendment will be defeated and the measure adopted.

Mr. KING: Of course, I shall have no objection at all to that which is sought by the committee's report. I believe when this is incorporated as these gentlemen wish it done, it leaves a good deal to be determined. They leave to be determined the question of what institutions there are where the interests of the women and children are involved. This might include all the penal institutions of the state, the penitentiary and the state reformatory. If, therefore, we leave open to the appointing power the determination of availability and feasibility of appointing women to hold any appointive offices in the state, as I said last night, too many will not be appointed.

Mr. RILEY: Have you taken into consideration the fact that we are liable to adopt the short ballot and that by this amendment you will make women eligible to be appointed to everything, the office of attorney general and everything else?

Mr. KING: I didn't take that into consideration because I didn't know just where the short ballot is. If what I hear about it is true, it never will be adopted.

Mr. RILEY: The proposition has been sweetened and it is liable to be adopted.

Eligibility of Women to Certain Offices.

Mr. KING: But what sweetens it for one side spoils it for the other.

Mr. RILEY: Don't you consider this is involved in the short ballot proposition?

Mr. KING: No; I am not thinking about that. I cannot understand how gentlemen who so ardently supported the equal suffrage proposal which gave open door for all appointive offices, and elective offices as well, to women, oppose the opening of the door as far as can be to appointive positions. This is short and it says what it means. It leaves nothing for construction and it ought to be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The point which Judge King seems to bring out here prominently in the extent and scope of this proposal is a little indeterminate. All of those things were considered in the committee and it is true that it might require a decision of the supreme court to determine just how far women are eligible and where the eligibility ceases. But this is true, that if the substitute offered by the Judge should be approved by the Convention, there would be no discretion left with the governor so far as eligibility of women is concerned, and it might be somewhat embarrassing in some cases to make a choice. The conclusion of the committee was that it would be easier and less embarrassing for the governor to make a choice under the proposal with the amendment offered last evening by myself than if it opened the door completely. There is not any phase of this matter that has not been gone over by the committee. I apologize to Judge King for not enumerating his proposal when I enumerated the others last night. There were four proposals including that of Judge King.

I do not know that I can say anything in addition to what I have said and it would be somewhat of a repetition. The question is one that each delegate should settle for himself. The member from Tuscarawas touched upon a point worthy of consideration. We want to accomplish something, even if we fail in accomplishing all that we desire.

Mr. WINN: I am in favor of the substitute offered by the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] and I want to tell why.

I can not agree that the adoption of the substitute will weaken the proposal in the eyes of the voters. I am of the opinion that if the substitute is adopted and the proposal as amended by it is submitted to the electors it will be approved. If there is any danger at all of the failure of the electors of the state to approve woman's suffrage, then let us have in lieu of it the very best obtainable. I do not know that there is anything to be alarmed about in the fact that the short ballot may be adopted by us and ratified by the people. Indeed, if I were sure that the short-ballot proposal would receive favorable consideration at our hands and would then be approved by the people, I would be ten times more in favor of the King proposal than I am now.

It is my judgment that all the electors of the state who are opposed to woman's suffrage, and who will vote against it, will vote in favor of the proposition to make them eligible to appointment. It will be understood by every man who comes to vote that it will only secure appointments of women to positions for which they are best qualified. Of course, it may sometimes be embarrassing to the governor to decide between some applicants for appointment for an important position, the applicants being women, but the same thing applies to men. The governor is often embarrassed because there are different applicants for appointment to the same position, but even with this, there are within the hearing of my voice a goodly number of gentlemen anyone of whom is willing to take upon himself that embarrassment. Let us do the best we can for the women of this state. Of course, it may be that fourteen thousand members of the women's clubs of the state—and they are splendid women—would not prefer in this matter to go to the extent of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Erie [Mr. KING]. But they are comparatively few in number. Fourteen thousand is a very insignificant part of all the women of the state. We haven't heard from many of the women of the state, and I doubt very much if many of them have been called upon to express an opinion directly whether they would prefer the original proposal or the amendment of the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING]. I am in favor of the amendment for the simple reason suggested by its author and also for the reason that it removes from consideration the necessity to call upon some court or tribunal to determine who are eligible to appointment under the original proposal. We can just as well remove that—we can broaden the scope of the proposal and it will stand just as good a chance of being adopted as though it opened to the women of the state only one-half as many offices. Those in favor of woman's suffrage simply seek to accomplish that much more. I am in favor of the King amendment.

Mr. HURSH: I voted for woman's suffrage, but it is very problematical at best whether woman's suffrage is going to carry in the state of Ohio. The Legislative committee considered this proposal very carefully and at length. They finally reported out the proposal, and later some women, representing the Ohio Federation of Women's Clubs, came to us and stated their suggestions and we took them up and tried to comply with them, and the result we have in the Harris amendment. We went as far as the women before us asked us to go. If we load this proposal down with the King amendment the result will be that it will stand in the same category as woman's suffrage and you can not expect it to have any more strength. We want to give the women something along this line. We want to give them the superintendence of those institutions in which women and children are interested, but if we put these amendments in this proposal it will be involved in the fight against woman's suffrage, and if woman's suffrage goes down this proposal necessarily must go down with it and we will have nothing. This is the right step and a long one in the proper direction. If we are to accept the amendment of the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] the result is, assuming woman's suffrage fails, the women will have a right to fill all the appointive offices in the state without the right of ballot, and if we succeed in getting the short ballot the women will have a right to apply and will apply for every position they can get in the state and counties and other political subdivisions. These arguments will be made against the proposal. I believe the amendment of the delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] should be adopted, and fear if we add to it the amendment of the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] the whole proposal will go down.

Eligibility of Women to Certain Offices.

Mr. STOKES: I move that the amendment of the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] be laid on the table.

The motion on a division was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The motion to table is carried. The question is now on the amendment of the delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. ANDERSON: I want to call the attention of the Convention to the proposition in the Harris amendment. It is a well-known rule of law that where you attempt to enumerate the law only applies to the things enumerated. Do you not in your amendment, Mr. Harris, mention certain positions to which women may be appointed, and then you try to make a general provision at the end? Really, doesn't your amendment fall short of what you are attempting to do?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think the objection offered by the delegate from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] is a little too farfetched. I think the punctuation will prevent difficulty, if he will read it as it should be read. In the first instance, to illustrate, one suggestion was that women should be eligible to library boards. We promptly cut out the "library" and if it is properly read it will avoid all difficulty. We did not intend to indicate any particular boards or particular departments, but any position in which the interest or care of women and children or both were involved.

Mr. ANDERSON: Why would not this, added to the King proposal, settle the whole matter? I like the King amendment better than I do the Harris amendment, for the reason that it seems to me clear and does not admit of different interpretations. Would there be any objection to this: "No person shall be elected to any office in this state or appointed to fill a vacancy in any such office unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector, but this provision shall not be construed to prevent the appointment of female citizens of this state to any office or position of honor, trust or profit in institutions of the state wherein the interests of women or children are involved."

Does not that give you everything you ask for and in better form?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The matter of form is a matter of opinion.

Mr. ANDERSON: In other words, add to Proposal No. 163 "in those institutions of the state wherein the interest of women and children are involved."

Mr. KING: In enumerating you have left out the notaries public.

Mr. ANDERSON: I didn't enumerate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I can not admit that the question the gentleman raised is pertinent.

Mr. THOMAS: The amendment of the gentleman from Mahoning does not include "departments." It should include the word "department" where the women are employed. It does not include boards of charity, and the women make a special request that that should be enumerated. I think the amendment of the delegate from Ashtabula covers all of the subject.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I think this proposal should be changed to read: "Provided that nothing in this section nor in the constitution shall prevent the appointment of women who are citizens as notaries public and to positions in charge of departments or institutions established by the state or any political subdivision thereof where the interests or care of women or children or both are involved."

I would suggest that by general consent this change be made. It at least would simplify the language and confine the appointment of women to positions in the institutions as originally desired by the committee.

Mr. STOKES: Would not that eliminate inspectors of workshops?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Yes, I think it would; but I do not understand that the proposal is attempting to give any privileges except in institutions where women and children are involved.

Mr. STOKES: Are not women and children involved in workshops?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Then the workshops would be included. I don't see anything in the Harris amendment about workshops.

Mr. THOMAS: The word "department" covers that whole subject.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Then I was in error in interpreting the purpose of the proposal. I was only trying to simplify it.

Mr. FOX: As a member of this committee I want to say that we have not had a proposal before us that has taken up as much time as this proposal now under consideration. We have had more than half a dozen meetings, and have had various parties before us. I am satisfied we have done the best we could and the more you try to change it the worse it will be. The committee gave all the women of Ohio asked for, and I hope it will be adopted as presented.

Mr. WINN: I wish while you are on your feet you would explain to the Convention why your committee, after so much deliberation, made use of this particular language: "Provided that nothing in this section nor in the constitution."

Mr. FOX: Is that in the substitute of Mr. Harris?

Mr. WINN: Yes.

Mr. FOX: I don't understand about that.

Mr. KING: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out "women who are citizens," in the amendment offered by Mr. Harris, of Ashtabula, and insert "female citizens of this state".

Mr. HURSH: Does not the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology attend to things like that? We have given quite extended consideration to the proposal and have tried to cover the subject. We have the essence of the proposition in good shape and I hope without further quibbling this proposal will pass.

Mr. KING: If we are going to pass it at all, we ought to pass it in the best form that we can give it. We cannot shoulder everything off on the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology. Our work is to get things in proper shape and this is a proper correction, not changing at all the meaning or sense of the proposal, but simply putting in a better expression.

Mr. THOMAS: The women are opposed to putting the amendment of Judge King in the proposal. I think the matron at Delaware was brought here from Indianapolis or some point outside of the state because she is an expert in that class of work. The amendment of Judge King would prohibit the employment of any women other than those who are citizens of Ohio. The language as used in the amendment would make the same provision for the appointment of women as for men and it should be left as it is.

Mr. KING: I do not understand that under the constitution of Ohio any person can hold an office in this state who is not a citizen of the state, whether a man or a woman. The employment of a person is a different thing from holding an office. Please bear that in mind. An office is created by the constitution or a law passed pursuant thereto, and a person to hold any office must be a citizen of Ohio. That is why we are trying to pass this, in order to make them who are not electors eligible to office.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I would ask the chairman of the committee if this proposal means that women shall be appointed as members of boards of any department relating to the work of women and children? My interpretation is that it admits of the appointment of women to all boards and departments and that would include the penitentiary and state board of agriculture and all of those different places.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Certainly it would permit their appointment on the penitentiary board. As to the board of agriculture I doubt that.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Is not the "all boards" language that will allow them to be appointed to any board where women and children are involved?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Certainly; I think it permits their appointment to every board where women and children are involved.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: But would it not permit them to be appointed to all boards whether the women and children are involved or not?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is not the opinion of the committee and not mine. As properly read it does not admit of what you say. For instance, there would not be any question as to the reformatory at Mansfield. There are no women there. It might apply to the state penitentiary, because there are some women down there, unfortunately. I think the distinction is easily seen by a person who wants to see a distinction.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I move that the amendment of the member from Erie [Mr. KING] be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. FESS: I now move the previous question.

The previous question was regularly demanded, and, a vote being taken, the main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the delegate from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the passage of the proposal as amended and the secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 99, nays 1, as follows:

Mr. Brown, of Pike, voted in the negative.

This roll was called by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty.]

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: A point of order. I want to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that one of the rules has been violated. There is a rule that says no one shall be at the secretary's desk except the clerks.

Mr. DOTY: You are right. The rule was violated and I will leave.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 163—Mr. Miller, of Crawford. To submit an amendment to article XV, section 4 of the constitution. — Relative to who eligible to office.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

No person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state unless possessed of the qualifications of an elector; provided that nothing in this section nor in the constitution shall prevent the appointment of women who are citizens, as notaries public, or as members of boards, or to positions in those departments and institutions established by the state or any political subdivision thereof, where the interests or care of women or children or both are involved.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 5 by Mr. Cunningham.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: There are a number of amendments to article V, and I think they are unimportant except one. I therefore move to strike out all the proposal after the word "elections" in line 8.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of said proposal after the word "elections" in line 8.

Omitting Word "White."

The SECRETARY: That strikes out the last sentence in line 8.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: That last line is section 6 of article V, of the constitution as now existing. My object is simply to strike out the word "white" in the constitution and leave everything else just as it was. While the proposal contemplated an amendment allowing citizens in the military service of the country and state to vote, I think that has been covered by the supreme court; therefore it is not necessary, and my idea about amending the constitution is to let it alone where it is all right and simply to amend where it is absolutely necessary. In order to get the word "white" out we have to amend only section 1. If this amendment prevails, the only change in that section will be the striking out of the word "white."

A vote being taken, the amendment offered by the delegate from Harrison [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] was agreed to.

Mr. KING: I want to offer an amendment. There is no use having a half dozen amendments to the same section. Proposal No. 242, which has been reported in this Convention favorably and which is on the calendar, should go in as section 2 of this proposal.

The amendment was read as follows:

Insert as section 2 the following:

"All elections shall be either by ballot or mechanical device or both preserving the secrecy of the ballot. The general assembly may regulate the preparation of the ballot and determine the application of such mechanical device."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the proposal as amended.

Mr. FACKLER: I move that the vote by which that amendment was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. DOTY: I move to lay that motion to reconsider on the table.

A vote being taken on the motion to table, the president announced that it seemed to be carried.

A division was called for and the vote being taken, the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was lost.

Mr. FACKLER: There is a reason for that, and I want to call attention to it.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is, Shall the motion adopting this amendment be reconsidered?

Mr. KILPATRICK: What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT: The amendment adds this section to provide for voting by the use of a machine. That was adopted and then the motion was made to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted. There was a motion to table that, which was lost, and now the question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. FACKLER: My reason for not wanting Proposal No. 242 inserted as an amendment to Proposal No. 5 is that the sole object of Proposal No. 5 as now before us is to strike out the word "white." The form of submission of Proposal No. 5 will have to be different from the form of any other proposal. It will be provided that Proposal No. 5 shall be a part of the organic law unless the proposal providing for woman's suffrage is made a part of the constitution. If we put the proposal of Mr. Roehm in this proposal and woman's suffrage carries, Mr. Roehm's proposal will be lost with this one. Let us not tie the two things together because of the peculiar method in which Proposal No. 5 will have to be submitted, lest we have two conflicting and contradictory amendments carried to the constitution.

Mr. KING: When the provision is made about the submission it can simply be stated that if the proposal is adopted and the proposal providing for equal suffrage carries that section 1 of this proposal shall be null and void. That has not anything to do with section 2. You can well say in your form of submission that if woman suffrage carries, section 1 of this will be null and void. That still leaves section 2 which provides the manner of election. My objection to making it a separate proposal is that we are going to run up into a large number of proposals to which the electorate will give absolutely no consideration.

Mr. KILPATRICK: This Proposal No. 5 is based entirely on a question of sentiment. The idea is to strike out of the present constitution so far as this section or article is concerned the word "white." All of us know that the colored electors of the state vote by virtue of an amendment to the federal constitution. By Proposal No. 91 we have stricken out the words "white male," and if that carries it takes care of the proposition covered in this proposal. I think every one here will agree that if we get into complications over this section and this article it will have a tendency to confuse the electors when this proposition is put up to them and the result will be to beat the whole thing. As I said in the beginning, this is a matter of sentiment purely and there is not a single colored person in the state of Ohio who has the qualification of an elector who has not the right of suffrage. Proposal No. 91 covers the entire proposition and I believe the members of this Convention do not want in any way to injure that proposal. We do not wish to confuse the electors and for that reason I move that this whole Proposal No. 5, with all amendments, be laid on the table.

Mr. FACKLER: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 41, nays 56, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Fox,	Mauck,
Beatty, Wood,	Halenkamp,	Partington,

So the motion to table was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the reconsideration of the vote whereby the amendment of the delegate from Erie [Mr. KING] was adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT: All those in favor of the proposal—

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT: —will say aye and the contrary no—

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The motion seems to be lost.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON: I didn't know but that there was something the matter with your eyes. I don't see any reason why we should go on record against doing that which will assist in getting us an honest election and a fair count. Take the district from which Dr. Fess comes, and what is the situation there now under the old system where they cannot have a machine to register accurately the vote? You know the situation and you know the situation in the large cities. Why should we not have mechanical accuracy in determining elections? Why should any of us vote against it? Why should any of us vote against having the word "white" taken out of the constitution? It is just a matter of sentiment, it is true, but this life is not worth living without some sentiment. Sentiment is dear to every one. I am not trying to make this as a political speech. I mean what I say. Even the Southern states, since the adoption of the amendment to the federal constitution, have taken the word "white" out. Is a constitutional convention in the state of Ohio going to refuse the black man that which has been given him in the South? They say there is no substantial good accomplished, that he can vote. Yes, he can; but in our constitution we still recognize slavery.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Has not this Convention by the adoption of Proposal No. 91 already, so far as the Convention can do it, taken the word "white" out?

Mr. ANDERSON: Now let us see that situation. Every one admits that "white" has no place in the constitution and that it ought to be taken out, but we say, "Before you can have that slavery removed from the organic law of Ohio you have to vote for woman's suffrage." That is what you say in Proposal No. 91, and that is the only reason that some men here say it is a matter of sentiment. It is not sentiment. They want to use that word to help carry woman's suffrage.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Didn't you vote for woman's suffrage?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, and I am in favor of it, but I am in favor of this justice also.

Mr. THOMAS: I don't think anybody in the Convention objects to taking the word "white" out.

Mr. ANDERSON: Well, what is the objection to the use of the voting machine?

Mr. THOMAS: I am speaking of the word "white" and its being taken out of the constitution.

The PRESIDENT: Is the member asking a question?

Mr. THOMAS: I am prefacing my question with a remark so as to get an understanding as to what I want answered. Suppose both of these proposals, the woman's suffrage proposal and this proposal, are submitted and both adopted, one with "male" in it and the other with "white male" stricken out.

Mr. ANDERSON: That will be attended to. There are a number of other apparent inconsistencies that will happen before we finish, but they are easily attended to. You say that nobody objects to having the word "white" taken out?

Mr. THOMAS: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: And I have noticed that a number of members voted to table the thing viva voce, but when the yeas and nays were called they didn't vote that way.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is not all that to be taken care of in the schedule?

Mr. ANDERSON: Of course. That is where it will be taken care of.

Mr. ROEHM: Can't the voting machine be taken care of when it comes in its proper place?

Mr. ANDERSON: Why not take care of it here and save that much time? There is no conflict. You don't want to lengthen the sessions unnecessarily.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you propose to do that right along?

Mr. ANDERSON: Whenever it will expedite matters.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The member from Montgomery [Mr. ROEHM] has a proposal pending to make constitutional the use of voting machines. Now I object, as I stated the other day, to having proposals advanced and put in here and added to other proposals where the original proposal doesn't say anything about them. Now I want to add a few remarks when you are through, but don't you think there is a little incongruity about that?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; the only thing is that the gentleman loses—and I would like to have a remedy for that if I could—Mr. Roehm will not have his name connected with the proposal, and as a matter of courtesy on a question of that kind I would vote the other way.

The PRESIDENT: The member's time is up.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Just a few words on the proposal itself. The member from Harrison county distinctly stated that what he seeks to accomplish by this proposal is the elimination of the word "white", a matter of sentiment as the member from Trumbull [Mr. KILPATRICK] has said. The member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] admitted it eloquently. I was called on during the recess by two colored gentlemen, one of whom has represented Cuyahoga county in both branches of the general assembly, and they protested against the elimination being wrought out in the way it has been attempted. "We don't want it put on as a tail to the woman suffrage proposal, so that it must be gotten out of the constitution only by voting for woman suffrage. If the people of Ohio want to wipe out the last vestige of barbarism and say that we are equal before the law, let them do it in a way that will indicate their purpose." The member from Harrison [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] has distinctly done that. I have already adverted to the fact that the member from Montgomery [Mr. ROEHM] has a proposal which provides for making constitutional the use of voting machines. What connection is there between the two things? When it comes up I will support the voting machine proposition, and I think it is a proper thing, but let this proposal go through on its own merits.

Omitting Word "White."

Mr. RILEY: The propriety of inserting this is doubtful. We are on article V of the constitution. We all agree that section 2 of article V is the proper place for this machine matter. Section 2 of article V of the present constitution provides that all elections shall be by ballot and in that comes the machine question. If you wish to take the word "white" out of the constitution and don't wish to vote for the machines, what would you do if they were submitted together?

Mr. KING: I do not think the objection of the member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] ought to receive very great weight. The committee on Equal Suffrage reported out this Proposal No. 5 with section 2 in it. The proposal had a section in it all the time, which provided the manner of election—how you should vote. It did not go so far as to provide or authorize that voting by mechanical device might be legal, but it did provide that all elections should be by ballot, and that is a proposition that we started in to consider here. Therefore to amend by simply substituting another proposal that has been reported out of the committee for the original section 2 is perfectly proper. It is germane to the original idea of article V.

Now, on the other question, it seems to me that there ought not be a particle of objection to adopting the proposition to strike out the word "white" in section 1 of that article. Unlike the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] I did not favor woman's suffrage. I said on the floor at that time that the committee purposely included in the proposal the leaving out of the word "white" to gain, perforce, additional support for their proposal at the polls, but I have since found that these gentlemen of color are not asleep. They understood perfectly and understand perfectly the terms of that proposal as it was adopted in this Convention and many of them are opposed to linking the question of eliminating the word "white" with the question of broadening the constitution to include all persons regardless of sex. So it is only fair to put up an alternative that will strike out the word "white" and will also take care of the voting machine. If both proposals are adopted section 1 will then be null and void and this other section will take its place.

Mr. ROEHM: I have no particular objection to the taking off my name from any amendment or substitute that I have offered, but I do not believe that this is the time for that to come up. It has its place on the calendar and I believe it ought to stand on its own legs. I am, therefore, opposed to that being injected into this proposal at this time.

Mr. WOODS: I agree with the member from Erie [Mr. KING] in this matter. There are only two things to look at. The first is whether we are willing to take that word "white" out of the constitution. I am one of the members who voted to submit the woman's suffrage proposal to the state. Personally I am against woman's suffrage. I do not intend to vote for it on election day, but I am willing for the people of the state to say whether they want it. Now I do not want to vote for that, but I do want to vote to take that word "white" out of the constitution. I think it is ridiculous that a state like Ohio in 1912 should have that word in its constitution.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If you are anxious to take that word "white" out let us do it, and then when we get to this other we will adopt it.

Mr. WOODS: I am willing to take care of "white". I am willing to take care of the other proposition, too, and in fifteen minutes we can get through with both of them. I do not believe there is a member who is not willing to take the word "white" out, and I do not believe that anybody objects to the use of voting machines. Both are in the same article. I do not see why we should not kill two birds with one stone.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you think that there is everything in sentiment, is there not?

Mr. WOODS: Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The member from Mahoning asked if there is anything in sentiment. There is everything in sentiment, is there not?

Mr. WOODS: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: And if forty or fifty thousand voters would like to have it done one way instead of another and we can do it in two minutes, shall we not do it?

Mr. WOODS: Yes, and we can do them both in fifteen minutes.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I have no objection to this coupling up, but I don't want to take more honors myself than I have. I have almost too many honors now, and I am willing for the gentleman from Montgomery to have the honor of his proposal. More than that, under the peculiar manner of submission I think it would be better to have a separate proposal, because these two proposals, woman's suffrage and taking the word "white" out of the constitution, should be submitted in the alternative. I think therefore, the colored people of the state would prefer that the latter go in by itself. I will say, furthermore, for them that if that doesn't go in, woman's suffrage will lose just forty thousand votes in Ohio, because every one of them say, "If you shut us out and require us to get our rights through the woman's suffrage proposal and no other way, we are going to vote against it."

Mr. PECK: It seems to me this is simply an endeavor to do a sentimental act. It is nothing but the merest sentimentality, because there is no colored man deprived of any right of suffrage in Ohio and everybody knows that. Nothing is taken from him whatever. It is just mere talk. They have been wading along for fifty years with that in the constitution. Of course, it is an eye-sore, but that is all. It is no more of an objection than a bill you see on the wall. Now you are proposing by this sentiment to endanger the passage of something that involves real merit. I don't know whether these gentlemen know what they are doing, but it looks to me as if they are inadvertently setting a trap to catch the voters and destroy woman's suffrage. I am opposed to that for this reason, and every man who was in favor of woman's suffrage ought not to vote for this. If you go to the people with two proposals in this shape you may kill woman's suffrage, and I am not in favor of mixing up things in that way. There is no necessity for this special amendment now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you want the voting machine proposition in the woman's suffrage proposal?

Mr. PECK: No; I am in favor of the voting machine, but I don't want it mixed with anything else like that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I don't want it mixed up with this either. I am opposed to having two different votes on the same section. I have no sympathy with this foolish talk of the negroes to the effect that they are not willing to vote along with woman's suffrage. If forty thousand negroes cannot join themselves with a million white women of the state in the support of a proposal in the interest of both what are they talking about?

Mr. ANDERSON: Say, for instance, we would submit to the voters later on, when the time comes for ratification, a ballot like this. "New constitution, yes; "New constitution, no," and then take the word "white" out of the constitution, leaving the word "white" out of the so-called new constitution. That would not in any way interfere with the separate ballot for "woman's suffrage" would it?

Mr. PECK: No; you could frame it almost any way if you made it clear.

Mr. ANDERSON: And would it not be true that the fact the word "white" is taken out of the new constitution would make the negroes vote in favor of it whatever else we put in?

Mr. PECK: I don't know whether they would or not. I don't want them to vote in favor of it unless they are in favor of it. I am not fixing up games to catch voters. I want the people of Ohio to vote on this constitution intelligently, and if they are not in favor of it to vote against it.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not making the negroes vote for equal suffrage a game to catch votes?

Mr. PECK: No, sir; it is all a figment of the imagination. The gentleman from Erie [Mr. KING] was the first man who mentioned it. He put it to me in a question and that was the first time I heard of it. I didn't understand it that way when I first stated it because I hadn't heard of it. The two words stand in juxtaposition and while we were amending the section the easiest thing was to strike out both the word "white" and the word "male" as useless. Both of those words were injurious and we wanted to strike them out. Now the word "male" affected a million women and the word "white" didn't affect anybody, because the negroes vote anyhow.

Mr. ANDERSON: If woman's suffrage fails to carry on separate submission and we fail to adopt this amendment, would not the word "white" remain in the constitution?

Mr. PECK: I don't care whether it does or not.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Don't you know if you don't pass this proposal woman's suffrage will lose the vote of the colored people?

Mr. PECK: No; I don't know anything of the kind; I don't know anything about it. I am not figuring on the vote of the colored people or the white people. I want the people to vote intelligently and not to be mixing up two proposals amending the same section, first to strike out one word and then to strike out another. Did you ever hear of such a proposition?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Yes; and you hear it now. You are learning something as you grow old.

Mr. PECK: I am not too old to learn, as some people seem to be.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: You just waked up.

Mr. PECK: I hope that everybody who was seriously in favor of woman's suffrage will vote against this proposal. I have a great respect for sentiment, but I have no respect for sentimentality. The latter is what the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] indulged in this morning.

Mr. HALFHILL: I voted in favor of woman's suffrage and I am glad I did. I expect to vote for it at the polls, and I can furnish reasons satisfactory to myself for doing so. I take it that the advice of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] on this proposition is not good advice, even for those who are in favor of woman's suffrage. I take it if the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] understood somewhat of the temper of the colored citizens upon this point, he would know and appreciate that this proposal is a very material thing. There is such a thing as living a little too far from some of the citizens of your own state, and I don't consider, so far as I am concerned, that I in any way lower myself by coming in contact with representative men of that particular race. I was called upon by a delegation of them very recently and they were men of standing, men who stood well in their respective social spheres and as citizens in the community where I reside.

Mr. PECK: They think they are politicians.

Mr. HALFHILL: Three of them were preachers of the Gospel and so far as I know have never taken any interest in party politics. One of them I know is personally in favor of woman's suffrage and the other two upon this particular point mentioned in the Cunningham resolution were very earnest in their insistence that we wipe out of the constitution this stigma on them and their people. If it is a question of votes you are after I submit it would be a wise idea to drop out any consideration of other questions than the one before us. Logically it does belong in this particular section of the constitution, for article V. deals with the elective franchise and section 1 now contains the word "white" in describing the qualifications of an election.

It is the duty of government to do, as nearly as it can, equal and exact justice toward all. While I am in favor of woman's suffrage, I would like my vote to show the colored men of Ohio that they are not forced to vote at the polls for some other proposition that I favor in order to secure a right which ought to be accorded them without question. They are electors and have a right to vote under the federal constitution. That is absolutely fixed, so that this word remaining in the Ohio constitution is merely a harsh reminder of their days of bondage and should be removed. On the matter of getting votes, I think Mr. Cunningham was exactly right when he said that the woman's suffrage proposal will lose votes at the polls, if the colored men have to vote upon that question in order to relieve themselves from this stigma that is now in the organic law.

Mr. ANDERSON: A word in reference to the question that Judge Peck made about confusing voters. If we submit a separate constitution of which this is part, and we submit equal suffrage on a separate ballot, will that be mixing it up in the minds of the voters?

Mr. HALFHILL: I would not think there would be any one of ordinary mental capacity who could not handle that.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Take the suggestion of the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON]. I understand that it will be proposed to submit several of our proposals in a new constitution and not submit them separately and at the same time to submit others separately. Suppose that is done and woman's suffrage carries, and the section of the constitution with the word "male" in it remains; what is the position then?

Mr. HALFHILL: I don't see the slightest difficulty in meeting any of these conditions. In the first place, if woman's suffrage does not carry, then by all means the colored people are entitled to have this section amended. If woman's suffrage does carry, there can be a proviso in the schedule whereby this particular section can be nullified.

Mr. MARRIOTT: This delegation which called upon you and of which some were preachers were objecting to the word "white" being left in the constitution, when they have the right to vote and have had ever since the adoption of the amendment to the federal constitution. I understand that they object to having the elimination of "white" coupled up with woman's suffrage. That was in effect a threat.

Mr. HALFHILL: I didn't repeat anything in the nature of a threat, but I did say that those colored men thought it was unjust to leave the qualifying word "white" in the constitution and I will further say that one of those men who called on me is a man who held a commission from the United States government as a captain of infantry in the regular army and led his troops up San Juan Hill. He is a man perfectly competent to understand exactly what we are doing in this Convention.

I want further to answer the question of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MARRIOTT] by saying that to my mind there is no trouble whatever about fixing in the schedule a provision whereby if woman's suffrage prevails, as I hope it will, this particular part of the constitution will be of no avail.

Mr. STOKES: There seems to be a unanimous sentiment for both propositions if they are divided. For the purpose of demonstrating the sentiment of the Convention, I move that the amendment of the delegate from Erie be laid on the table.

Mr. KING: The motion is now to reconsider and if the vote by which the amendment was carried is reconsidered I will withdraw this amendment.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. KING: I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I move the previous question.

The motion was carried.

A further vote being taken, the substitute of the member from Harrison was agreed to.

By unanimous consent Mr. Cunningham moved to amend Proposal No. 5 as follows:

In line 3, before "Article V," insert "Section 1."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the adoption of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 100, nays 2, as follows:

Mr. Cassidy and Mr. Peck voted in the negative.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 5—Mr. Cunningham. To submit substitute for section 1 of article V., of the constitution.—Relative to elective franchise.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal shall be submitted to the electors to amend the constitution by substituting for section 1, article V, of the constitution the following:

SECTION 1. Every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the state one year next preceding the election, and of the county, township, precinct or ward in which he resides, such time as may be provided by law, shall have the qualification of an elector and be entitled to vote at all elections.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Resolution Relative to Loss of the Titanic Steamship—Conservation of Natural Resources.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

The consent was given and Resolution No. 104 was read as follows:

Resolution No. 104:

Resolved, That the Fourth Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio pause from its labors to express its sincere sorrow at the calamity which has overtaken the sister nations of the United States and Great Britain, in the deplorable loss of life in the sinking of the steamship "Titanic," and to offer its deep sympathy to the families of those whose shrouds are the waves of the Atlantic.

Mr. TALLMAN: I move that the rules be suspended and that we consider this resolution at once.

The rules were suspended.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. CROSSER: I would like to have my vote recorded on Proposal No. 163.

His name being called, Mr. Crosser voted "aye."

Mr. DOTY: It is perfectly apparent that we can not take up a new proposal within five-minutes of time of adjournment, and I move we recess until half-past one.

The motion was carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by the president.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is substitute Proposal No. 64.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: In beginning the discussion I would like to say that I shall be very much pleased if you will consider in connection with this proposal Proposal No. 230, introduced by Mr. Tetlow, and Proposal No. 213 introduced by Mr. Leete. They are also conservation measures, and they, with this proposal of mine, form a conservation scheme for the state of Ohio. The proposal by Mr. Tetlow is with reference to the mineral resources and the one by Mr. Leete is with reference to the conservation of the water power of the state. My proposal is purely a proposition for the conservation of the forests of the state.

I want to speak first about Proposal No. 64, as originally presented. The purposes of the proposal, in this form are:

Protection for the birds as a necessity to combat insect life.

Encouragement of forestry.

Agricultural education.

I wish it understood that I am perfectly agreeable to the change that has been made, for the proposal as amended provides for encouragement of forestry as a means of education. A protection of the home of the birds means more of them, just what we were seeking to accomplish, so, in a way, this is the key to the scheme as presented in the original proposal.

It is interesting in this connection to note the reforestation policies of foreign countries. In Austria over 10,000 acres have been reforested since 1884 and the expenditures have been about $125,000, to which the state contributed four-fifths. The Chinese reforestation policies embrace only 600 acres. To propagate the reforestation idea a free distribution of plant material to Chinese communities is practiced. Bulgarian forests amount to seven and a half million acres, or 30 per cent. of the entire area. One-third of this is state forests, one-half communal and one-sixth private forests. Bavaria, among the German states, stands next to Prussia in size of state forests, which, in 1905, comprised 2,035,700 acres of timber-producing areas. Results of forest management in the Black Forest, known to every American student, are very satisfactory. Eighteen per cent, or two-thirds of the total forest area, is under direct state supervision. State forests have been slowly but steadily increasing. They contain less than four per cent of nonforested land. It is indeed interesting to note the destruction of the ancient forests of Europe, although there are still fragmentary remains of the great Hercynian Forest, which originally covered the greater part of Continental Europe and was extensively diffused over the districts now known as Germany, Poland and Hungary. In Caesar's time it extended from the borders of Atsalia and Switzerland to Transylvania, and was computed to be sixty days' journey long and nine broad. In Denmark all remains of that ancient forest have disappeared, but in Norway and Sweden, in Finland and Russia, we have remains or representations of the northern skirt of the immense forests which once covered Europe.

Forests in the United States are taxed today under the general property tax in every state and territory. Thirty-two states and territories make no reference to forest lands in their tax laws. The present tendency, however, is toward stricter administration and heavier taxes. Forestry must come some time and its early coming is a thing greatly to be desired—and whenever we are ready to undertake it seriously we will find that our present methods of taxation are a very severe handicap. Strictly enforced—and it is not safe to count on the lenient enforcement forever—the annual tax on the full value of the land and standing timber might take away anywhere from one-third to one-half of the net income, or even more. Forestry should not be subjected to such an unjust burden. Moreover, the tendency of the present system to force premature cutting and prevent reforestation, though probably not very serious as yet, is bound to gain strength as time goes on. For these reasons it is highly desirable to take some action which will not retard and destroy, but will encourage and foster this natural asset of the state and nation. If any tax should be placed on the forests it should be on the yield when cut. It would be equitable and would be an encouragement rather than a hindrance to forestry.

I want to read at this point from the book "State and Local Taxation" of a conference at which Dr. Chamberlain quotes a few things in regard to this point to which I desire to call your attention:

I am inclined to think that our reforestation in Ohio will largely be in the way of shade trees for beauty, and in the way of orchard trees of one kind or another which shall serve climatic purposes. I know that on the site and in the vicinity of the little town in which I lived, Hudson, Ohio, near Cleveland, the timber was originally cut and burned, and I can remember the horrible droughts we used to have, and I remember how the showers would fill the river on one side, and Tinker's Creek on the other, and scarcely touch us on the high land every time, because it was so poor and so dry. Later the village planted trees and the college planted trees, and we planted orchards and shade trees, and now the showers do not miss us and go around.

But the question is, Is there any way we can induce foresting by removing the taxation? The southwestern quarter or third of Ohio was never glaciated, the glacial action did not pass over there, the coal seams lie over there, the land is set up on edge almost as much as it is in New Hampshire. I can say now that if somebody big enough, if the owners of the coal mines, for example, would take hold of it scientifically, and be exempt from taxation on land while the timber trees on it were growing, you could reforest that land that is too poor for almost anything else. The question asked by one of the delegates why a man who has a house worth $5000 should pay taxes and the man who has timber worth $5000 should not pay taxes may be answered in this way: The house is a personal benefit absolutely and nothing else; it is no public benefit whatsoever; it is for that man himself; it is his property; he owns it and uses it. On the other hand a forest is a public benefit to the state, to the watershed, to the farmers below, and it looks as if there were some justice in exempting it from taxation, and I take it that land actively used in growing forests may be justly exempted from taxation. You can not do that in Ohio now under the constitution, and so the assessors and the trustees have to whip the devil around the stump, as I may say, and they have said, "Well, here are forty acres of timber; it is not bringing a cent to you, and we will value that for taxation at about $5 an acre." For ten years this valuation stands—a decennial appraisal—and so they virtually exempt it from taxation as long as it is exclusively in timber.

In "Forestry Conditions in Ohio," Bulletin 188, Ohio Experiment Station Director Thorn says:

Forestry problems in Ohio differ from those in many other states in the fact that the state contains no mountain ranges or other large bodies of waste land, but outside of a few tracts of several thousand acres each belonging to coal companies in the southern part of the state, it is everywhere cut up into small farms, the average size of which is less than 100 acres each. The principal work in forestry in Ohio, therefore, is to be done, not in the reforestation of large areas of state-owned lands, but in the improvement of the woodlots of small farms. Statistics collected by township assessors indicate a total area reported as forest amounting to about 2,500,000 acres, but the major portion of this area is in the condition of woodland pasture rather than that of forest, and that is rapidly diminishing in size and decreasing in value. There is much steep hillside land in Ohio which should remain permanently in forest. The suggestion is also offered that the reforesting and future control by the state of the steep hillsides bordering the narrow valleys through which the streams of Ohio flow would mitigate the disasters of the freshets which have been so destructive in recent years by retarding the inflow and distributing it over a longer period. The state already owns some land of this character. Information, demonstration and leadership, and further beneficial legislation would be of the greatest assistance. The fact that the few remaining trees, which are ripe for the harvest, will soon be gone is not so much to be deplored as that there is almost nothing left to take their places. At least 80 per cent of our mature timber trees are standing where natural forest conditions have been destroyed so that early decay is inevitable. Not more than half a million acres of young-growing forests remain, and many of these are in bad condition, the stand being poor and the trees inferior. These facts point to the inevitable disappearance of our forests at a more rapid rate than at any time before. An effort has been made to learn what estimate of value farmers put upon woodland pasture. The average of these is 60 cents per acre. Since there are more than two million acres of these pastures within the state, it is evident that the annual loss in holding them in their present condition is considerable.

Referring to forest conditions in Ohio, Bulletin 188, Ohio Experiment Station, continues:

It is believed by many that if any plan could be devised by which the tax on land in forests could be remitted or exempted the practice of forestry would become common. A huge obstacle to the preservation of privately owned forest is the system of taxation in vogue, which year after year taxes the full timber value of the trees, whether used or not, as though timber were a series of crops, whereas, under present policies it is only one crop. The taxation applies even before the trees are matured; hence they are often cut when they should be allowed to grow much longer.

I wish to read at this point from Bulletin 204, of the Ohio forest conditions:

The comparatively high price of land in this county has been a discouraging feature for forestry operations, and it can never be expected that this phase of agriculture will be given any prominence. Granting the above, it may be said, however, that the land set aside for operations in the way of forming windbreaks for animals and buildings, and products for direct farm use, will not lack returns proportional to the investment. There are a large number of so-called wood-lots through this section which are being held at a dead loss to the owner in every respect; the growth existent consists of distorted and worthless beech, gum, maple and ironwood, fit only for firewood, and with a poor market for such utilization it is absolutely worthless from the aspect of growth increment and is paying no interest on the investment. It is the general admission of woodlot owners that the average woods pasture yields small profit. In some cases, where beech predominates, there is a very meager sod, and many times not one-fourth of the ground produces grass. Here then, from two aspects, is a loss to landowners of this county, and while we have no adequate knowledge of the amount in figures, it is evident that the annual loss in holding the majority of these wooded pastures in their present condition is considerable. Afforestation here must be carried on not by the reclaiming or improving these pasture woodlands, but by entirely removing them and starting anew by artificial means. It is often the case that the soil of these woodlands is of most excellent quality, due of course, to being on virgin ground. It was often the case that the woodlot was the portion considered the poorest piece of ground and left in trees and pasture for that reason. Long-continued cropping of the better portions, however, has made this erstwhile barren soil more productive than the better portions. It is advisable then in many cases to give the woodlot ground over to tillage and select some exhausted and thin piece of ground for growing trees. In this county everything along forestry lines must be obtained by commencing at the bottom, and the sooner the start the quicker the results. Nothing is to be gained by waiting, and nothing need be expected by waiting, and nothing need be expected from natural reproduction.

Now I will read the forestry conditions in Franklin county:

Franklin county contains a smaller percentage of forest lands than any of the counties heretofore mentioned. The comparatively high price of land and its value for trucking and dairying makes it almost impracticable to retain forest lands of any magnitude. There are many wooded pastures in the county which are being held at a loss. Practically all of the standing timber trees are culls or species of inferior timber qualities. The forest capital is virtually inactive and becomes less productive each year.

I wish next to call your attention to the drain upon our forests, Circular 129, United States Department of Agriculture. There is very much interesting information in these bulletins if you would take the trouble to investigate. I can not read it all and shall give only one citation. The one question that interests us is, How long will the timber last?

The estimates of standing timber in the United States are by no means satisfactory. The most detailed ones range roughly from 1,400 to 2,000 billion feet. Assuming a stumpage of 1,400 billion feet, an annual use of 100 billion feet, and neglecting growth in the calculation, the exhaustion of our timber supply is indicated in 14 years. Assuming the same use and stand, with an annual growth of 40 billion feet, we have a supply for 23 years. Assuming an annual use of 150 billion feet, the first supposition becomes 9 years and the second 13 years. Assuming a stand of 2,000 billion feet, a use of 100 billion feet, and neglecting growth, we have 20 years' supply. Assuming the same conditions, with an annual growth of 40 billion feet, we have 33 years' supply. With an annual use of 150 billion feet, these estimates become, respectively, 13 and 18 years. * * *

The present rate of cutting will exhaust the supply in about 10 years in the first case and 25 years in the second case. * * *

Practical forestry has not yet been introduced on any state forest land, and even New York, which owns about 1,250,000 acres in the Adirondack and the Catskill mountains, has not yet progressed beyond the stage of simple protection. To have reached this, however, is a long stride in advance. The constitution of New York forbids the cutting, destruction, or removal of any tree on the "forest preserve," as the lands definitely assigned to forest uses held by the state are collectively called, a provision which is quite as effectively opposed to practical forestry as it is to forest destruction, and which must be regarded as purely temporary in character. The forests of the state, as well as its salt-water and fresh-water fisheries and its game animals and birds, are under the care of a commission of fisheries, game, and forests appointed by the governor, having under it a superintendent and a corps of subordinates in the woods. The sincere interest of the people of New York in the forest preserve is indicated by the recent appropriation and expenditure of $1,800,000 to increase the area of the preserve by purchase.

In Pennsylvania the acquisition of wild lands by the state for forest uses has become an established policy, and bids fair to result in the control and management of an area not greatly inferior to the forest preserve of New York; and Pennsylvania has no legal bar to practical forestry. Michigan has recently taken steps in the same direction, and several other states have taken or seem about to take similar action. It may be said of the forested states in general that public sentiment is moving rapidly toward a satisfactory treatment of the question of the state forest lands.

The foregoing quotation is from "Progress of Forestry in the United States," by Pinchot.

The taxes on poor land are, as a general rule, relatively higher than on good land. This is due to the fact that most of the taxes are for local purposes, school, roads and bridges; and the actual expense in a poor-land section is about the same as where the lands are rich. Thus, land which produces only 20 bushels of corn may pay 30 cents per acre tax, while land producing 80 bushels in another section of the state may not be taxed more than 50 cents per acre.

To be sure the state tax might be properly equalized, but the county and local taxes are often more than ten times the state tax.

It will easily be noted that when crop yields sink slightly below the minimum yields, the land becomes practically valueless for business or investment purposes.

Conservation of Natural Resources.

Agriculture is often referred to as the most independent occupation, and in the struggle against poverty in countries with increasing population and failing resources, it is certainly true that, after men in most other lines of occupation have literally starved out, the farmer will continue to eke out an existence; in fact, he may still have bread and potatoes, milk and butter, eggs and poultry, and even vegetables, fruits, syrup and honey for the support of his own family long after he has practically ceased to buy or sell in support of a dependent urban population.

Thus the city is the first to feel the country's poverty and for their own preservation the men of the town or city must contribute their influence toward the development of systems of permanent agriculture. Bankers, merchants, grain dealers, physicians, editors, teachers and ministers, as well as educated land owners, because they have trained minds and are able, with moderate study, to acquire a correct and adequate understanding of the fundamental principles of soil improvement and conserving our natural resources, must exert their influence over those who are less able to secure such positive knowledge, but who may own or control much of the land, lest the lands generally become so impoverished that they will support only the agricultural people who, of course, have the first right to the food they produce. Under such conditions land may have no value as a source of profit and still be invaluable as a means of existence.

Therefore the conservation of the soil becomes a most necessary and beneficial enterprise. Every blade of grass is a study. To produce two where only one grew before is a source of both pleasure and profit. And not grass alone, but soil, seeds and seasons, bridges, horses and cattle, sheep and poultry, reaping, mowing and threshing, draining, droughts and irrigation, plowing, hoeing and harrowing, saving crops, pests of crops, diseases of crops and what will prevent and cure them, trees, shrubs, fruits, plants and flowers—the thousand things of which these are specimens, each is a world of study within itself.

Education is the key that solves the problems, and, more, it gives a relish and facility for successfully pursuing the unsolved ones. The total number of acres owned in Ohio are, in round numbers, 20,000,000. The acres of woodland 2,340,573; the acres lying waste are 771,594; the acres of worn out lands, 141,590 an increase of 93,937 of waste or abandoned land in ten years.

The loss from freshets, soil waste, drouth and extreme climatic conditions, etc., will run into many millions of dollars, and a great deal of this loss could have been saved had there been a careful conservation of our natural resources.

The destruction of our forests has not been startling to us because their disappearance has been gradual—from generation to generation—and no one generation has seen it all. The same thing may also be said of the loss of fertility of our soil, the increase of plant diseases and injurious insects, and the destruction of our insectivorous birds. If our forests had been destroyed by some great tornado or fire all at once we should have been more generally impressed with the calamity of the loss. The loss, however, is none the less real because of our gradual awakening to it. In this loss there has been also a loss in connection with our extremes of climate, for nature is so intricately organized that she can not suffer in one direction without being affected in her operations in another. Through the removal of our forests the flow of our streams has become spasmodic, falling into trickling rivulets in one season, rising to destructive torrents in another. Upon a proper forest cover depends largely the multiplicity of our feathered friends and songsters, those that fly by day and night.

These facts give vital importance to the conservation movement, and any agency which tends to help this movement along in a practical way is therefore a power for the public welfare. Such, I assure you will be the influence of this conservation and protection of our forests. Our birds should be protected for they are of untold benefit in the consuming of weed seeds and troublesome insects. Some of the insects eaten by the birds not only threaten the destruction alike of village shade trees and country forests, but seriously afflict humanity. Brown-tail moths, potato beetles, grasshoppers, cutworms, caterpillars, and even the disgusting stinkbugs are included in the lists of insects eaten by the birds.

The time has long passed when the practical farmer can afford to ignore the relation of birds to agriculture. Larger and larger areas are being devoted to tillage every year and the amount of capital invested in agricultural pursuits in the United States is constantly increasing.

The whole world is being laid under contribution for trees, new fruits, forage plants and crops for the benefit of the American farmer and consumer, in order that by his superior energy and foresight he may not only feed our own people but create a surplus of American products for consumption in less favored lands.

New pests are introduced and here, under favorable climate and new conditions, they multiply until they inflict great damages. Such pests go unnoticed until the damage they do forces them on the attention of the community, and they become so numerous and widespread that their extermination is impossible. Once introduced into the country they are here to stay. The vast sums already spent in efforts to prevent the ravages of such pests emphasize the importance of utilizing to the utmost all the allies nature places at our disposal. Birds reproduce slowly and often suffer immense loss in their migration by climatic extremes.

It is the part of prudence, therefore, to protect useful birds by protecting their natural home, the forest, at all times, and so augment their number that they may constantly play their respective parts in the police system ordained by nature, and be ready when emergency arises to wage active and aggressive warfare against sudden invasion of insect enemies.

The protection of the climatic and physiographical interests of the country are not to be overlooked. The destruction of the forests is detrimental to the climate, waterflow, and fertility of the soil. The forests are the great recreation grounds of the people. Let us hope, in behalf of the welfare of our state and nation, that as soon as the initial decades of the new century shall make more and more apparent the crying need of improvement in the treatment of this great natural foundation of our life as a people, that there will arise a class of men able to perform the tasks that will be thrust upon them.

Conservation of Natural Resources.

Forests are indeed necessary to our country as great regulators of meteorological processes, mitigating the evil effects of storm and flood, keeping erosion down to a moderate degree and influencing climatic conditions. The absolute necessity for the conservation of our timber supplies and the manifold blessings that come from the woodland should lead us to protect in every way possible the great passing giants of the forests. But this question of forestry can not be solved by sudden bursts of enthusiasm; nor does it appeal to man's emotional nature. It must be solved by the millions of men and women, each of whom has his own particular interests to make him indifferent to what does not concern him individually.

The scenic value of all the national domain yet remaining should be jealously guarded as a distinctly important natural resource and not as an incidental increment. We have for a century stood actually, if not ostensibly, for an uglier America. No one will suggest that the travel to Europe is to see ugly things or wasted scenery. No, these vast sums are spent by our people in travel to view agreeable and attractive scenery, natural and urban.

The lumber king leaves the hills he has denuded into piteous ugliness and takes his family to view the jealously guarded and economically beautiful Black Forest of Germany.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I am afraid that what I shall say will be out of order. In view of the fact that there are two other proposals relating to the same matter of conservation and that it would be difficult for the Convention to consider the three separately, and as there seems to be a tendency toward agreement between the three proposers along the line of conservation of natural resources, I move that the matter be submitted to a committee consisting of three or more to report tomorrow morning and that the matter be placed on the calendar in regular order for tomorrow.

Mr. DOTY: I second the motion with a slight change, that when the report is made it shall be placed at the head of the calendar the next day so they would have the right to print it. That keeps the right of way for the proposal.

Mr. STEVENS: What is that motion?

The PRESIDENT: It is the motion to refer.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not observe that the motion was seconded.

Mr. DOTY: I seconded it.

The PRESIDENT: The motion was seconded and the motion before the Convention is to refer this matter to a special committee.

Mr. STEVENS: On that motion I intended to say that if this matter were submitted to a special committee it would appear in proper form, but it seems to me the amendments could be offered and the matter kept in regular order and debated now. I don't see any necessity for putting it into the hands of anybody else. I have an amendment to offer myself and I think the debate should proceed.

Mr. DOTY: I think the motion was made by agreement of the three proposers. If they could put the three proposals into one and submit it as a substitute for this one, the whole matter would be taken care of.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I feel that the three proposers should have respectful consideration in the matter of presenting their proposals. I doubt if any one could offer an amendment which would satisfy all three of these gentlemen. I believe it would be better if we submit this matter to the three proposers and let them bring in a substitute in the form that they can all agree on.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I don't exactly understand what three proposals are involved.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Proposals No. 230, 313 and this one. It seems that one of the proposals provides for the conservation of the mineral resources of the earth, another for the water, and another for the forests. They are all along substantially the same line.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: In plain terms it means the proposals of Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, Mr. Tetlow and Mr. Leete. I believe those gentlemen should have an opportunity to put these proposals together in a form to suit them.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: I would like to say that the authors of these three proposals had a meeting and it was thought best to let them go in separately because they might wish them to be amended differently. I have an amendment to my own which I think changes it for the better. For instance, on account of the adoption of the initiative and referendum proposal I want to change the words "the general assembly" to "laws may be passed." It was agreed between the three that we were willing to have the first three groups under one head and there is no real objection to bringing them in together.

Mr. STEVENS: If these three gentlemen desire to come in with the proposal I don't see any good reason why the matter shouldn't be referred to them, but I want to have my amendment offered now. I think this motion ought to be lost, thereby giving all of us a chance to offer our amendments.

Mr. TETLOW: As one of the delegates who is intensely interested in the question of conservation I want to say I introduced a proposal covering the question of conservation of our natural resources and it was submitted to the committee on Judiciary. The proposal was acted upon and reported favorably to the Convention and it was amended in that committee to cover all of the natural resources of the state. Something can be gained by the merging of these three proposals. Mr. Miller's proposal will permit the exemption of woodland from taxation. Mr. Leete's proposal will grant further power to the general assembly or the people to enact laws for the conservation of the water power. I am perfectly satisfied that this entire subject matter should be referred to the committee to redraft. The thing I am interested in is to get some proper method which will adequately conserve our natural resources. Consequently I am in favor of any proposition that will bring about that. I am satisfied to amend Mr. Miller's proposal upon the floor and settle the question now. I realize there may be some objection to the different ideas that are contained in these proposals, and if there is any difficulty about handling Mr. Miller's proposal as amended I want my proposal to be insured the same position on the calendar that it has now. I want it so it will not affect my report if the matter doesn't go through and if this report should not be adopted I would wish to have the opportunity to come before the Convention on my proposal. With that understanding I am willing to go ahead.

Mr. MOORE: Since the state is asked to assume care over the waterways, which is one of the great natural resources, and since it has been asked to assume control over the minerals, I can not see why the great natural water power should not be conserved and these three matters could come along together with probably some others added, and I think this should be provided for in some broad, comprehensive proposal built out of these three which will be a benefit to the people of Ohio. I am in favor of appointing this special committee and having it put the proposals in shape to protect the people in their great natural resources which we have and which are rapidly being exhausted.

Mr. Miller's proposal does not aim to save the timber only, but it aims to conserve the soil too. I believe if the timber were not exhausted we would not have a good many troubles we have now. It is the waste in the fields and forests that causes the great droughts.

To avoid any confusion, I move to amend by naming a special committee composed of the three authors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion to refer was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 249—Mr. Tannehill.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. TANNERHILL: Gentlemen of the Convention: I have not, as you all know used very much of this Convention's time and I do not intend to in the future. I consider this matter important and I hope that I can present my idea in the time allotted. If I should have to exceed the time a few minutes I feel sure the Convention will grant me the extension.

It is a real pleasure to stand before this Convention advocating a proposal that grants to the people of Ohio a reform more necessary than any other not at present enjoyed by the citizens of this state.

No member of this body can exceed me in enthusiastic and loyal support of the initiative and referendum, and it will be to me one of the cherished memories of this Fourth Constitutional Convention that I was one of the sub-committee of ten who drafted the substitute initiative and referendum proposal that was adopted almost unanimously by this Convention.

But we must remember that the initiative and referendum are instruments of defense rather than of aggression. Ours is a representative government and must so continue if we hope for sane administration and stable institutions. But I would as soon have our people menaced with the cholera or black death as to run the gauntlet of another legislature such as the last, if we are not to be protected by a workable initiative and referendum. I cannot understand how a friend of representative government can oppose a safeguarded initiative and referendum proposal such as we have adopted, for I say to you here and now that with a few more such dictagraph-pursued and corruption-enmeshed sessions of the legislature as we witnessed a year ago an outraged public will arise in its might and wipe representative government from the state, and we will revert to the rule of the mob.

But this will not occur, for we are going to adopt and have the protection of the initiative and referendum, and while in the past the problem has been how to escape the evils of representative government, the task of the future will be how to prevent the abuse of direct legislation, for I say to you without fear of successful contradiction that it is neither the most efficient nor the most desirable method of passing laws. But the people have been trifled with and betrayed by corrupt legislators until they will endure the perfidy and infamy no longer. They are going to demand their rights. They are going to see to it that they get the legislation they desire and require, and if they can not obtain it through representative government they will enforce their demands through direct legislation.

Therefore, since we face the dangers of a too frequent use of the initiative and referendum it is wisdom to ascertain what can be done toward restoring to representative government the position of confidence which it held in the days of its greatest advocate, Thomas Jefferson.

It certainly needs no argument to prove that representative government can never be satisfactory where the representatives of the people in any branch of the government—legislative, executive or judicial—are inefficient, corrupt or controlled by selfish interests. So long as the manner of their selection is such that party bosses or self-seeking corporations can name both the democrat and republican candidates for each office, there can be no hope of improvement in representative government.

But, it is asked, do not the people select their officials to make, construe and enforce the laws? Often they do not. Frequently at the election they find that they simply have a choice between two undeserving candidates, neither of whom is competent or worthy of the position. If mistakes are made in the nominating conventions of both parties, which frequently occur, the voter is powerless to prevent misgovernment. The chief cause of the frequent failure of representative government lies in the corrupt, boss-controlled, drunken, debauched and often hysterical nominating convention. The convention must go.

No man in America has made a more systematic and thorough study of the relative merits of the convention and primary systems of nominations than Professor Merriam, of the University of Chicago. Hear his opinion on the subject:

Whatever the advantages, theoretical or practical, of the convention system, its doom is clearly written. The limitation of the voter to the choice of one leading candidate, the manipulation of representatives chosen, the opportunities for trading and jobbery, the undeliberative character of the convention, all have combined to make the system, as now known and practiced, intensely unpopular and incapable of long duration. Originally the weapon of the many against the few, it has become, in only too many cases, the defense of the few against the many. Once the foe of aristocracy, it now stands in the way of democracy and must move aside. No defense that can be made for it at this late hour is likely to prove effective against the assaults of its foes. In fact, the stubborn and mistaken advocacy of the system in various states by a certain type of party leader has alone cost the system much opposition.

The direct primary is no innovation. It is the established policy of a large number of the states of the Union. Today in this great nation over forty million of America's best citizens select their governors by direct primary vote, but, sad to relate, the great state of Ohio still clings to the corrupt, boss-controlled convention plan.

The state-wide direct primary is not peculiar to the Pacific Coast, for while Nevada, Idaho, Oregon, Washington and California nominate every state official, the legislature and all other elective officers by direct vote, yet it is the great Middle West, the region from the Alleghenies to the Rockies, where the reform is most firmly established. Consider this group of states and ask yourself if you want Ohio longer to be lined up with Delaware and Rhode Island. The direct primary for the nomination of governor and every other elective state official is now in operation in Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri and Iowa. This is the cream of American resources and American intelligence and progress. These ten great commonwealths have a total population of over twenty-two millions.

But Ohio is more reactionary even than the South, which is proverbially conservative, for the state-wide direct primary is now in force in Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Oklahoma and the great territorial empire of Texas. Light is breaking in politically benighted New England, for New Hampshire progressives have secured the adoption of the unlimited direct primary in that state, and Massachusetts is now wheeling into line. When will Ohio free herself from the domination of boss-controlled conventions?

Some may object that the direct primary is not a constitutional matter. One whole article of our present constitution is devoted to the subject of elections, and primary elections are just as fundamental as the general elections in November. Under our present constitutional provision on elections we lock the door after the horse is stolen. Why not save the horse as well as the stable by incorporating provisions for the direct primary in our constitution?

Is it a constitutional matter? Many states have so decided, for a number of states have constitutional provisions as to direct primaries and a number of others would have saved a world of trouble in securing the adoption of the direct primary had they possessed provisions in their constitutions requiring direct primaries. Particularly is this true of Illinois and California, where numerous primary laws passed by the legislature were declared unconstitutional.

Let me briefly comment on some benefits to be derived from the direct primary. First, the larger vote it brings out, clearly demonstrated in the county primaries. It clearly shows that more people will vote. When you are selecting delegates for some convention they never tell you who they are going to vote for. So the people don't take any interest, but with your direct primary, where you are voting not for a delegate but for your own officials, much greater interest is taken. Another thing, there are fewer unworthy candidates.

There is a good reason why this is true. When you put it up to the direct vote of the people no unworthy candidates will present themselves, because they are afraid of the popular vote. They can't go into a convention then and by swapping and trading around get nominated. They have to go before the electors and get so many votes.

It makes the caucus and the slate futile, because if they get in a caucus and form a slate the voter at the primary will destroy it. It doesn't cost the candidates as much. I assert it does not cost anything like as much. They don't have to buy a delegation in a county convention. They don't have to do a lot of other things that they have to do under the convention system. It does not destroy party organization either. In those states which I have mentioned, the great Central West, party organizations are just as strong today as they were before they got the primary, but their politics is a good deal clearer. It does not prevent party platforms. Let me just for a moment speak on that matter. You may think when you don't have a state convention that you could not have a party platform. Let me tell you what they are doing in some of these states where they have direct primaries. I think every one of you will admit that it is a better system than we have at present. As it is now a bunch of us meet in a state convention and resolve that we are in favor of this, that or the other thing, and not one of us will be in a position to carry the matter out. Now the plan they are following in the states where they have the direct primary is to hold a primary and nominate their state officials and nominate their members of the legislature, and then the candidates for state officers and for members of the legislature meet and declare their opinions on various questions. They are the men who are going to carry out the policies. Are they not the men who ought to write the platforms? They make their declarations and then you have the privilege of reading them and deciding whether you want to vote for one set of men to carry out a certain set of principles or for another.

Now, some suggestions as to the application of the system and the time of holding primaries. Our May primaries are a mistake. Primaries should not be held more than two months before the election. The first of September for a November election is perfectly proper. Then as to the matter of plurality or majority, I think a plurality should rule. As to the matter of percentages it has been clearly shown in those states using the direct primary that low percentages should be required for petitions.

Then there should be a time limit on petitions. The petitions ought to start out at a certain time and ought to be filed by a certain time. Starting them out at a certain time gives every candidate a chance. Nobody starts out ahead of anybody else and gets all the petitioners before anybody else can come out, and then you can have as stringent rules as to the primaries as you please. Let me give you an ideal system. The ideal system is to make your primaries, not as to judges and school officers, but as to state officers and members of the legislature, as strictly partisan as you can. Don't permit a democrat to vote in the republican primaries, and don't permit a republican to vote in the democratic primaries. Put the parties on their honor and make them select the best men they can and then at the November election make your ballot nonpartisan. Put all the men in one list and let the voters select them, not as party men, but as men. You will notice this substitute that been passed around. The original proposal is a little faulty and I am going to make a motion to substitute this in place of the other. You notice that I have made a change permitting nominations by petition. The object of that is to permit nominations for school boards and judges, if you want to, by petitions to keep them out of politics. Now, if you will excuse me for a few moments I want to make some personal allusions. Personal experiences in conventions—it is not a pleasant theme. I suppose I have been in more state conventions, probably, than any one here, and yet I do not consider that that is particularly a credit. It is simply a matter of experience. It has been so long since I was not a delegate to a state convention that I cannot remember the time. I have scarcely missed a state convention of either party in the last quarter of a century. I have observed things as a delegate, and I have observed things as a newspaper man.

Now, you say you favor representative government. Is a state convention representative? Who are the delegates? A lot of two-by-four editors like myself, a lot of one-horse lawyers and a bunch of county officials. There is your state convention. It is the same old bunch year after year. I know whom I am going to meet at the state convention before I go. Having had twenty-five years' experience at state conventions I can write you out a list of the delegates that will comprise a majority of the next democratic and the next republican state convention and there has not been a delegate elected yet. Is that representative government? You don't find any farmers worth mentioning, you don't find any business men in a state convention of either party. You don't find any representatives of the great body of laborers of the state there. It is just the three classes I have mentioned. If you would take the editors and the lawyers and the county officials out of every state convention it would look like the Constitutional Convention on Friday. That was absolutely true of all the conventions that we had before we wiped out the county conventions with the one-horse primary we are having now.

I will tell you something that will illustrate what I have said. A few years ago I had noticed what I have been telling you as to the county conventions, that the same bunch came up each year. I sat down and looked over the files of the papers and I made a list and published it in my paper and I said, before any delegates had been selected, that at the next county convention of the opposition party the following will be the list of delegates. It created consternation. They could not select that list; they had to take others and when they came up to McConnelsville they had a strange bunch that didn't know how to run a convention. They had never been in one before. Another thing, the state conventions and other conventions don't represent principles, but they represent a great desire for office and nothing else. I have seen the same men in the democratic convention solemnly resolve against all sumptuary laws and then turn around and nominate Pattison and try to put all the saloons out of business. I have seen the republican party in state conventions complete a circle on temperance and now they are on the back track on the second lap. One party is just as bad as the other in a state convention. I remember a big fight we had at Springfield in 1895 on the silver question. We had one of the greatest fights down there you ever saw. There was a little bunch of original silver men; we were probably wrong, but we thought we were right. The convention was presided over by Cal. Brice and the cities were represented by goldbugs. The convention was about two-thirds goldbugs and one-third silver, and they ran over us and trampled us to the earth. That was in 1895 and the very next year practically the same body of men met in convention and they were all the greatest free-silver men you ever saw, and those fellows who had fought us and licked us a year before got into the democratic free-silver bandwagon and rode off to expected victory and glory while we original silver men trailed in their dust. I don't think I ever felt so badly as in the election of 1896 when Bryan was defeated. But there was one consolation—those fellows who had come over for office because they thought it was going to be popular didn't get in. Just think of it! I don't like to be personal, but just think of Louie Bernard, Joe Dowling, Jimmy Ross, John O'Dwyer, John Bolen and Charley Salen having a Saul of Tarsus conversion on the silver question as they had that year!

But, gentlemen, lack of principle is not the worst thing in the state conventions, or in other conventions. They are dishonest. I know of one convention in Ohio where a man was nominated for governor and the secretaries counted him out. I was in a convention where a man was not nominated for governor and the secretaries counted him in. They have been boss-controlled invariably. Most of these references are toward democrats. I feel freer to criticize them than my adversaries, but I remember one convention, only two years ago in Memorial Hall, when I sat within ten feet of a great boss of a city and that man, with eighty men in his delegation, without consulting a single man got up and changed the vote of that county and nominated Harding for governor. He had not consulted a single man in that delegation. That is representative government! I was within ten feet of him and I watched his every movement. There was no consultation whatever. I believe that I can say truthfully that in twenty-five years I have only seen one convention of either party where the bosses were not satisfied with the nominee for governor. He died soon after. When it comes to insignificant offices like attorney general, the bosses parcel them out. I know a case where a man went to the supreme bench and all he had to do was to send a man to a certain other man and tell him "My friend wants to go on the supreme bench," and the man went on the supreme bench. The go-between told me he did it.

The state convention is no worse than the lesser convention. In our district a certain man was elected by the democrats as senator. He promised in my presence what he would do on certain matters and he came up here and did just the opposite. You naturally would expect me to do all I could to prevent his renomination. My county was almost unanimously against him, and in the making up of the list of delegates to be voted on I was permitted to select the delegation from my county and I handpicked every delegate that went to that senatorial convention. I selected men that I felt absolutely sure would not favor the renomination of the senator and they went to the convention and what happened? They went to Lancaster and he got over half of them.

Now, in conclusion, who ought to support this proposal? All Roosevelt republicans. That is the chief thing they have been howling about in this campaign, that if there had been a primary there would have been no trouble. The La Follette men ought to be for it. The Bryan democrats ought to be for it, because that is one of the great principles of Bryan. The Wilson and Clark supporters ought to be for it. Every progressive initiative and referendum supporter ought to be for it. If you are going to trust the people, play fair. Those who favor the short ballot ought to be for it, for you are only going to nominate three men for state executive officers.

Ought we trust a boss-controlled convention? You who are against the short ballot ought to have had the experience that I have had. I have seen some of the most shameful proceedings in state conventions in connection with minor officers that could be witnessed. Talk about the great importance of these minor officers! I was in one convention where a gentleman cast five counties for attorney general and the gentleman didn't live in any one of the five. I have cast more than one myself. If Judge Okey were here he would tell you that his delegation left the convention two years ago and I was given Noble to cast in addition to Morgan.

Above all others the friends of representative government ought to be for this measure. If you don't want the initiative and referendum used every day in the week you had better clean up politics in the state of Ohio and get rid of the boss-controlled, corrupt convention. That is the danger to representative government.

Now, I want to consider for a moment the exception that you notice at the conclusion of the substitute as to township officers and the officers of little towns. We have been reversing the rule. We have been nominating justices of the peace by the direct primary and nominating governors and "little" officers like that at corrupt conventions. Now let us make a change. The direct primary is useful where there is an office worth while. Nobody wants a township office. I was on an election board two years ago and when we printed the ballots half of the township places were blank. Nobody wanted them. Why go to that expense when nobody wants the office? They can be nominated by a petition. I hope no one will offer an amendment on that. The country people are demanding it. This feature will save every county every other year $1000. It will save the state of Ohio next year $100,000 that is absolutely thrown away. I trust that no one will offer an amendment taking this provision out because it means two hundred thousand farmer votes for this proposal. I have had more demands from the farmers wanting this cut out than anything else since I have been here or before I came. I hope you will give this matter careful consideration and adopt it. I now offer the substitute.

The substitute was read as follows:

Amend Proposal No. 249 as follows: Strike out all after line 3 and insert the following:

"All nominations for elective state, district municipal and county offices shall be made at direct primary elections or by petition as provided by law, but direct primaries shall not be held for the nomination of township officers nor for the officers of municipalities of less than two thousand population, unless petitioned for by a majority of the voters of such township or municipality."

Mr. FACKLER: I offer an amendment.
The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. Tannehill to Proposal No. 249 as follows: Add the following:

"All delegates from this state to the national conventions of political parties shall be chosen by direct vote of the electors; each candidate for such delegate shall state his first and second choices for the presidency, which preferences shall be printed upon the primary ballot below the name of such candidate, but the name of no candidate for the presidency shall be so used without his written authority."

Mr. THOMAS: I offer an amendment:
The amendment was read as follows:

Insert after the word "offices" in line 4 the words "including candidates for United States senator."

Mr. ULMER: I am an out-and out independent, and so far as the present primary election is concerned I don't attend and can't attend because I have to say that I want a republican a democrat or a socialist ticket. We have all observed the present tendency in political life. There are no more people coming out and saying "My grandfather was a republican and I am a republican," or "My grandfather voted the democratic ticket and I am going to vote the democratic ticket." Our citizenship has begun to think for themselves and they are not sheep to be led by certain political leaders. Why not make some provision that a man can go to a primary without being asked whether he belongs to a certain party? I say you are just giving democrats and republicans and socialists a chance to vote for somebody that will be elected. The independent voter doesn't get a chance to vote. I say every name should be printed on one ballot, and I say each man who goes to the primary should have that ballot and should be allowed to vote for any name on it. I have an amendment to that effect, but there are three already in. As soon as one of them is disposed of I want to offer mine.

Mr. MAUCK: This proposal does not involve any good that the legislature itself cannot accomplish. It certainly is true that a convention called for the purpose of determining fundamental rights ought not to bother itself with questions which the general assembly may pass upon and determine. It is certainly true that there is no constitutional question involved in this proposal or in any of the amendments suggested. As long as that is true, those of us who are called here to determine the fundamental rights of the people and to incorporate them into a constitution ought not be required to waste our time on such matters as here presented and

Primary Elections.

I move that the proposal and all amendments be laid on the table.

The motion was seconded.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is, Shall the proposal and amendments be tabled?

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded, taken, and resulted—yeas 14, nays 79, as follows:

So the motion to table was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS: I don't want to take up the time of the Convention, but it seems to me that the last two or three elections for United States senators should be sufficiently convincing to make the delegates vote for such primary election in this state as they have in a great many western states and provide for the nomination of United States senators also. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of this amendment.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Before the vote is taken let us consider carefully what we are about to do. Some of us do not understand this. It purports to amend article V, section 1, of the constitution. If it has any relevancy to that article or section I am unable to discover it. If it is an amendment to that article I would like to know where it begins in the article and where it ends, or whether, if we adopt it as it is, we are amending any part of the constitution. If it pertains to article V, section 1, if it is a proper amendment to that section, it might as well have been added to the proposal adopted this forenoon.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: While this is a legislative matter there are two or three men here who were in the legislature when the Bronson primary bill was up. I would have voted to indefinitely postpone this matter if it had not been for one or two instances that occurred there. I introduced an amendment to the Bronson primary bill providing that state senators as well as all of the other officials below the governor, be nominated by primaries, and I introduced it four different ways and it was defeated every time. We simply couldn't get it. When the primary bill came up for congressmen, we tried it again and the senate defeated it again. You can't get the primaries under the legislature, and for that reason I am voting here today that there may be something done on this question and that a state senator shall not have any more rights than any other officer of the state of Ohio. If you don't elect a different class of members to the legislature than that which has been serving for the last eight years, you cannot pass any primary bill to put the senators under it, and I know it. You cannot get any matter in the senate that effects their own standing. We have been standing for a good many things that were purely legislative and this is one of them, but if you cannot reach a thing through the legislature you will have to reach it here. For that reason I am supporting this heartily.

We also tried to amend the primary bill so that we would not have to elect township officers under the primaries and that was defeated. There are many townships that don't have five votes at the primary election. At one time in Bowling Green there were wards that couldn't get a man to go on the ticket on account of the primary. That was on the democratic side, but it was the same thing on the republican side, and for that reason I opposed the indefinite postponement of this matter and will vote for it.

Mr. KRAMER: This whole matter is legislative. One objection to the amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] is that it is a direct contradiction to the constitution of the United States. It looks as if we were assuming a little too much authority. The United States constitution specifies the manner in which senators are to be elected and here we are providing another way.

There is not a state in the Union that has a constitutional provision with reference to senatorial primaries except Arizona. I would hate to see Ohio governed by Arizona and adopt the provision contrary to the constitution of the United States.

I move that the amendment offered by Mr. Thomas be laid on the table.

The motion was lost.

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't care very much if the legislature can do all the things we are attempting to do in this proposal. We know what Senator Beatty has said is true, that the legislature will not do it. Furthermore, we know it ought to be done, and consequently, if it is going to be done, this body of men must do it. The gentleman who has had so much newspaper and political experience, the author of the proposal, has told you the facts that have come within his personal knowledge, and you who have had any experience along these lines know it is true. Personally, so far as any political aspirations are affected, I wish this were the law. I would have a much better taste in my mouth after defeat at the primary than at a political convention, because at a primary all of the people have had an opportunity to speak. In a political convention you don't know whether the people want you or not. A few bosses behind closed doors make the nomination and that is the end. In years gone by when we started from Mahoning county to come down to a so-called convention, we knew the only service we could perform here would be to buy peanuts and feed the squirrels. Everything was arranged before we came. I can only remember one instance in which we succeeded in breaking a slate and that was when we chose Emerson and Price. I cannot see how any one can oppose this proposal. For instance, the legislature gave us the nonpartisan judiciary bill, but it was not nonpartisan. The legislature stopped short of giving us all we ought to have had. They said a judge could have his name put on the ticket by petition, or his name could go on through a convention.

Primary Elections.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I would like to know what your opinion is as to the constitutionality of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS]. If the federal constitution says that United States senators shall be elected by the legislature, how can we make effective this amendment to the proposal providing we pass it?

Mr. ANDERSON: In answer to the gentleman, we cannot change the constitution of the United States nor can any act we do finally determine how United States senators shall be elected in Ohio, except that it puts us on record in favor of it and to that extent it may help.

Mr. WOODS: Do you think it advisable for the Constitutional Convention to pass something here that openly and aboveboard violates the strict wording of the federal constitution? Do you think we ought to do such a thing as break an oath?

Mr. ANDERSON: Are you afraid of that? Is that a technicality on which you want to escape voting for this measure? Is that what your suggestion means?

Mr. WOODS: Do you think we ought to do something that clearly is in violation of the federal constitution, no matter what you and I personally think about it? Do you think we should do something here that clearly violates a provision in the federal constitution in the election of United States senators?

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not believe that we do that which is in clear violation of the federal constitution by any means. This simply provides that we have senatorial primaries for nomination, and then when the people express their choice the legislature will obey the will of the people and elect the senator thus designated. The Thomas amendment is not a violation of the United States constitution.

Mr. DOTY: Do you think the amendment offered by my colleague is any more out of whack with the federal constitution than the present law of the state of Ohio — the Stockwell bill — which provides the same thing?

Mr. ANDERSON: I see no difference, and in every state where similar legislation has been had they have violated the constitution, if we are violating it here. If Mr. Kramer is correct, they have the same provision in the constitution of Arizona, and an equally oath-breaking clause.

Mr. McCLELLAND: Is not there a difference between "nominating" a man for United States senator and "electing" a man for United States senator? They are not the same, are they?

Mr. ANDERSON: No.

Mr. THOMAS: Is it not a fact that the senators from Oregon are nominated through preferential primaries and elected by the legislature?

Mr. ANDERSON: Certainly. I think all the delegates are acquainted with that fact.

Mr. JONES: To my mind there are two things, and only two, legitimately within the sphere of action of this Convention with reference to constitutional provisions which may be the subject of its consideration:

1. To confer powers.
2. To regulate the manner of the exercise of such powers.

As has been suggested by gentlemen here, there is no doubt now about the power of the legislature to do the very thing that is proposed by this amendment; but with regard to many of the subjects, power to act upon which is conferred upon the legislature, the people have thought it wise to regulate the manner of the exercise of the power. Take, for instance, the matter of taxation. You confer upon the legislature the power to levy taxes, but you do not want to trust the legislature with the manner of exercising that power, and so you provide that taxes must be levied by a uniform rule upon all property according to its true value. The same reasons apply here. The people don't want to trust, for reasons suggested, the legislature to determine the manner in which this power with reference to the selection of candidates for office shall be exercised, and so, to my mind, it is perfectly proper and legitimate, although in a sense legislative matter, to provide in this constitution how these nominations shall be made, and I am heartily in favor of this proposal and the amendments to it provided they can be brought into proper form. There are objections that are immaterial and can be corrected, but in substance this proposal and the amendments are right and they are in the line of doing what I think ought to be done with reference to our present system of government, to perfect it in the respects in which it has been deficient. Practically the only trouble with representative government today is the character of the representatives, and whatever can be done to improve the character of representatives who are to administer this government is in the interest of the people and is in the interest of good government; and this measure to my mind is one of the greatest steps that can be taken in the matter of improving the character of the representatives that are to be chosen to make the laws and to administer them. It is too true that in the selection of candidates for state and other officers, as in the selection of United States senators, the people have had very little to say about it, but it is manifest to us all that if this government which has served us for more than a hundred years is to continue to be even as effective as it has been, although it is not what it should be, but clearly, if it is to be improved, something must be done to place more directly in the hands of the people the selection and determination of their representatives. To the extent that we can use preferential primaries to indicate the wishes of the people as to who shall be United States senator and who shall be their candidates for president of the United States I am in favor of doing it, and I am in favor of their indicating by direct primaries their preferences for governor and other state officers. We should all be unqualifiedly in favor of this, and I hope this proposal in proper form will meet with the approval of an overwhelming majority of this Convention.

Primary elections.

Mr. HURSH: Mr. President and Gentlemen; It is gratifying indeed to know that the motion to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] on the table was not sustained. The objections the gentlemen are raising that we can not insert in the constitution something prohibited in the national constitution is not at all well taken, in view of the tendency of the times. Let us insert a provision in this proposed constitution that will provide for the nomination of United States senators by primary and so far as possible for their election, for we shall soon be there. It will only be a few years until the United States senators in this country will be elected by a direct vote. This amendment commends itself to me as much as the main proposition, and as much or more so than the amendment by Mr. Tannehill to the original proposal providing for the elimination of primaries in townships, and that is surely a good thing. I know, as do the rest of you, that this is purely a legislative matter, but we all know by experience with the legislature for the past twenty years that we can't get this done in the legislature. We have tried to do this same thing through the legislature for years and the legislators have steadily and repeatedly refused to do it. In doing these things we know we shall receive the approval of the people. I want to say to you that the present law providing for primaries in townships is worse than a farce. I believe I am safe in saying today that we have the poorest set of township officials in the state of Ohio that we have ever had. I have had some experience in this, and I know that formerly we used to go into a caucus and put good men on the ticket. We wouldn't let them get off. As it is today nobody will allow his name to go on the ticket and in my part of the state, in several of the townships, we have the poorest class of township officers that we have had in years. I say to you I am heartily in favor of the proposition presented by the gentleman from Morgan.

Mr. MOORE: I would feel derelict in my duty to forty thousand patrons of husbandry in the state of Ohio if I did not support this amendment of Mr. Thomas of Cuyahoga, looking toward the election of United States senators by the direct vote of the people. It has been objected that this is in contravention of the constitution of the United States in that the constitution provides the manner in which United States senators shall be elected. But it is left to us to provide for the nomination, and we can do it. For a great many years there has been a continuous scandal in the congress of the United States over the manner in which some senators have been elected. I believe it was simply because they were elected by the bosses and by cliques within the parties and not because the people had any voice in it at all. I think the nomination of candidates for United States senators would take away much of this scandal which we have heard so much about in the last few years.

There is another thing that this amendment will do. It will gain for this Convention the applause and the respect and the support of the farmers of Ohio and of the United States. Wherever in the United States there is an organization of farmers our work will be commended, for they are in favor not only of nomination of senators by direct vote of the people but of the election of senators by the direct vote of the people. I am only sorry that we cannot have elections by direct vote of the people now, but as we can have nominations, and that is all we can have now, I am in favor of passing this amendment offered by Mr. Thomas.

Mr. WINN: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: There still exists another reason why we should write into our constitution the subject matter of this proposal and that is that it may be a permanent thing, beyond the power of the general assembly to repeal. It has been said, and generally speaking it is true, that the things which the general assembly can do should be left to that branch of the government. But standing where I now stand I said a few days ago that I am not afraid to write into the constitution some things that some people think are purely legislative. As the member from Fayette [Mr. JONES] has said, we can well say in the constitution as to taxation that the general assembly shall provide by law for the levying and collection of the necessary taxes. That would be nothing but a warrant to leave it to the general assembly to provide one system of taxation one year and another year a different one; but to the end that the system may be permanently fixed and not be changed except by the whole people of the state, acting directly or through a constitutional convention or voting on an amendment to the constitution, we provide a method by which the taxes shall be levied and we place it beyond the reach of the legislature. Now you know of one or two instances where a candidate will be nominated to succeed himself as a senator in the general assembly of Ohio because we do not make the nominations at the primaries, and I presume in the instance I have in my mind the candidate will be successful. I have in mind one case where a senator fought with all the power he could command against the adoption of a measure pending then in the general assembly making it necessary to nominate his successor by primary, and by causing the defeat of every proposition of that sort the gentleman whom I have in mind will be a candidate and in a few days will be nominated. He will be nominated simply because the people cannot express their will upon the subject. Some people say "Why not defeat him at the polls?" Well, it is not as easy as said to do that, because we know until we succeed in breaking down party lines a little more it is not easy to beat a man when he is nominated by a party largely in the ascendancy. However, the time is fast approaching when every man will go to the polls and will vote only for those men whom he conscientiously believes are best fitted to fill the offices for which they are candidates. Many men have reached that position now and many are approaching it. We all know it was only just a few years ago when we were on the stump telling our dear hearers to take their ballots in the booth, make a mark in the circle, close their eyes, harden their consciences and "let her go, Gallagher," good, bad or indifferent. I have quit those habits now and I shall never be heard on the stump again. If I find it necessary to so vote for a picture at the head of a column without regard to what is under that picture I will simply refrain from voting. I certainly favor this amendment. I hope we shall pass it and that it will be approved at the ballot box.

Mr. LAMPSON: There is nothing in this amendment about the election of United States senators. It is only the nomination we are considering. I am in favor of the amendment of Mr. Thomas and the amendment of Mr. Fackler too.

Mr. FITZSIMONS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I had intended to sit here quietly and listen to gentlemen discussing these subjects, for in my day I have pretty nearly talked myself out, but when it comes to this proposition it brings up recollections that I dare not ignore in silence. If I did I would not be true to the oath I took when I became a member of this Convention. I have not seen a man elected senator from the state of Ohio in the last thirty years that represented the choice of a majority of the people of this state. I have seen men come in here to the city of Columbus with their friends, and with their boodle in gripsacks buy legislators of the state of Ohio as you would buy cattle in the stock yards. I have known of a sack of $75,000 that was kicked around in a room in the Neil House because of the indifference of the gentlemen who brought the money here after they had accomplished their purpose. I saw another senator elected who, after his election, had to be a fugitive from the state of Ohio for twelve months. I have seen another elected when the constitutional rights of the citizens of Ohio were trampled on at the election so that he might have an opportunity to get a sufficient number of legislators to put him in Washington, and then you hear delegates, representatives of the people, who are to frame the organic law of the state of Ohio hesitate about putting barriers in that road. Now is the time to say that the people of Ohio shall have a choice in the selection of their senators. Put it up to the people to do it, and if you don't you are not entitled to proper representation on the part of your senators in Washington.

Mr. WATSON: I think we want a vote on this matter and I demand the previous question.

Many DELEGATES: No.

Mr. WATSON: Then I withdraw the demand.

Mr. CROSSER: Suppose this amendment becomes effective; won't their be a conflict—

Mr. TANNEHILL: Any conflict will be taken care of in the schedule. That is the last word in every constitutional convention.

Mr. THOMAS: A number of the delegates have suggested that I change the wording of my amendment to make it better. It reads like this: "Provision may be made by law for a preferential vote for United States senators." That means the same thing, so with the permission of the Convention I withdraw the other amendment and offer this amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Insert after the word "law" in line 3 "and provision may be made by law for a preferential vote for United States senator."

Mr. FESS: Mr. President and Members of the Convention: I believe we will not go before the people with a more popular proposal than this, because there has been so much criticism and just criticism arising out of the method of electing United States senators. This is not an attack upon the senators, but is rather an effort to save them from a situation into which they sometimes get, usually on their own invitation. Even if it were an attack, it seems to me we should vote on and adopt it. As there is no desire to further discuss it—

Mr. DOTY: Just a moment. The amendment just proposed is to the Tannehill amendment, but the Fackler amendment, if adopted, would necessitate a change of wording in the Tannehill amendment, because they are both amendments to the proposal and not one to the other.

Mr. HURSH: Before the gentleman from Greene moves the previous question I would like to make a request for a change. Instead of using the word "may" I prefer to use the word "shall".

Mr. THOMAS: I accept that.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I want some information before I vote. Does any one here know whether or not members of the school boards are nominated by petition only, whether they are under the nomination of the party?

Mr. TANNEHILL: We have a ridiculous provision right now that the nomination shall be by parties, but that they go on an independent ballot. As soon as your party convention or primary is over anybody can go out with a petition and put his name right on with the others, so that the nomination is of no value whatever.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I thought in Cincinnati that the nomination was only by petition. Another question I wanted to ask Mr. Tannehill was whether he means that nominations may be made both by direct primary elections and petitions. Is that right?

Mr. TANNEHILL: My object in putting the petition in there was just to make it possible to nominate the members for the school board and the judiciary that way if it is desirable.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Then won't you be willing to insert the words "in such manner as may be provided by law"?

Mr. TANNEHILL: I have no objection to that.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: That will clear it up.

Mr. THOMAS: I want, with the consent of the Convention, to change the word "may" to "shall".

Consent was given and the change made.

Mr. WOODS: I simply want to say the last general assembly provided a law of this kind, and I don't know but that this means we shall do all over again what they have done. I am in favor of electing United States senators by a direct vote and I would overrule the constitution of the United States to do it if I could, but we cannot do it. If I remember right the last general assembly passed a law providing for a preferential vote on United States senators. If they have done it I don't think we should say that they shall do it again.

Mr. THOMAS: I don't think this will require a reenactment.

Mr. MOORE: I feel that this preferential vote for United States senators is a phantom. I believe it is a grasping at the shadow instead of at the substance. I feel that when the people of Ohio go out and vote to nominate a man that he should be elected, but if we have no authority to enforce the wishes of the people on the legislature we are lost. I would like to have that so fixed that if a man is nominated he would be elected; that they must vote for him.

Mr. FESS: Now I move the previous question.

The previous question being regularly demanded and a vote being taken the main question was ordered.

Mr. ULMER: I want to say —

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order.

Mr. ULMER: —that I don't think it was ever intended —

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order.

Mr. PECK: I would like to inquire whether this proposal covers judicial officers?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes.

Mr. PECK: There are some of us who would like to put in a proposal requiring all judicial officers to be nominated by petitions.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I think provision has been made as to that.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the delegate from Morgan [Mr. TANNEHILL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the proposal as amended, and the secretary will call the roll.

Messrs. Brattain and Tallman voted in the negative.

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 249 — Mr. Tannehill. To submit an amendment to article V, section 1 of the constitution.—Relative to primary elections.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

All nominations for elective state, district, municipal and county offices shall be made at direct primary elections or by petition as provided by law, and provision shall be made by law for a preferential vote for United States senator, but direct primaries shall not be held for the nomination of township officers nor for the officers of municipalities of less than two thousand population, unless petitioned for by a majority of the voters of such township or municipality.

All delegates from this state to the national conventions of political parties shall be chosen by direct vote of the electors; each candidate for such delegate shall state his first and second choices for the presidency, which preferences shall be printed upon the primary ballot below the name of such candidate, but the name of no candidate for the presidency shall be so used without his written authority.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next business before the Convention is Proposal No. 62 — Mr. Pierce, relative to the abolition of capital punishment.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. Pierce was recognized.

Mr. TETLOW: Will the gentleman yield so that I can move to postpone the consideration one minute? I wish to offer the report from the committee of three on conservation.

Consent was given and Mr. Tetlow offered the report of the special committee of three which was read as follows:

The select committee to which were referred Proposal No. 64 — Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, Proposal No. 230 — Mr. Tetlow, and Proposal No. 313 — Mr. Leete, having had the same under consideration, report them back with the following amendment, and recommends the passage of Proposal No. 64 when so amended:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"Laws may be passed to encourage the propagation, planting and cultivation of forestry and exempting from taxation, in whole or in part, wood lots or plantations devoted exclusively to forestry or to the growing of forest trees; and also provide for reforestation and holding as forest reserves such lands or parts of lands as has been or may be forfeited to the state, and may authorize the acquiring of other lands for that purpose; also to provide for the conservation of all natural resources of the state, including all streams, lakes, submerged and swamp lands or other collections of water within the boundaries of the state, and for the formation of conservation districts; and shall provide for the regulation of all force, energy and power developed or to be developed from said water; and shall provide for the regulation of mining, weighing, measuring and marketing of all minerals."

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TETLOW: I now move that the report be printed and made a special order for ten o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. DOTY: The original motion was that it be placed at the top of the calendar. That is better than what you are moving.

Mr. TETLOW: Then I will withdraw the motion to make it a special order.

Mr. DOTY: That report should refer to but one proposal.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Well, there are three proposals, one each from the delegate from Columbiana, the delegate from Fairfield and the delegate from Lawrence. These, under the motion of the member from Highland, were submitted to this special committee for report.

The PRESIDENT: The president would say that in order to keep the books straight it is necessary to strike out the reference to the other reports. When they are met with they can be indefinitely postponed if this matter takes care of them. Just let it read, "The committee, having under consideration Proposal No. 64, offers the following substitute."

The change was made as directed.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the printing of the report and the placing it at the head of the calendar for tomorrow.

The motion was carried.

The consideration of Proposal No. 62 was resumed.

Mr. PIERCE: There is a disposition on the part of the delegates to this Convention to expedite business. I do not want to interfere with that desire because I feel it is a laudable one, and I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, for this Convention to pass on this proposal without debate. I have canvassed the Convention and the sentiment of the members is overwhelmingly in favor of the adoption of my proposal. If the Convention is willing to forego the debate, that will be entirely satisfactory to me. I believe it will be a good thing for the Convention to pass the proposal.

Mr. WOODS: I want to protest for a few minutes. I am opposed to this proposal, and my first point of opposition is this: If there is any matter that is clearly legislative and that can be taken care of in the general assembly it is this one. There is not any reason why we should put this into the constitution. There was a reason why we should put what we have just done in it, but I would like to have some one tell me why this should go into the constitution.

In the second place I am opposed to abolishing capital punishment. Here in the state of Ohio nobody can be electrocuted except upon a verdict of a jury, and that jury has a right to recommend mercy. If it recommends mercy the defendant gets a life sentence. I say to you that no jury in the state of Ohio will fail to recommend mercy unless it is an aggravated murder. I never shall vote in a body like this or in any body to abolish capital punishment. This is not the age to be making laws for criminals. We are making laws to take care of criminals. I think you are making an awful mistake. There is a lot of things that could be gone into on this matter, but if you don't want to debate it there is no use taking up time. There is no reason why this Constitutional Convention should put a proposition of this kind in the constitution. This matter has been in the general assembly and has been thoroughly debated. I have sat on the judiciary committee where every member was against the proposition and we reported it nevertheless. After thorough debate it was killed. If we electrocute every man who commits murder there might be some reason for it, but we don't. Do you think that men who would go down into a court house, as they did in Virginia, and shoot and kill the prosecutor and the judge on the bench and some of the jurors and some of the witnesses, should be allowed to live? If you do I don't agree with you. I think this is a mistake. I think it is a mistake for us to attempt anything of that kind here, and I hope you will think about the matter before you do anything of the kind.

Mr. WATSON: I want to raise my voice in protest against the abolition of capital punishment. The tendency of all is to protect the weak against the strong, and when a man coolly and calmly and deliberately enters your house with the purpose to commit robbery, armed to the teeth to commit murder if necessary, to carry out the other offense, you give him life imprisonment. I think the old Mosaic law should apply to this. I think it comes into play here.

Now, just a word further. There seems to be a spirit of sentimentalism that is asking us to take this penalty from the back of the criminal. I have as much compassion for my fellow man who goes astray as any other man, and I believe that we should reach out and lift him up rather than kick him down, but there are cases that are aggravated and as the tendency of the day is to give the criminal merely a nominal fine, I don't think anybody will be electrocuted who ought not to be. Take that case, in the adjoining county recently. A helpless school girl in passing her home was outraged and murdered and yet that criminal was only given twelve years' sentence. A few years ago near Bellefontaine, in Logan county, a far distant relative of mine was criminally assaulted and trampled into the mud by a brutish man and murdered in cold blood. Should that man escape with a mere penitentiary sentence for life? I tell you, gentlemen, this is not the time to trifle with such matters.

Mr. ANDERSON: What is your idea as to the purpose of the law for capital punishment? Is it for revenge?

Mr. WATSON: Protection.

Mr. ANDERSON: Would not life imprisonment without pardon be a protection?

Mr. WATSON: No.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then you are in favor of the old Mosaic law, "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth—"

Mr. WATSON: "And whosoever sheddeth a man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

Mr. PIERCE: I made a little speech a while ago in the hope that this matter would be adopted without any trouble, but that seems to be impossible. I believe it will be better to proceed in the regular way and I therefore wish to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: Unlike some others who have spoken, I shall not be egotistical enough to claim that this is the most important proposal that has come before the Convention, but I want to assure you that it is of vital importance to the people of the state. A question may assume importance from the angle at which it is viewed. If a person were awaiting electrocution for some crime he did not commit the probabilities are he would regard capital punishment as the paramount issue. Each individual is judged by what he does and by what he fails to do. Society is composed of individual units and its acts, either good or bad, are reflected in its customs and laws. If a majority of the people of a community are ignorant, depraved, superstitious and sanguinary, it is reasonable to suppose its laws will be crude and barbarous. It is a principle of mechanics that water will not rise above its source; neither will the customs, habits and laws of a people rise above the average intelligence of the community. If its people are intelligent and progressive, this fact will be reflected in its acts; if savage, its laws will be savage; if humane, its laws will partake of the same character. The people of antiquity are judged by their penal codes, as our civilization will be judged in time. We view with horror the penal laws of the sixteenth century, and I am sure two hundred years hence the people will regard electrocution as barbarous as the whipping post. No nation has a right to boast of its civilization until its laws are humane. When it is constantly putting men to death for crime, no matter what its claim may be, future generations will decree it is either savage or semi-savage. This state, one of the most enlightened in the Union, in the past twenty-seven years has put sixty-eight men to death within the walls of its penitentiary and has one now awaiting electrocution. It has become criminal because a few of its citizens are criminals. It murders because its citizens murder. In the evolution and progress of humanity the time will come and at no distant day, when the people will look upon us as we look upon our ancestors—with shame and humiliation. It is time to retrace our steps, to undo the wrongs we are inflicting upon society, and to guard the future against the cruel and heartless past.

The present constitution of the state provides:

All persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses where the proof is evident or the presumption great. Excessive bail shall not be required; nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel or unusual punishment inflicted.

And it is now proposed to amend the above section to read as follows:

All persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except in cases of homicide, where proof is evident or the presumption great. Excessive bail shall not be required; nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; nor shall life be taken as a punishment for crime.

I apprehend some of the opponents of the abolition of capital punishment will ask, Why recommend its abolishment constitutionally; why not leave it to the legislature?

It is true the legislature of the state has the power to abolish it, but the fact remains that it has never done so. The legislature is a partisan body, and not so well adapted to the work as this Convention; besides it has been in session every year since the adoption of the present constitution from 1851 to 1891, and each two years from 1892 to the present time. During all these years, it has not abolished it, which is the best evidence that it is not the proper body to deal with the question.

If the legislature during the past sixty years had passed a bill to abolish it, and the governor of the state had signed it, it would have been the law whether the people approved it or not. But not so if this Convention should recommend its abolishment. It has to go to the people for their approval or rejection, which is right. If the majority of the people do not want it abolished it cannot be done; if they want it abolished they may say so at the polls. All this Convention can do is to submit the question to the people of this state by referendum vote, Shall Ohio abolish capital punishment?

It seems strange that any man who believes in rule by the people will seriously object to this method of procedure. It is democratic to let the majority rule, and I believe if the people want a thing they should have it, whether it is best for them or not, provided it is not malum in se.

It is not material to the issue whether the legislature has the authority to abolish capital punishment or not. I am willing to concede it has full power and authority to do so, and if it had exercised it, as it had a right to do, it would be unnecessary for this Convention to deal with the subject matter. We are here discussing the advisability of its abolishment because the legislature of the state has failed to act, and I submit, after waiting for sixty years, it would be unreasonable to wait longer. This Convention has plenary power to recommend its abolishment to the people, and it will be derelict in its duty if it fails to act so the people may vote upon the question.

The greatest compliment this Convention could pay itself would be to pass by unanimous vote the proposal to abolish capital punishment. It would indicate to the people its progressiveness as well as its humanity, and expunge from the law of the state a crime that should never have disgraced it.

It shall be my aim, in the discussion of this question, to go to its merits without a multiplicity of words.

Capital punishment is justified, if at all, only on one ground, protection to society. Society has the inherent right to protect itself against the criminal acts of the lawless, because the great mass of mankind prefer to live an honest, industrious, virtuous, upright life, and those who interfere in any way with this right are enemies to society, and society has the right to self-protection.

To preserve inviolate this right it is not necessary for society to take the life of an individual. There is a more humane way than to kill. Life imprisonment is just as effective in most instances. It is true there is a remote possibility the prisoner will escape, but when hedged about by proper safeguards the likelihood is reduced to a minimum. Imprisonment for life is an effective mode of punishment, far less barbarous than hanging or electrocuting, and more in accordance with the spirit of the age.

Every advocate of capital punishment goes back to Noah's time for authority to kill. He justifies it on the scriptural quotation, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man his blood shall be shed." Dr. Cheever, who was one of the principal advocates of capital punishment, says, "It is the citadel of our argument, commanding and sweeping the whole subject."

If there is any delegate to this Convention who is influenced by the above quotation from the Bible in favor of capital punishment, I want to remind him that Hebrew scholars translate it in at least twelve different ways from the original, many of the translations materially changing its meaning. But for the sake of argument I will admit it means just what it says. How then can we reconcile the fact that a person who sheds another's blood in self-defense is exempt from murder? Shall we judicially kill the insane because they commit murder? If every person who takes life should be subject to the decree "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man his blood shall be shed", no one would escape the death penalty, no matter what the provocation or the circumstances. It either means what it says or it means nothing at all, and if it is to be literally accepted it includes all who shed blood, be they sane or insane, justified or not justified.

If it is the will of God that every person who commits murder, either accidental or premeditated, shall be executed, how do we account for the leniency with which God himself dealt with murderers both before and after the above injunction was issued?

The first man to commit murder, so far as there is any recorded evidence, was Cain. It was cold-blooded, premeditated, wholly unjustifiable. How did God, who was his sole judge, deal with him? Did he hang him, as a barbarian would have done, by the neck until dead? Did he electrocute him? He did not even imprison him—

And now art thou cursed from earth, which has opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand.

When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.

And the Lord said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

This was the decree of the court, the highest court in the land, but this was before "whoso sheddeth man's blood by man his blood shall be shed" was written to give the human Dracos, hyenas and jackals pretended authority to strangle men to death.

Did God kill Moses because he slew the Egyptian and hid his remains in the sand? Not a bit of it. He let him go scot free. What was done with Lamech? Were not his hands stained by the blood of another? What was done with David, who, the Bible informs us, "was a man after God's own heart?"—

And he walked one evening to enjoy the cool air on the roof of his house when his watchful eye saw a beautiful woman washing herself, and he coveted her. Upon inquiry he found she was the wife of Uriah, one of his faithful soldiers. He sent for him, treated him kindly, and told him he might go home to Bathsheba. But Uriah being a faithful soldier slept in the guard-room, refusing to desert his soldiers who were faring hard on the field of battle. So David got him drunk and commanded Joab "Set ye Uriah in the fore-front of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten and die.

This was an infamous crime, one of the worst recorded in the annals of literature, yet David escaped both the gallows and the electric chair.

What about Simeon and Levi? They too are murderers, and yet they were not strangled to death by divine command.

But all this occurred under the old doctrine of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," and it is a notorious fact that God did not cause one of them to be put to death. The people are now living in a different age. The laws suitable to the early inhabitants of a country may be wholly unsuited to a later period of time. What may have been suitable law to the early Hebrews may not be suitable to the people of the present day.

But the people are now living under a new dispensation. They are living under the benign influence of Christianity. It would be a sad commentary on them if there had been no progress in the last six thousand years. Notwithstanding the wonderful progress made toward higher ideals and life, there are a few half-civilized people who in their vanity and egotism imagine they are civilized, that would forever chain the human race to the dark and bloody ages of the past. They would go back to the time of Moses and re-enact the thirty-three capital offenses of his blood code. They would punish by death the crime of witchcraft; eating leavened bread during the passover; suffering an unruly ox to be at liberty; putting holy ointment on a stranger; going after familiar spirits and wizards; coming nigh the priest's office, and opposition to the decree of the highest judicial authority. Under the law of Moses these were all capital offenses punishable by death.

Is there any man in this Convention who wants them placed in our statutes? Does any man want a fellow-being put to death because he suffers "an unruly ox to be at liberty?" If he believes in capital punishment at all he should demand it because it is based upon as high authority as "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man his blood shall be shed." It was the law of Moses, and notwithstanding our higher and better civilization, it is still binding, if it ever was, upon the people. Does any man clothed in his right mind subscribe to any such nonsense? Does he not know it is wrong and unjust? Will he ask that it be restored?

If the people of this state have the authority to abolish all the capital crimes laid down in the law of Moses except one, why have they not the right to abolish it also? When, where and how did they get the right to prohibit the other thirty-two? If it is divine law that "whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," it is equally true that "putting holy ointment on any stranger" is divine law also, because both are of equal authority. If it is right to abolish the one, why is it not right to abolish the other?

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

' Capital punishment can not be defended on the ground of divine law. People may honestly differ as to the wisdom of its abolishment, but let its retention be placed on the true ground—its inexpediency. Do not try to place it on God, but rather to the ignorance and superstition of the people.

Will any person contend that the criminal law of Moses was sanctioned by Christ, and that society is still bound by it?

I found the teachings of Christ to the law of Moses. I regard them more humane, better suited to the times. I prefer to reject the Mosaic law which says, "He that smiteth father or mother shall surely be put to death," and in its place accept the saying of Christ, "I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill." The religion of Christ is one of love, not of hate, violence or murder. It teaches us to love our neighbors as ourselves, and if we accept His teachings, capital punishment will be abolished for all crimes.

The old law was, "Let her be stoned to death"; the new is, "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more."

The question, "Is the death penalty expedient?" has agitated the people for ages. It should be answered negatively, because it does not restrain the commission of crime. Society has been hanging criminals and others for centuries yet crime has not diminished. It has not had a deterrent effect; therefore it is a failure.

The most efficacious method of punishment is to confine in the penitentiary. If a criminal is executed he is beyond human aid. If he is imprisoned, he may be pardoned if subsequent events prove him innocent. It is more humane to imprison than to electrocute or hang. Punishment for crime ought to be certain, speedy, and tempered with mercy. The severity of punishment frequently prevents conviction.

Capital punishment is a relic of the dark ages. No tenet of the Christian faith can enjoin it. Six states of the Union have abolished it, and there is no disposition on the part of the people to return to it. Crime is less frequent where it has been abolished; there is less mob violence, and it is in accordance with the enlightened and progressive spirit of the age. It should be remembered that only one criminal out of each fifty-seven who commit capital offenses is judicially hanged or electrocuted. If fifty-six out of each fifty-seven escape, it will not endanger society much more if the other one should escape death.

Michigan, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Kansas, Maine and Minnesota have abolished capital punishment, and after years of trial in each of them there is no disposition on the part of any of them to return to the sanguinary and barbarous custom. The sentiment of the people of all those states is now so strongly against it that it may be safely assumed that it will never again be enacted in any of them.

Mr. JONES: Will you permit a question?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. JONES: Do you know how long any of the states have had laws in effect that abolish capital punishment?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes, Michigan and Wisconsin previous to 1853, and Kansas about the same year. In Kansas the law provided that a person convicted of a capital offense could not be executed until one year and one day had elapsed and then only upon the order of the governor. The fact remains that no governor in the state of Kansas ever issued an order for the execution of a criminal, and a few years ago the legislature of the state wiped it from the statute books completely.

Mr. STALTER: Do you think that life imprisonment is too severe a punishment for burglarizing a dwelling house?

Mr. PIERCE: I think that depends altogether upon circumstances. It might be in some instances and might not be in others. I do not think you can lay down any iron-clad rule.

Mr. STALTER: Were life imprisonment the penalty for burglarizing a dwelling house would there be any disinclination on the part of a burglar if a person should see him there to take that individual's life and destroy all evidence of his crime if there were no higher penalty for murder than life imprisonment?

Mr. PIERCE: I presume not. If he knew he would go to the penitentiary for life and that would end it, he might not hesitate to take the life of any one who would discover him in the commission of the crime.

Mr. STALTER: Then would not taking away the penalty of death for murder have a tendency to increase murder?

Mr. PIERCE: Not at all. It would have a tendency to decrease it and I will tell you why. The law of this country will show it. In Massachusetts and Connecticut they used to have a provision that the person who stole forty shillings should be executed capitally. They tried a great many of those cases under that law and there were a great many convictions, and even where the proof was clear that a man had stolen far to exceed forty shillings the jury would always return a verdict of guilty, but fixed the amount stolen at less than forty shillings.

Mr. STALTER: If the penalty for stealing a shilling were life imprisonment and there was no death penalty for murder, wouldn't the man who stole the shilling be inclined to take life to wipe out the evidence of the stealing?

Mr. PIERCE: No. You are an attorney at law, are you not?

Mr. STALTER: No; I am a farmer.

Mr. PIERCE: If you will go back and read the early law of England you will find pocketpicking was a capital offense and there were instances, hundreds of them, where people were executed for picking pockets, and in the very crowds that assembled to see those people executed there were any number of pockets picked right in the face of death. It did not deter them at all.

Mr. ANTRIM: Have not more murders been committed where capital punishment existed than after the capital punishment was abolished?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Suppose some one went to the penitentiary for life for some crime. Under the proposal as you want it that is just as great a punishment as a man can get.

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Well, suppose he kills a guard at the penitentiary in order to escape? What would you do?

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. PIERCE: Put him in solitary confinement where he would not have a chance to do anything like it again.

Mr. ANDERSON: Would not there be the same incentive to kill a guard where the man was in for murder in the first degree and waiting the chair as there would be if he were in for life?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: And does not history show that men who are in the penitentiary without any chance of getting out and waiting for execution do not kill or attempt to kill attendants?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes.

Mr. STOKES: Do you think it would have been beneficial to society if the murderers of Garfield and McKinley had been imprisoned for life rather than executed?

Mr. PIERCE: Yes; I think that is what ought to have been done with them. Now I shall be glad to answer questions, but I am trespassing on my time and I want to get through. If I have any time when I get through I will be glad to answer any questions that are propounded to me.

To give you an idea of the sentiment of the people of the state of Wisconsin relative to capital punishment I submit the following letter:

MADISON, January 27, 1912.

Hon. DAVID PIERCE,
Columbus, Ohio.

Dear Sir: Your letter of January 24 to Governor McGovern has been referred to this department for reply. We note that you have introduced in the Ohio Constitutional Convention a proposal to abolish capital punishment in your state and that you desire certain information concerning the effect that the abolishment of capital punishment in Wisconsin has had upon the number of capital offenses committed.

Capital punishment was only in operation in this state from 1849 to 1854.

During the time that it was in operation only three executions took place. It would be useless to attempt to make any comparison between the number of capital offenses committed when capital punishment was in operation and since it has been abolished, or to give an opinion as to whether the number of offenses have increased or diminished. All of the conditions that existed at the time capital punishment was in operation in this state have so materially changed that any comparison of statistics would prove nothing. We do not believe that capital offenses are more frequent in this state in proportion to the population than in others where capital punishment is in operation, but, of course, there are no statistics by which comparisons can be made.

There is not now, and never has been since the abolishment of capital punishment, any disposition on the part of the people to have it restored. During the last ten years there has not been a single lynching in Wisconsin for crimes that have been committed by persons. The last lynching occurred in this state about eighteen years ago. At the present time we have in the state prison about ninety life prisoners, all of whom have committed capital offenses. The people of this state do not believe in capital punishment. They do not believe in it because they do not think that it prevents the commission of capital offenses. They do not believe in it because they do not believe that the taking of a human life should be legalized. Whenever an execution takes place the newspapers give it so much notice that it has a demoralizing effect upon the people of the state in which it occurs, and especially upon the community in which it takes place. We do not believe that the legalizing of the taking of a human life relieves the person that is obliged to do the executing from the moral responsibility of taking human life. We would be glad to see capital punishment abolished in every state in the Union, and we believe the time will come when this will be done.

We are sending you by mail, under separate cover, a copy of our last biennial report. You may get information from this report which will be of benefit to you.

Very respectfully,

STATE BOARD OF CONTROL,
M. J. Tappins, Secretary.

What is true of the state of Wisconsin is true of the states which have abolished capital punishment. Capital crimes have not increased in them, and mob violence is seldom resorted to where the people have been wise enough to abolish it.

If the right of capital punishment is conceded the question of its expediency is debatable.

Judge Walker says:

The great argument in favor of death as a punishment is the terrific example it holds out to others. Not only does death render it certain that the same offender will never repeat the offense, but it has the strongest possible tendency to deter others from committing it. On the other hand, however, it is urged that the same result may be attained without inflicting death. Solitary imprisonment for life renders it almost equally certain that the offender will not repeat the offense; and as a terror to others it is scarcely less effectual than death itself. At the same time our sentiments of humanity are much less shocked at seeing the prison doors closed forever upon a fellow-creature than at seeing him suspended from the gallows. We feel that he has a space for repentance and reformation, instead of being sent suddenly away, reeking with guilt, to the presence of his final judge. We also feel that he may, after all, be innocent, so uncertain is human testimony. We know that innocent men have often been condemned and executed, and in such cases an infinite wrong has been done without the possibility of undoing it. The vital spark has been rashly put out, and all earth can not rekindle it; whereas the prisoner, when his innocence is discovered, can be set free and thus be indemnified, in some degree, for the wrong he has sustained. These considerations, and others of a similar nature, are strongly turning public sentiment toward the abolition of capital punishment."

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

I am opposed to capital punishment for the following reasons among others:

1. It prevents the enforcement of law by reason of its severity. I agree with Henry Ward Beecher that "while the fear of hanging does not deter men from crime, the fear of inflicting death deters many a jury from finding a just verdict, and favors the escape of criminals."

Mr. WOODS: I would ask you to explain how the finding of the verdict of guilty interferences with the jury bringing it in when the law provides for them to recommend a sentence of mercy and then a man can only be imprisoned for life.

Mr. PIERCE: It does, but it would take me a long time to explain it to you. As I said, when the punishment for stealing forty shillings was death the jury would find them guilty, but would always bring in a finding that the amount stolen was less than forty shillings, no matter what the amount actually was.

Mr. WOODS: You don't understand me. The statute provides that a jury can recommend for mercy in any case where they find a man guilty of murder in the first degree, and if the jury does that the sentence only can be for life imprisonment. If capital punishment were abolished the sentence would still be for life imprisonment, would it not?

Mr. PIERCE: Suppose the jury was composed of men like you; you would never bring in a sentence of mercy.

Mr. WOODS: I would not.

Mr. PIERCE: No; you would take them out behind the barn and shoot them.

Mr. WOODS: That would if they were guilty.

Mr. PIERCE: That is just the reason I want this, because we would find juries occasionally composed of individuals like you who would not recommend mercy.

2. It does not deter, restrain or prevent murder.
3. It occasionally takes the life of innocent people.
4. It is a relic of barbarism and belongs to the dark ages.
5. It has a bad effect upon the people of a community in which it occurs.
6. Life imprisonment is more humane and severe and just as effective.
7. It is against the progressive spirit of the age.
8. It violates the commandment of God, "Thou shalt not kill."

The select committee to investigate capital punishment appointed by the Ohio house of representatives, of which Gen. Durbin Ward was chairman, reported as follows:

The punishment, originating in the ages of darkness and barbarism, has been continued like so many other evils, because society has been too feeble and too prejudiced, too much attached to ancient usages, and too fearful of radical changes to be thrown off. The proud and cruel conqueror claimed the right to dispose of the life and liberty of the conquered, and having the power to enforce the claim transmitted capital punishment and slavery — the twin children of conquest — to succeeding ages. And they, like the other destroyers of mankind, veil the meanness of their birth under a pretended divine origin. The capital punishment theory now enslaves mankind in the same way the divine right of kings held its place till so lately in the popular mind, and like the slavish falsehood, was in earlier ages unfortunately incorporated into the people's religious faith.

It is pleasing to reflect that we have made so many advances in all that constitutes true civilization, but the cheek has still cause to mantle with shame that some of the relics of barbarism remain. Criminal reforms are always behind the spirit of the age. This is natural enough, for punishments connect themselves so closely with the passions of men that the more humane dictates of reason do not soon exercise their reforming influence on the criminal code. Men learn only after a long and painful experience that their reason more certainly than their passions illuminates the path of duty and conducts them to happiness.

But there is an evident progress. Step by step civilization advances, and the humane judgment, attaining greater maturity, assumes the control of the passions. This advance ultimately reflects itself in penal legislation, and the barbarous enactments of a ruder age fade one by one from the statute book. The wager of battle, the burning of witches, the branding of the forehead, are all gone to return no more. The death penalty must go too. It is too unphilosophical and too unjust to maintain its ground much longer in any country where reason is not the slave of prejudice. Already has the common sentiment of society forbidden the public exhibition of the accursed punishment, and ere long the gallows will be condemned to the same grave which now covers the stocks and the thumbscrew, the hurdle and the fagot.

Much has been said here about being progressive. I want to remind this Convention that we shall be judged by what we do, not by what we say. To abolish capital punishment will be a step forward. The grand old commonwealth of Ohio can not afford to belong to the age of dug-outs and stone hatchets. She should demand a higher and better civilization. She cannot afford to be less progressive than Holland, Finland, Switzerland, Belgium, Prussia, Portugal, Roumania, Tuscany and Russia; all of which have abolished capital punishment, except Russia for political offenses.

If this state shall abolish capital punishment it will be a forward step, and one that the people of the whole country will applaud. We shall be glad that we voted for it, and our children's children will honor and respect us for it.

All reform is slow. It took years to abolish slavery. Eminent lawyers, ministers, and college professors defended it as a divine institution, as they now defend capital punishment, but it had to give way to a higher, broader, better civilization. Its abolishment is progress, evolution, destiny. It is time to turn from the bloody past with all its horrors and to obey God's command, "Thou shalt not kill."

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. PARTINGTON: Members of the Convention: It is rather strange to me to listen to an argument favoring the abolition of capital punishment upon the ground of humanity, upon the ground of progress and the spirit of humanity and then to cap that argument by saying we should impose life imprisonment, and for misconduct while so confined in that prison the criminal should be put in solitary confinement. I can not see that spirit of humanity. A great student of penology has said if you confine one hundred men in the penitentiary, and take from them the last hope of escape, not one will be alive in fifteen years. I want to read you an indictment by President Andrew D. White in an address at Cornell University, wherein he declared that as a result of extensive studies, carried on through a long period of years and in all parts of the Union, he had become convinced that the United States leads the civilized world, with the exception perhaps of Southern Italy and Sicily in the crime of murder, especially unpunished murderers. The proponent of this measure told us that only one out of fifty-six murderers was convicted, and after making that statement he tried to follow it with the argument that capital punishment does not prevent crime. You give a criminal that kind of a chance, fifty-five to one, and he will take his chance every time. But I do not believe those figures are correct. I believe the figures would be nearer right at one hundred to one.

No man can argue rightly that capital punishment is not a deterrent from the commission of murder when only one man out of one hundred who commits murder is executed.

In England, where they have capital punishment, one out of three is executed, and this shows an appalling difference in the number of murders between England and the United States. In the United States from seven thousand to nine thousand and even ten thousand murders are committed in every year and in England there are only three hundred.

Now I wish to argue for a little while, not upon the justification, but upon the necessity of capital punishment.

Colorado just a few years ago abolished capital punishment and then a beast in man's clothes committed a heinous crime—robbed and murdered a girl of twelve. The sheriff led that criminal to the place of execution instead of the law; that man was executed by a mob. So I wish to argue to you for a little while only on the necessity for capital punishment, not its justification.

That capital punishment can not be justified on moral grounds may be admitted, i. e., on the grounds of Christian morality. It is true that the law of Moses exacted "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," and commanded that "Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses" (Numb. 35:30); but it was only until faith came that we were kept under the law (Galatians 3:23), the law being likened unto a schoolmaster to teach faith in Christ, and after faith is come the schoolmaster is no longer needed (Gal. 3:25). In other words, when faith fully possesses the heart the individual will keep Christ's commandments, and among other things which He commanded was an observance of that part of the law and the prophets which runs thus: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." If all men observed that injunction the law against capital punishment would be practically repealed; there would be no occasion to inflict it, for, while some men commit suicide, yet they are insane, and the law does not punish the insane.

But all men do not observe that injunction—in fact, few do—and until they do attain to that perfection they are under the law. As long as there are men who, like the unjust judge, neither fear God nor regard man, there will be murderers, and as long as there are murderers it is manifest they are not controlled by faith. Hence, as they must be controlled, it will have to be by the law. And the law, as I have shown, sanctioned capital punishment. So it appears that that repository of the oracles of God, the Bible, prescribes two sanctions, either that of faith or that of the law, and capital punishment is the sanction of the latter for the crime of murder.

But it was the sanction, too, for many other crimes which are not now punishable capitally. For instance (Deuteronomy 21:18), a stubborn and rebellious son was to be put to death, as were also men stealers, rapists and numerous other offenders. And it might plausibly be urged that just as we have come to regard the imposition of the death penalty for these and other lesser crimes as inhuman and indefensible, so we shall some day similarly regard capital punishment for murder; that, indeed, that day is now here. But is it inhuman and indefensible?

There are some things that to the conscience, whether Christian, pagan or savage, have always seemed justifiable. One of these is the doctrine of self-defense. Even the most devoted casuist does not seriously controvert that doctrine. Defending one's self, even to the taking of the life of one's assailant, is so natural and instinctive that it needs no justification in reason. And if society is really but the larger individual—that is, a collection of individuals who had their rights circumscribed by a necessary deference to the rights of others—why may not the doctrine of self-defense be justified in society's behalf?

It may be urged that the execution of a convict, occurring as it necessarily does, after the fact of the crime, can in no sense be said to be done in self-defense; that just as the law of self-defense for the individual requires him to go no further than is reasonably necessary to protect himself, so that if he uses more force than he believed, and had reasonable ground to believe, was necessary to his self-protection, he himself is guilty of a breach of the law; so, society, after a murder is committed, can not prevent the murder by afterwards killing the murderer.

Admitting that an execution does not prevent the murder that preceded it; and admitting that it has all the characteristics of an act of vengeance—as it is regarded in the minds of a great many people—yet it appears to me really to be an act properly denominated "self-defense," and to be justifiable as such.

In the first place, it must be remembered that it is organized society that is acting, and not any mere individuals; and in the second place, that while society consists of an aggregation of individuals, yet it is something more and different from a single individual. It is an organism which, while it often acts as an individual would act, yet also acts entirely and radically different from an individual, because it has more attributes peculiar to itself than an individual has, as its wants and necessities are radically different. While its life resides in the number of individuals composing it, yet it recognizes that the individual life is an essential part of its own life, and that a blow struck at an individual life — whereby it is extinguished — is a blow, and a deadly blow, struck at the life of society itself. No one would deny the right of the aggregation of individuals composing society to collectively defend themselves against a deadly attack on their own numbers, and to kill their assailants if it appeared necessary in order to prevent themselves being killed. They would be exercising collectively the right of self-defense. And, if the aggregation outnumbered the assailants, so that some of the former, in killing some of the latter in their attack, were really in no danger themselves and killed the assailants of others as part of the general defense, could it be said they were not justified in so doing? So society, in providing for and sanctioning the execution of the murderer, instinctively recognizes, first, that he has made an attack on society and killed one of its members; second, that having killed one of them, there is no guaranty, except by execution, that he will not kill another; third, that as a very general rule the fear of death is the greatest deterrent known, for "all that a man hath will he give for his life." While society executes after the fact, yet it could not proceed any other way, for society is different from the individual; yet it acts in self-defense nevertheless.

Society is organized, among other things, to secure the peace and good order of society. It has been found by long experience in civilization that peace and good order are essential to the exercise by the individual of all his constitutional and legal and, indeed, natural rights. So there is a duty resting on society — a duty to its members and to civilization — to do something more, upon the happening of a murder, than what is commonly understood by the punishment of the criminal. It is society's duty to take such steps as will not only make it impossible for the criminal to repeat his offense, but also, as far as possible, prevent others from doing likewise. That execution is an effectual preventive no one can deny, and that anything short of it is not effectual is abundantly proved by the numerous murders by life-convicts of their keepers of fellow-prisoners, or after their release from prison, which usually follows within a comparatively few years. That the possibility of capital punishment does not deter every potential murderer is true, but that it does deter very many I think is abundantly shown by the increase in homicides in those states and countries where capital punishment was abolished. In many of these it was subsequently restored.

In many of these it is not often resorted to, though still on the statute books. And it is a credit to humanity that it is not. But if this supreme penalty is to be abolished so that the man contemplating a murder — and it is only murders that are contemplated that are punishable by that penalty — shall feel assured that his own life will not pay the forfeit, will not the remaining restraint — the fear of his imprisonment, which is surely inadequate when the fear of death does not prevent — be lightly regarded by intending murderers? In no case is it true, I believe, that a condemned murderer, when it came to the moment of execution, would prefer death to imprisonment. While there's life, there's hope of escape or pardon.

The reluctance of society to impose the death penalty, as is shown by the few executions compared to the number of homicides, is one reason, and a very cogent one, why capital punishment is not more effectual as a preventive of homicide. The criminal, seeing this reluctance, takes his chances on escaping. How many more times would he do so if there were no capital punishment to fear and the worst that might happen would be his incarceration in prison, whence he would hope to escape or from which be pardoned?

The law is a practical science, intended to meet practical conditions in a practical way to secure results. It embodies the instincts of the race as affected by its experience over hundreds of years, and it responds to its needs and then to its ideals. It is well to have ideals. If we had none, there would be no advance. But you can not have an ideal state of law unless you have a corresponding ideal condition of facts. Capital punishment does not make murderers — murderers make capital punishment. The tortures and the brutality that used to characterize executions have passed away; in fact, they are seldom any longer public even. There is a great disproportion between the number of homicides and executions for homicide. More and more our common humanity constrains us to evade imposing the death penalty. Frequently, where the evidence points conclusively to guilt required by law to be punished with death, juries return verdicts of that degree of crime punishable only by imprisonment, shutting their eyes to the probability of a pardon in a few years, and doing the very thing the convict hoped and expected they would do if he were caught. Ultimately, in some happier time, the occasion for capital punishment may pass away. When it does, of course capital punishment will be abolished. And while the imposition of the death penalty is more honored in the breach than in the observance, it would hardly be wise to do away with what is generally believed (regardless of any notions as to its morality) to be the real restraint upon a great many potential murderers — namely, the possibility of suffering death if the murder is committed.

The time of the delegate here expired.

Mr. WALKER: Mr. President and Gentlemen: I think this an opportune time to break a silence which has been golden for several weeks, though I am naturally reluctant to take part in a discussion of this character. I feel that I am in danger of being misunderstood, as I always like to be en rapport with truly progressive issues, therefore I say I have been somewhat reluctant to express myself. The question that has been precipitated upon us here is no new one. It is as old as the first murder.

I was delighted with the familiarity with the Bible shown by the able proponent of the measure, but I was disappointed at the exhibition he gave in the manipulation of those Biblical passages and the application he made of them. If that is to be taken as a criterion of the proficiency of the average legal mind in the interpretation of language, I must yield some of my hitherto generally recognized and accepted appreciation of legal skill in this regard.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

This matter is not new. The first man born upon earth became a murderer and for the sake of the preservation of the race the death penalty was passed by and the command was given that he should go forth at liberty. He was sent from home, and went out and founded a city. The result of the passing by of that murder was that society became so violent that we are told the God of Heaven looked down and said it must all be blotted out, so violent had it become. After looking over all the people there were found only eight souls that were worthy to be saved, and after having saved them the new world began to be peopled. Even with the world yet to be peopled, the law was given (and this was not the Mosaic law, nor was it the law passed by the "human hyenas" who were demanding vengeance as some one else has said), a law that God himself gave when He was providing for the peopling of the earth the second time: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed." That was a thousand years before the enactment of the law of Moses. And that law of God himself remains in force until he chooses to repeal it and there is no record that that law has yet been repealed, and you should respect it if you have respect for the law of God. Bear in mind that not even did Jesus Christ himself while on earth announce the repeal of that law. True, he did preach the religion of love and kindness, and with His teachings we all stand in hearty accord, but not one of us thinks when He taught kindness and love for our fellow-men that He was talking about the treatment of confirmed criminals. I think if we write this law upon our books we shall be going back six thousand years instead of making progress as suggested here. The death penalty as we inflict it is not barbarism. Barbarism inflicts penalties for revenge. The law of our land takes human life in self-defense, as has been ably argued by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. The experience of the world in general has demonstrated the fact that a law like this is salutary.

I deprecate the fact that this matter has been injected here. Of all the measures that have been presented to this Convention, I do not know of a single one that is more legislative in character than this one. The matter is wholly within the control of the legislature now. The fact that this law still remains on our books is evidence that the people have not been demanding the change here sought to be made.

Under the initiative and referendum, which unquestionably we shall soon have, whenever the people demand it we can get it, and then, after a trial if our experience should be that it does not work well, the opportunity will be with us to repeal the law. We can handle it much better when it is a mere matter of legislation than if it is constitutional in character. I think the wise thing for us to do would be to leave the whole matter to the people themselves—to the legislature.

I have very little patience with much of the maudlin sentimentality of those who talk about criminals. Now the absurd part of the punishment of criminals ought to be noticed. We punish every man who commits a crime, either by fine or imprisonment, and then boast of our humanity. I submit to you we are still tyros in criminology. No matter how much we may boast of our superior intelligence in other lines we have dragged away behind on this matter of penology. We only have the death penalty for first degree murder, and do you not think the death penalty should be inflicted in such a case as occurred in the outskirts of this city when two hoboos shot to death a man who was arresting them when they had no incentive whatever to do it except to escape from a thirty days' imprisonment in jail? Men like that are entitled only to the consideration that is due criminals. What guarantee can you give for the security of life if such characters as these take life under circumstances such as they did and are not themselves executed?

Just take some of the cases of cold-blooded murders that come to your attention. When I was a boy playing in a brass band we were walking down the streets of the town and we heard the crack of a gun. Rushing to the scene of confusion, we learned that a man had deliberately shot to death a neighbor for whom he had been lying in wait behind a bush for three hours, and it was just a little personal grievance between the two. That man was put in the penitentiary for life and pardoned out at the end of seven years, as is the custom. We can count on the court and the jury to exercise all needed leniency in this matter of punishment.

Now, another idea I want to impress: If a majority of you have decided you are not favorable to capital punishment, as the proponent of this measure has said, before you pass the matter, before you fix it where it can't be changed, let us try it. We never yet have tried capital punishment in this state to see whether it will prevent crime. If it is true that but two or three per cent of the people who commit homicides are convicted, we have really never tried capital punishment for the prevention of murder. Before we throw away the remedy, let us try it. We ought not to be thus hasty, especially when we see that the result of applying the penalty is that homicides decrease amazingly. I have always had it in my own mind that the death penalty is a decided deterrent of crime.

It is said it is not the severity of the penalty, but the certainty, that prevents crime. I grant that, but why can't we visit with certainty the death penalty in such cases as I have cited? Why can't we make it just as positive and just as certain as we make life imprisonment?

Now, I want to answer a few suggestions and hints that have been thrown out in the remarks by the author of the proposal. It was hinted that criminals are born and not made, and that therefore they are largely irresponsible. That is a theory that has been made to work overtime. But even if it is true, there are some monsters that should be removed. No society should be jeopardized by their presence. After all that has been said about prenatal influence, the fact remains that no man is compelled to become a criminal unless insane and nobody advocates the death penalty for that man. Does any one think that that law given by God, "Whoso sheddeth a man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," was intended to be applied to an insane man? If that is a lawyer's conception of the law, no wonder the people liberally discount legal interpretations. A casual glance at the enactment of that law of Jehovah will show it was aimed directly at violent murderers and no one else.

It is said you can not reform a man by killing him. I deny that statement. You can not reform him after he is killed, but it is true that the fear of death will deter many men from committing crime. That is all the state has to do with reformation. Reformation of conduct is all of which the state can take cognizance. Reformation of life within belongs to the realm of religion, but the state directs its reformatory efforts toward a man's conduct. The certainty of the death penalty will deter men from murder, so that is the sense in which you can reform a man by killing him.

Again, there was considerable said about giving a man opportunity to reform. I am willing to give him an opportunity to reform, and I think the ordinary stay of execution is ample time to bring a man to penitence. It does not take a man twenty years to repent when he is brought face to face with his crime and knows the enormity of it and knows that he is to be executed for it. If there is a speck of manhood in him that can be regenerated, it will disclose itself in a short time.

Now someone asked what punishment would there be for a man under life imprisonment who killed a fellowman in the penitentiary, and the answer was that he might be put into solitary confinement. What is the effect of solitary confinement? Thirty-three per cent of the murderers confined in the Michigan penitentiary are insane. You talk about being humane! I insist it would be far more humane to take a man's life than to condemn him to a long and hopeless insanity. If you do not care to doom him to solitary confinement, what is the next course? Put him in the idle house with other men? That is to encourage riot, insurrection, and the opportunity to escape. But suppose you say cooperative work with other criminals, and this is the third possible thing before you. Solitary confinement is the first, the idle house is the second and the third is cooperative work with other criminals. But there is no guaranty that he will not take the life of some of those criminals of a lesser degree. I submit it is unjust to the average criminal to confine him and make him work alongside of a man who is a constant menace to him. Many instances might be cited where men have been guilty of taking lives of their fellow prisoners.

The reason for the abandonment of capital punishment on the part of some European nations has not been because of humanitarianism, but has been because of the manner in which they have been inflicting the death penalty. For instance, Russia used the knout. It was a loaded strap and a man was beaten with it until his life was gone. The people rebelled against that barbarous manner and wiped out capital punishment instead of changing the manner of execution to a more humane one. It was not that they rebelled against capital punishment, but against the manner of its infliction.

Mr. KRAMER: If the severity of the punishment is what you are after why not put the man to death by the knout? Why not use that method if all you are after is the severity of the punishment?

Mr. WALKER: I have been speaking with a stammering tongue if I have left such an impression. What I am after is not severity. I was trying to show that the death penalty was a deterrent because a man will give up everything to keep his life. Life imprisonment does not make the penalty any the less severe. As for myself, I would rather be executed than have a long period of confinement in the penitentiary. I might answer further, from an ethical standpoint, that first of all it is a safeguard forever from any possible crime on the part of that man again.

Mr. BOWDLE: The psychology of preachers is very interesting to me. There is among preachers a certain ferocity of view that is very curious. Of course, that does not refer to all preachers. I know a number of preachers who are almost human. It is interesting to me to see that the humanity in this Convention is, at least temporarily, observed to be on the side of the miserable lawyers. Of course, one does not often connect lawyers with christianity, but it is a significant fact in the life of Jesus pretty nearly all the decent things done were done by members of the legal profession. When our Lord needed somebody to say a word for Him in the presence of a lot of deriding preachers, Nicodemus, a lawyer, came to the front, and said "Does our law judge any man, before it hear him and know what he doeth?"

At the crucifixion, when all of the preachers had fled and there was nobody around to arrange our Lord's sepulchre "Joseph, of Arimathea, a rich man and a lawyer" went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus.

And when the time came to carry the Gospel to all the world, the divine mind did not select a preacher, but saw a sign in Tarsus "Saul, Attorney at Law and Notary Public," and He selected him for the mission. The legal profession has shown brilliantly in all the mutations of history. Not so much the preachers. Preachers, of course, naturally tend toward ferocity because they think they have received a kind of divine commission to go out and by force clean up the earth; and they have been appealing to that force ever since they got the commission and without success. They have forgotten utterly that the genius of His command is love. I feel I can speak thus frankly because I was denounced by the preachers of this Convention. We are charged with knowing not how to use Scripture. Maybe the charge is true, but let me quote a little from the Scriptures:

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth:

But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.

And if any man will use thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.

Just ask a minister for his coat or cloak!

And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.

Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you;

That ye may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven: for he maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

This is the law of love that humanity has been trying in a staggering way through these ages to infuse into our economic and legal life and into the criminal law of our life, and it is this law of love that the preachers denounce because it impinges against their imagined commission to go out and borrow Caesar's club and clean up things.

It is curious to observe the misuse that is made of Scripture. I agree with the gentleman from Holmes [Mr. WALKER] that far. The misuse of Scripture has led to a great deal of anarchy in this world. The Bible condemns the taking of interest, yet most Christian people are glad to collect eight per cent. It appears that David once danced acceptably before the Lord, and based on that we have the Holy Rollers coming in and they say the reason the Christian faith has failed is that we have not cultivated dancing. The Bible says "Ye shall not suffer a witch to live" and relying on that our forefathers burned the witches. You can find in the commands to the apostles ample authority for socialism. It states distinctly that the apostles had all things in common. But of course, socialism won't do.

By searching the Scriptures you will always be able to find some letter that will sanctify any ridiculous movement. Much of it comes from the fact, as Swedenborg has pointed out, that we have fallen into the custom of regarding the Epistles in the new Testament as inspired. All of the vagaries of the human understanding will find authority in the Epistles. But Swedenborg has ably shown us that the inspired word of God is in the Old Testament and in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John; and we should not regard the Epistles, although containing many excellent things, as the inspired word of God.

I am in favor of this proposal as suggested to us by this humane lawyer from Butler [Mr. PIERCE]. I am in favor of it on a ground not yet stated. I do not think it is a good thing to visit a form of penalty upon man which entails thereafter a stigma upon innocent relatives. I know of one or two cases in my own experience where families—mother, father and children—have lived lives of blight because of what has happened to a son in the penitentiary. I read with infinite sorrow a few years ago of an old woman, Mrs. Stimmel, who had had her life abbreviated by heartbreak owing to the fact that her son had been electrocuted. I have read with unspeakable sorrow of the father and mother of Richeson going and falling at the feet of the governor of Massachusetts and begging him to spare the life of their son. I read lately that the family of a certain noted criminal who had been electrocuted, left the community, trying to hide themselves from the awful stigma. No, I can not believe the state is justified in visiting a form of punishment on a man that haunts relentlessly so many innocent relatives, nor do I believe the visitation of the death penalty has any kind of deterring effect upon crime or criminals. All who have studied crime know that men who commit crime are afflicted with a curious egoism; that they feel their particular crime will never be discovered; that their crime is a conspicuous exception to all rules. I can not believe the severity of the penalty has anything to do with such cases. Therefore I am in favor of abolishing the death penalty, as so many other highly civilized countries have done.

Mr. WALKER: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman—from Highland [Mr. BROWN] is recognized.

Mr. WALKER: I want to ask the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. BOWDLE] a question.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Highland is recognized.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I have been considering this question somewhat and was on a committee that had it under advisement. At that time I was disposed to favor it, but at the present I have changed. I have listened to these debaters, with their biblical references and I have heard them splash around in each other's literary suds, apparently not coming to the real question of anything that has been put before us. We have been putting in a great deal of time exploiting ourselves. I think we should get right down to these things and consider the real point and pass or reject all of the proposals that we have before us and get through.

It is a fact many writers on the question of criminal responsibility find that capital punishment or severe punishment of any kind does not deter the commission of crime. Sir Henry Maudsley, a famous writer on responsibility in mental diseases, says that during the Spanish inquisition all of the people, of Europe at least, followed a sort of sympathetic application of law to criminal—sympathetic with the inquisition—and that the death penalty applied in England for the stealing of sheep increased the number of sheep stolen. It was as the gentleman from Hamilton county [Mr. BOWDLE] has justly said. All criminals are dominated by the ego. A criminal can not escape the tyranny of his organization. The forefathers who made him are responsible for his condition mentally, morally and spiritually, and if he is a criminal he is impelled by an irresistible impulse to do things which seem to be proscribed by law, and no matter what the severity of the punishment for crime may be in any country the person who has a tendency by inheritance of that kind of mentality can not restrain himself from submitting to impulse, but does that argue against the punishment? Is it an argument in favor of punishment? If the condition is hereditary it should be stopped by emasculation if need be. That is the situation.

I would like to know what the gentleman from Butler would do with a case like this:

A man named John Billman, who had been sent to the Eastern Penitentiary of Pennsylvania for horse-stealing, murdered his keeper under circumstances of great brutality and yet with so much ingenuity as to elude suspicions of his intentions and almost conceal his flight. He hung a noose on the outside of the small window which is placed in the door of the cells to enable persons outside to look in. He then induced the keeper in order to look at something on the floor directly at the foot of his door to put his head entirely through. The noose was then drawn, and but for an accident the man would have strangled. Notwithstanding this attempt, the same keeper was inveigled into the cell alone a few days afterwards on the pretense of Billman's being sick and was there killed by a blow on the head with a piece of washboard. Billman undressed him changed clothes with him placed him on the bed in such a position as to induce the general appearance of his being there himself, traversed in his assumed garb the corridor with an unconcerned air, addressed an apparently careless question to the gate-keeper and sauntered listlessly down the street to which the gate opened.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. STAMM: Would it not be more humanitarian and afford sufficient protection to amputate Billman near the hip joint and give the preachers a chance to reform the criminal instinct?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: That is apparently not a serious question. If a person is affected with pyromania, an irresistible impulse to burn houses, something must be done, and if that individual has inherited the tendency and it is an uncontrollable impulse which he cannot resist, what can society do if the man can not be reformed? In the interest of humanity and the social compact he at least ought to be prevented from propagating his kind.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you know any of the writers upon that question, alienists, who have laid down the doctrine that they ought to be disposed of as you suggest?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No. That is the trouble with the lawyers. They are always looking for precedent. They must follow precedent regardless of where it leads.

Mr. ANDERSON: Lawyers didn't write that—

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No, but you think we should teach the things the alienists teach because they teach them.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not true in murder cases that alienists are put upon the witness stand and then testify according—

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: To whichever side hired them, the way that side wants them, and in accordance with the size of the fee?

Mr. ANDERSON: Therefore, if the relatives of one charged with crime have not enough money to employ the alienist all efforts looking toward innocence ought to be stopped and the man allowed to be executed?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The alienist pettifogs the case, just the same as the lawyers themselves, for the fee he gets.

Mr. ANDERSON: Can you tell me one alienist who claims there is no border-line in insanity, that a man may be sane one minute and insane the next—that there is no border-line between sanity and insanity?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I will inform the gentleman privately all I know on that subject, if he wants, and publicly I will say that there is no discriminating differentiating border-line between sanity and insanity. I believe that all people of extremely high genius are insane; I believe that all persons who are uncontrollable criminals are insane, and I believe you are insane, because I think all men of genius are insane.

DELEGATES: Agreed.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it because I recognize your great ability that you think I am insane?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I can only judge your insanity by my own. I believe all men of large ability are insane. But I think this is too serious a matter to be considered in light vein. It must be a question of expediency and not a question of broad humanitarianism applied to a single individual. I think it should be based upon the broad question of expediency in the interest of coming generations to exclude, if possible, the tendency of perpetuating criminality in the race. I think it would be better to emasculate every person of grave criminal tendencies if his crime was not of sufficient gravity to apply capital punishment. I believe after a while that would solve the situation and that we would be able to raise healthy, normal and natural children. I feel that it is a physical degeneration that makes us so criminal, and I think we are suffering by the survival of the criminal nature more than we are gaining on the humanitarian side. If we had a measure by which the criminal does not survive we would cease to propagate criminals, and as a matter of general policy, in the interest of the state, those people should be included and their disability should be secured in the direction of the prevention of the propagation of their kind, so that the thing would finally be impossible.

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't know of any lawyer pettifogging a criminal case where a life was at stake. I have known prosecuting attorneys to go a great distance to convict where I did not think it was the duty of the prosecuting attorney to do that. I have personal knowledge where a certain man committed a crime. He loved a girl and saw her in company with another young fellow and shot at the other man and killed the girl. A pettifogging alienist was paid his expenses and $50 to come down to Youngstown to make an examination of the case, and he stated to the attorney that he would willingly take the witness stand and testify that the man who did the shooting was insane, but he wanted $500 before he would so testify. The $500 could not be raised by the widowed mother of the criminal. She couldn't get any money to employ an alienist. The result was that that same expert, high in the profession—he is now dead and I do not care to mention his name—took the witness stand for the state and was given $1000 to testify that the criminal was sane and the man was executed. That is an example of the honorable alienist.

Mr. WATSON: Don't you think that capital punishment ought to be applied to just such fiends as that alienist?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; I would like to have it done. I have sat, not as an attorney taking the principal part, but I have sat in a number of murder cases, and I made up my mind then if I ever had an opportunity to cast my vote to do away with capital punishment I would do it. Let me appeal to the gentleman who has all the earmarks of a prosecuting attorney, the gentleman from Medina [Mr. Woods]. Let me appeal to him and let him tell the Convention how difficult it is to get a jury because, when you ask the juror the question, "Are you in favor of capital punishment?" the average juror will say no. I admit they say that sometimes to escape the duty, but the number is increasing every day, and unfortunately for the accused and unfortunately for the right determination the best men in the community are against capital punishment. When they are put in the jury box and asked the question they say, "I don't believe in capital punishment." Is not that true, Mr. Woods?

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. WOODS: And if you go further you will find that very fellow just doesn't want to spend the time to be on the jury.

Mr. ANDERSON: That is true to a certain extent.

Mr. WOODS: Don't the best men in the county come and say under oath in the jury box that they are not in favor of capital punishment?

Mr. ANDERSON: Thank God we haven't many of the kind of citizens you describe in Mahoning county. You may have perjurers in Medina. You are in favor of capital punishment, but do you arrest, for perjury, the men who perjured themselves because they don't want to sit on the jury—do you punish them or let them go free?

Mr. WOODS: There is a difference between a witness and a juror. When you ask those jurors if they can render justice are they under oath?

Mr. ANDERSON: Certainly. Didn't you know that?

Mr. WOODS: The juror is not sworn to try the case?

Mr. ANDERSON: He is sworn to answer questions.

Mr. KING: Is not every juror examined under oath touching his qualifications to serve?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes. It may be that they make an exception in Medina, but that practice prevails all over the rest of the state. Consequently when he is asked the question whether he is in favor of capital punishment he is under oath, and if he wants to perjure himself for the purpose of escaping the unpleasant duty of sitting on the jury he can do so, but I am not referring to that class of citizens. And right there, I would like to suggest that I am in favor of the humane doctrine of Dr. Brown, that all men who have a tendency toward degeneration should be executed, because the first men who would be executed under that would be the alienists.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Did you understand me to say that I believed in executing all persons who had a tendency to commit crime?

Mr. ANDERSON: No. You said you believed in executing all those who inherited a tendency to commit crime.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No. I said I believed in executing those who have committed capital crimes; and even though it could be proved that it was from hereditary alienation of mind, it would be better in the interest of coming generations of society to stop the propagation of that kind of mental condition.

Mr. ANDERSON: Didn't you say those who inherited an irresistible impulse to commit crime ought to be executed so that that inherited tendency would not go on through coming generations?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No. I said if they inherited criminal tendencies and were impelled by irresistible impulses to commit capital crimes, then in the interest of society, even though they might have other humanitarian impulses, it would be better for them to be executed or emasculated.

Mr. ANDERSON: Don't you stop that which you suggest if you imprison them for life?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If we had any good, well-founded reason for believing that the authorities would allow them to be imprisoned for life it would be all right, but through the processes of law and by the aid of lawyers they have been able to get out of their punishment in very much shorter time than life.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not true that the man who inherits an irresistible impulse to commit crime is insane?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you believe he should be executed?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I believe he should be executed if he is sufficiently insane not to have a responsible condition of mind permitting him to know right from wrong and if his tendency is to commit capital crime. If he is impelled to homicide, it is a dangerous condition of alienation of mind which should be stopped.

Mr. ANDERSON: Does not the same authority you quote upon responsibility for crime, in one part of his work, say that executing for crime breeds the commission of the same crime in the same community?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The principle he advances is that it attracts the attention of those criminally inclined and that the insane ego impels others to do the thing that is prevalent in the current expression of the day.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then the insane ego would have been dormant if it had not been for the exciting causes—

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The suggested cause.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then does not your argument lead to this, that they should not be executed because you had better let that "insane ego" lie dormant in the community?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: But there is a difference in the gradation of the criminal responsibility in mental diseases. Some of them are impelled to commit minor crimes and others are impelled to commit nothing but capital crimes, and they have been consistently divided in that way. The individual who is inclined to commit homicide ought to be dealt with.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is it not true that an alienist, when he goes in to examine the accused,—

Mr. FACKLER: I rise to a point of order. The discussion is degenerating into a debate between two members of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The member yielded to the gentleman from Highland and longer time was taken up than was anticipated.

Mr. ANDERSON: I have a lot of letters here from a number of governors. May I have unanimous consent to have them read?

The consent was given.

Mr. FACKLER: I move the previous question.

There were several seconds.

Mr. PECK: The gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] has not yielded the floor. The secretary is to read part of his speech.

The PRESIDENT: I understood that he had yielded the floor, but unanimous consent having been given, we will allow the letters to be read before putting the question.

The letters were read as follows:

From Francis E. McGovern, governor of Wisconsin:

More than fifty years ago capital punishment was abolished in Wisconsin.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

There is no movement here to restore capital punishment, the people being well satisfied with the present law. I am opposed to the death penalty in all cases.

My opposition to the death penalty is based on the fact that as a matter of morals it is degrading and unjustifiable, and as a matter of experience it is ineffectual and unnecessary. My personal belief is that society has no moral right to take the life of a human being as punishment for crime. In actual practice it has been found that capital punishment does not tend to prevent crime. An instructive object lesson is furnished by Wisconsin and its neighboring state. During the last half century Illinois has regularly inflicted the death penalty for certain crimes of violence; Wisconsin has not. The record of Wisconsin, however, even in respect to these specific crimes, has always been better than that of Illinois.

From Governor Stubbs, of Kansas:

Kansas does not inflict capital punishment. Three years ago capital punishment was abolished in this state, not because there was a demand for the abolition of it, but because there was such a positive objection to it that it never had been enforced during the previous forty years. We had a capital punishment law, which provided that sentences under it became effective when the governor signed the death warrant, but for nearly forty-five years no Kansas governor ever signed a warrant to execute a criminal. This refusal of the governors to do this was sustained by an overwhelming majority of the people. Practically 99 out of every 100 opposed capital punishment.

Under no circumstances would I want the death penalty restored in Kansas. It is offensive to the intellectual and moral development of the state.

My main opposition to the death penalty is this: It is a brutality that does not accomplish the purpose of its invention.

From Governor Aran J. Pothier, of Rhode Island:

Capital punishment was abolished in Rhode Island in 1852, and there is no pronounced movement at all in favor of its restoration. Personally I do not favor the infliction of the death penalty by state law.

The last Minnesota legislature, in response to the recommendation of Governor Eberhart, passed a law abolishing capital punishment in that state. This law has met with popular approval, and there is no likelihood of any movement to restore the former status. Says Governor Eberhart:

The experiences of this and other states, as well as the verdict of most criminologists, agree on the question of abolishing capital punishment, and I am firmly convinced that there would be more convictions for murder in the first degree if either capital punishment were abolished or imposed only in extreme cases, and then only upon the order of the court or the unanimous recommendation of the jury. The old argument against its abolition on the ground that the board of pardons would frequently reduce the life sentence is amply refuted by the records of the state board of pardons.

I believe the interests of justice and humanity demand the repeal of the law and I am convinced that the state would secure more convictions in capital cases and that consequently crime in general would be reduced by the abolition of this antiquated practice in criminal procedure.

From Governor Lee Cruce, of Oklahoma:

Personally I am opposed to capital punishment. It would be very gratifying to me to see a law enacted in this state that would do away with this relic of more barbarous times.

I don't believe that capital punishment serves the purpose intended. It is certainly demoralizing to any community when a legal execution takes place, and it is contrary to and at war with every advanced principle of Christian government. The time will come, in my opinion, when every state in the Union will abolish this method of dealing with its convicted criminals.

Mr. WOODS: Whose time is being consumed?

Mr. DOTY: The time of the Convention.

Mr. ANDERSON: I asked unanimous consent and it was granted.

Mr. WOODS: I didn't hear it.

Mr. ANDERSON: You are thinking about those criminals.

The reading was continued.

From Governor Thos. R. Marshall, of Indiana:

Personally I am opposed to the infliction of capital punishment. My reason is that modern Christianity and statecraft each agree that the purpose of punishment is not revenge but the reformation of the lawbreaker. To take the life of a lawbreaker does not tend, in my judgment, to his reformation.

Life comes in a strange and mysterious way, we know not how. My blind belief is that He alone who gave has the right to take, and that the violation of this law by the individual does not justify the state in likewise violating it.

From Governor Oswald West, of Oregon:

Oregon has capital punishment, but a bill is being framed for submission to the people in November next to abolish capital punishment.

I do not believe in capital punishment, for the reason that it is wrong, and two wrongs can never make a right. Capital punishment is homicide, and homicide is murder, and it is just as wrong for a state to commit murder as it is for an individual. Capital punishment is not a deterrent of crime, but it is a deterrent of conviction. Besides, the theory of our law is not based on vengeance and vindictiveness, but upon the theory of reformation and the betterment of society. Capital punishment is a relic of barbarism handed down from the dark ages and it debases instead of uplifts society.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

These are a few of the reasons why I am opposed to capital punishment.

Governor Wm. C. McDonald of New Mexico, is entirely opposed to such a law, "for the reason that it is a barbaric and glaringly inconsistent method of meeting out justice. In the execution of the death sentence the state commits it seeks to wipe out or prevent."

Mr. WOODS: I rise to a point of order. The gentleman's time expired, and it takes the suspension of the rule to give him more time and that takes two-thirds. It looks to me like we are spending a lot of time listening to extracts from some governors' letters.

Mr. ANDERSON: There are only a few more sentences.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: If there is any question about it I move that Mr. Anderson's time be extended.

The reading was then concluded.

From Governor Eugene N. Foss, of Massachusetts:

I do not believe a law requiring the death penalty has any deterrent effects. This is a relic of barbarism; the state has no power to take away what it can not restore; we have no right to do collectively what we are forbidden to do individually.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the motion for the previous question. Shall the main question be ordered?

So the proposal, not having received the required majority, was lost.

Mr. Leslie arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 249 by Mr. Tannehill. His name was called and Mr. Leslie voted in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. King the Convention adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10:00 o'clock.

FIFTY-EIGHTH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, April 17, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. H. H. D. Sterrett, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. ANDERSON: I rise to a question of personal privilege and I would like to have the indulgence of the Convention for a few moments.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: All have seen in the newspapers that I had received a great deal of criticism from a gentleman from Dayton by the name of McMahon. I understand he is one of the very best citizens of Dayton, a lawyer of wide experience and an excellent man, and I do not wish in anyway to be understood as saying an abusive or critical thing of the gentleman personally. It seems he appeared in the supreme court in the trial of the case of the Oakwood Street Railway Company vs. Charles E. Marker, and in the trial of that case he saw fit to make an attack upon me. I say personal, because I have the typewritten copy of just what he said. It may seem strange, almost startling, for me to make the statement that I have a stenographic report of what the gentleman said. He has stated in this that he had an idle day in Columbus—and the idle day was the day before he argued the case in the supreme court and the day was used to make some examination of the Ohio State Reports. He not only took part of that idle day in examining some of the Supreme Court Reports, but he consumed a considerable part of it in having all the newspapers notified to have their representatives present at the trial of the case in the supreme court on the following day. I would not dare make the statement if I had not verified it and did not know it to be true. I am making it in the presence of the newspaper reporters. The managers of the papers were notified to have their newspaper reporters present in the supreme court. Now there is a rule in the supreme court and I will read it. When you go in there to argue a case and stand behind the little desk provided for that purpose you will find the rules of the supreme court open this way and it is a rule staring you in the face. I will read it to you. It is Rule III:

When a cause on the general docket is argued orally, the time allowed for each side shall not exceed one hour, unless, for special reasons to be adduced before the argument commences, the court shall extend the time, but this does not imply that counsel are expected to take an entire hour in presenting their side of every case. Many cases can be adequately presented in much less time, and the crowded condition of the docket makes it highly important that argument be confined to the shortest practical limit.

The part of the rule beginning "but that does not imply" down to the end of the rule is italicized. Consequently, you see the place where this performance was held was a place where the rules of the supreme court italicized and emphasized that those who had business there must consume as short a time as possible because of the fact that the supreme court is behind months and months in their hearings and determination of cases.

That did not seem to influence the gentleman to any great extent, and I want to say that had this personal attack been made anywhere else I would have paid no attention to it. I am an officer of the courts of Ohio because I have been admitted to practice law. Really, it is my bread and butter, and had he properly quoted me of course I could not have made any reply and would not have attempted it.

I will read you the first one of his statements:

A member of the Constitutional Convention has recently stated in that body, as an argument for robbing this court of the bulk of its jurisdiction, that he had examined thirty-four cases reported by the supreme court, in which thirty-three were reversed in favor of corporations. He supplemented the remark with the statement that it was "no poor man's court."

In other words, Mr. McMahon told the supreme court that this Convention was robbing it, the supreme court, by reason of the passing of the Peck proposal. "Robbing" is the word. Then he stated to them, using my name later on, that I said I had examined thirty-three or thirty-four supreme court cases and in those supreme court cases thirty-three had been decided in favor of corporations and only one in favor of the individual. That was an asinine remark for any one to make. There are more cases of that kind decided for corporations in any one volume of the reports, and yet the gentleman stated to the supreme court, and based his whole argument on the fact, that I had said for a period of fifteen years thirty-four cases had been decided where the rights of the individual was on one side and the corporation on the other.

This is what I stated, and you will remember it if you paid any attention to it at the time, that I was desirous of finding out to what extent, if the Peck proposal had been the law in the last ten or fifteen years, it would have made a change in a certain class of cases where the individual was on one side and a corporation on the other side and where the circuit court had been reversed by the supreme court, where in the circuit court the individual had won and the corporation lost and the case had been reported. Now in that class of cases I stated that thirty-three cases where the individual had won in the circuit court and where the individual would have received his money if the Peck proposal had been law, had gone to the supreme court, had been reversed by the supreme court and had been reported. That is absolutely correct. I further stated—and I did not know it until a week ago, when I made the examination of the reports—that in the same period and within the same volumes of the reports the supreme court had reversed the circuit court once, and only once, when the corporation won below and an individual lost and the case was reported. And that is absolutely correct. In other words, that was the proportion of the reported cases, where the law is made and where that law can be used in future cases, where it can be used by the attorney in his office to determine whether or not an inquiring litigant has a case. Thirty-three cases were reported by the supreme court where they reversed the circuit court—where the individual had won below and lost above—and during that same time the supreme court made the law in one case for the individual. In other words, the ratio was thirty-two to one.

Now, so that the importance of reported cases may be understood, I want to take a little time and I am sorry to have to take this much time of the Convention, which is valuable, but I am deeply interested. It means considerable to me long after this Convention adjourns if I permit an attack of that kind to go unchallenged. I want to say I have more confidence in the supreme court than the gentleman who saw fit to make the attack, because I believe the supreme court, so long as the truth is told and so long as muckraking is not resorted to, would not in any way hold that against me in the future in trying cases before them. I have that much confidence in the six men who sit over there and constitute the highest court in Ohio. But it seems that this gentleman, having a very desperate case, and I will get to that in a minute, saw fit to try to curry favor with them to influence them by fulsome praise and by coming out unsolicited as a defender of the supreme court when it needed no defense. He hoped that this case, in which he was interested, might be decided in his favor. But to go back to the importance of reporting cases.

Assume for the sake of argument that my friend Donahey's boy runs down to one of the turn tables in the railroad's yard near Donahey's house. The boy is with other boys; he is of a playful nature and he gets upon the turntable; the other boys turn him and it swings and catches the boy's leg and crushes it and the boy loses his leg. The railroad company has known for a long time before that the children would congregate there and use that turntable. They had not expended a dime for the purpose of locking it. They took no precaution and exercised no care in protecting the children. Suppose Donahey was to come to me and tell me the facts. I would say "I will look up the law" and I would pick up "Thompson on Negligence—

Mr. TAGGART: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. TAGGART: The point is that one member of the Convention can not arrogate to himself all the time of the Convention in an endeavor to vindicate himself.

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule that the member is in order, but is speaking under the rule which limits addresses of this kind to fifteen minutes unless the Convention extends the time.

Mr. TAGGART: I would respectfully appeal from that decision.

Mr. ANDERSON: If that is the desire of one member of this body, I do not wish to be heard. If the gentleman will permit me, however, it means a great deal to me as a lawyer.

Mr. HENDERSON: I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

There were several seconds.

Mr. ANDERSON: Here is page after page of abuse, not only of myself, but of the Convention. But I am not trying to defend the Convention.

Mr. RILEY: Has that been published?

Mr. ANDERSON: All over the country there have been extracts made from it.

Mr. RILEY: But has that been published?

Mr. ANDERSON: No.

Mr. TAGGART: Was my appeal put?

The PRESIDENT: Was there a second to it?

Mr. MARRIOTT: I seconded it.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is made. The president rules the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] was in order and an appeal was taken. The question is, Shall the decision of the president be sustained? As many of you as are in favor of sustaining the decision of the president will say aye and the contrary no.

The decision of the president was sustained.

Mr. ANDERSON: I will read only from the part the newspapers have sent broadcast.

Mr. DWYER: I would like to ask the gentleman from Mahoning if that turntable case is not a very old case, decided years ago?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; it is in 77 Ohio State.

Mr. DWYER: You are going back into past history?

Mr. ANDERSON: I will not use that. All I wanted to say is that these United States reports before me are reports going back to 1874.

Mr. DWYER: Was not the torpedo case decided since then?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; I am familiar with that. The point I was making was the importance of reporting decisions. All of these cases laid down under the circumstances stated, where the little boy was injured by lack of care, that the boy's father or next friend or guardian could recover damages, yet in 77 O. S., page 243, it was held, although the policy, just as Judge Dwyer suggests, had been up to that time held in the torpedo case that the boy could not recover, that the railroad company owed him no duty. The point I make is that settles the law in Ohio in all the other cases where children are injured, and thus the importance of a case being reported.

Mr. DWYER: Now, will you pardon me? I would like to suggest that under the Ferguson law that made the legislature in this state a nuisance for years in passing special legislation and holding it general, that if the supreme court had not reversed itself and held those laws unconstitutional—

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman's time is up.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that we extend his time.

On motion the time of the gentleman was extended.

Mr. ANDERSON: Judge Dwyer, my time is limited.

Mr. DWYER: I just wanted to ask if the supreme court had not entirely reversed itself in the Ferguson case?

Personal Privilege.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, and it ought to have done it long ago. That was on the question of class legislation with reference to cities.

Mr. PECK: Was not the trouble under that induced by the original rule, which was wrong?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; I did not care to go into that. The supreme court was responsible for the very situation and it had to remedy it at last.

The gentleman says in this report that he had gone over these reports in an "idle day." If he had taken time in that "idle day" to have spoken to any one of the gentlemen from Montgomery any one of them could have obtained a typewritten copy of my speech, and he could have found what I did say, and consequently his criticism could not have been made with reference to myself or the Convention. It stated this, and I have taken an extract from the typewritten copy. Mr. McMahon stated that I had made an attack on the floor of this Convention on the supreme court because I said it was controlled by outside influences and returned judgments because of influences on the outside. This is what I stated:

Mr. ROCKEL: Do you mean to say that the supreme court is influenced in some way?

Mr. ANDERSON: I certainly do not mean to say that they are affected in any way by any outside influence, but I do want to say, for if I did not answer you it might be said that I could not, that I have represented individuals for twenty years in all kinds of courts and in ninety per cent of such cases I have been on the side of the individual fighting a corporation. I do not deserve any credit for it; I got paid for it. My employment has necessarily caused a habit of thought and I admit that I am prejudiced. It could not be otherwise, and I could not divest myself of that habit of thought or that prejudice by being elected judge and going upon the bench. I would be inclined to see all of the circumstances in a favorable light to the plaintiff's interest, or in trying to be fair, knowing my prejudice, I would lean too far the other way. But I believe, notwithstanding my habit of thought and my prejudice, notwithstanding my over twenty years on the side of the individual, I could be as fair on the bench as any man who had twenty years or more training on the side of the corporation.

Mr. ROCKEL: Then we have put the wrong kind of men on the supreme bench?

Mr. ANDERSON: If you agree with me that I would be the wrong kind of a man to be placed on the bench, then you must agree with me that men of long corporation training, men who have specialized in favor of corporations, are also the wrong kind of men to place on the bench.

If that be an attack on the supreme court, I made it, but if it is true that men must respond to their environment, if they must become part of it, then it is not an attack upon the supreme court. The gentleman in the newspaper stated that the jurors are sympathetic to a degree that warps their judgment, and judges, in view of the assaults of socialists and labor unions, lose their nerve, and it is left to this tribunal to finally dispose of the case on its merits and according to law.

In other words, Mr. McMahon told the supreme court the jurors could not be trusted; that they were warped by sympathy and could not return a fair verdict; that a judgment in a common pleas court and the judges on the common pleas bench were not fair; that they were influenced by socialists and labor unions; that the judges on the circuit court bench were influenced by socialists, labor unions and the common rabble, and consequently the only place he could get justice was in the supreme court.

Now, a word upon the kind of case the gentleman was representing. Six years ago this May a man by the name of Marker was crippled for life while working for the street railway company in Dayton. He was told by a man named Disney to go in between the tracks and couple a car to the one he, Disney, was on. Marker got in there to make the coupling, and Disney, because he was drunk, ran the other car down and crashed into him and made him a cripple for life. Six years ago this coming May that accident happened. It was shown by six witnesses—I wish I could go into the record; I have read it carefully—it was shown by six witnesses that this man Disney had been in the employ of the railway company for a long while; that he had been a drunkard and was drinking around his work and frequently was so drunk that he couldn't perform it; that this drunken condition was known to the president of the road long before the accident happened; that the president permitted that drunken man to work there and by reason of the condition of that drunken man Marker was injured for life.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Was the case you are referring to decided?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; it was just submitted the other day.

Mr. MARRIOTT: What can be your idea in referring to the facts? Are you anticipating the supreme court will affirm the lower court?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I have no interest in the outcome of the case at all. I make this point: I have read from that which Mr. McMahon said before the supreme court where he stated that the judges below—there were several of them—could not be trusted with the trial of the case, and further that the common pleas judge who had decided against the corporation lost his nerve because of socialists and labor unions; that the circuit court which had decided against the gentleman could not be trusted because they had lost their nerve owing to the rabble, and he said they had lost their nerve because they decided the street railway company was to blame for retaining in its employ this man who had been repeatedly drunk around his work and whose drunkenness and insobriety were known to the president long before Marker was injured for life. That is the point I am trying to make.

In conclusion, I want to say this, because I shall not have an opportunity to go into this as I wish: If any attack is made upon any of you men I shall help you, if that attack be unjust, instead of trying to prevent a proper explanation being made. I thank you.

Mr. HALFHILL: I would ask the indulgence of the Convention on the same matter of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I would like to ask a question, Mr. President—

Personal Privilege.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] has the floor.

Mr. HALFHILL: I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT: Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I would like to ask a question, with the gentleman's permission.

Mr. HALFHILL: I do not care to yield.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman does not yield.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I would like to ask him a question before he begins.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Allen has the floor and he can not be interrupted save on a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I do not want to make a point or order, but I believe this whole matter is out of order. Still I will not make the point.

Mr. HALFHILL: The only reason I ask the indulgence of the Convention upon this particular point is that in a report of a short debate upon an amendment to Proposal No. 184, which occurred during last week, I referred to the statement of the gentleman from Mahoning and I characterized it in language that was equally forcible, if less elegant than that of my friend Hon. John A. McMahon, as shown by the records of the Convention. I was not called to account for that at the time, and I expressly used the words that the argument of thirty-three cases that were cited here as decided in favor of corporations and one against, in a specific number of reports, without stating the further fact of all the hundreds of cases that were decided against corporations, reported and unreported, was a slander upon the supreme court of Ohio. Now if I state a thing like that in open debate in this Convention and am not called to account for it, or it is not in any way refuted, I should not stand here and listen to a charge against a man like John A. McMahon, who has no peer in the state of Ohio as a lawyer, and not say a word in his behalf.

Mr. PETTIT: Mr. President, it is apparent that the gentleman is not rising to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HALFHILL: I insist it is a question of privilege and I intend to read into this record what I said.

The PRESIDENT: Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. PETTIT: Yes. It appears from the gentleman's statement that he is not appearing here and addressing us now in his own behalf, but on behalf of Mr. McMahon.

Mr. HALFHILL: The reflection in the address this morning is a reflection on me, and that is why I rise to a question of personal privilege. If in discussing this subject I must discuss Mr. McMahon incidentally, I see no objection to it. Now, I want to read—

Mr. PETTIT: I insist on my point of order. . .

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule that the gentleman is in order, but is speaking under the rule that limits his address to five minutes.

Mr. HALFHILL: I want to read a portion of Mr. McMahon's address that is applicable to my own statement made to this Convention after the preliminary statement that was read by Mr. Anderson. He said:

Before proceeding to figures let me state a few preliminary facts, necessary to their proper understanding.

Our reports of cases decided in this court contain two classes. One class embraces cases that are fully reported. These are cases that are, as a rule, reversed, and the court gives its reasons for overruling the lower court. The other class embraces decisions in which the court, as a rule, gives no opinion. These cases are generally cases in which the supreme court affirms the lower court without report giving its reasons.

The fully reported cases are generally under the practice of the court, cases in which the lower courts are overruled. In order to arrive at the work of this court, however, one should consider all the cases decided by it, not merely those reported in full.

That is just the language that I used.

And it is in the failure to put the two classes of cases together that Mr. Anderson has insidiously (I wish I could say innocently) spread abroad a base slander upon the members of this court.

Mr. ANDERSON: The gentleman says that is just the language he used. Have you read a report of what you said?

Mr. HALFHILL: I have, practically.

Mr. ANDERSON: You have not stated it. I have it before me. You didn't make that statement. I say it flatfooted. You did not do it.

Mr. HALFHILL: I say that practically I did.

Bearing in mind the above explanation let us look into the last three volumes of the reports of this court. They are volumes 82, 83 and 84, beginning with the January term of 1910.

In volume 82 there are thirteen fully reported cases in which corporations, big and little, were interested. In three of those the corporation lost. In one corporations were on both sides. In the others a corporation won.

But when you examine the decided but unreported cases in which corporations, big or little, figured, you find that the corporations won forty-four, but lost forty-eight.

In volume 83 we find eleven fully reported cases in which corporations were interested. The corporation won eight but lost three.

But when you turn to the decided but not fully reported cases, you find that the corporation won twenty-nine but lost fifty-two.

In volume 84 we find thirteen cases fully reported in which corporations were interested. The corporation won in seven, lost in three, and in the eleventh both parties were corporations.

When you turn to the decided but not fully reported cases we find that the corporation won in twenty-six but lost in thirty-nine.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you permit me to read just what you said?

Mr. HALFHILL: I will read it if I can find it.

Mr. ANDERSON: It is not there, not anything like it. It is entirely plain and you are deliberately stating something that is not true.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now I will prove it.

Mr. ANDERSON: I mean just what I say.

Personal Privilege.

Mr. HALFHILL: I say I will read it if I am given time to do it.

Mr. ANDERSON: Don't you want to do right—won't you read it now?

Mr. HALFHILL: Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then read it and show what it was.

The time of the gentleman here expired.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that the gentleman's time be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON: I second that motion.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HALFHILL: This is not the matter at all. This is not what I referred to in my remarks a while ago.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you not do me the justice to read this?

Mr. HALFHILL: That is not what I refer to at all.

Mr. ANDERSON: Could there be any mistake?

Mr. PECK: I think this whole matter is out of order. I do not believe in any of this proceeding. I propose to offer a rule that hereafter no member shall be allowed to rise to a question of privilege on anything said outside, and if he proposed to raise a row about anything said in the Convention it must be done the same day. This thing of bringing personal controversies in here and occupying our time is too much of a waste of time and is an outrage upon the rest of us.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member make a point of order?

Mr. PECK: Yes; I make it now.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order seems to be the same point that has heretofore been made, that it is not a question of privilege. The president has ruled that it was, but would be glad to hear an appeal from the decision so the Convention could decide the matter.

Mr. PECK: I certainly think you are wrong.

The PRESIDENT: Does the member appeal from the decision of the chair?

Mr. PECK: I certainly do.

Mr. HALFHILL: My time has been extended.

Mr. DOTY: As a general proposition we are all in sympathy with what Judge Peck says. The statement of the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] has been challenged right here now, and I for one do not propose to vote to prevent the member from Allen from either correcting the statement he has made or answering the charge made against him.

Mr. PECK: I don't think there was any charge made against him. He volunteered in defense of Mr. McMahon.

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: There is a question before the Convention.

Mr. LAMPSON: I moved that the gentleman from Allen be given fifteen minutes of the time and it was accorded him.

Mr. DOTY: I have the floor to talk to the appeal.

The PRESIDENT: The member has the floor.

Mr. DOTY: I want to call attention to the exact situation we are in. As I heard the matter—I may be mistaken—the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] made a statement and the member from Mahoning challenged the truthfulness of that statement.

Mr. WINN: When was the last statement made?

Mr. DOTY: Just a moment ago.

Mr. WINN: Is that a question of privilege?

Mr. DOTY: The thing is in such shape that I do not want to withhold from the member of Allen the opportunity to answer that charge.

Mr. WINN: I understood the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] rose to a question of personal privilege and undertook to defend himself against an attack made upon him by some person some other place than in the Convention. Then the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] rose to a question of personal privilege and his claim of personal privilege is one to defend the supreme court. Is that right?

Mr. DOTY: I want to answer the member.

Mr. PETTIT: That is all it is.

Mr. DOTY: The whole matter has gotten along further than that. The member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] has made a statement that the whole thing should not have been allowed, but it was allowed and the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] has gotten to a place where his present statement is challenged here and now. I do not know which is right, but I believe the member from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] thinks the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] should have a right to answer that challenge.

Mr. WINN: But do you understand the member from Allen has the floor upon the claim of the right to do so as a matter of personal privilege?

Mr. DOTY: That is true, of course.

Mr. WINN: And the challenge of that personal privilege is made by appeal?

Mr. DOTY: The member has not stated it exactly right. We are up against this situation right here and now, no matter what else can be said. He did have the floor and it was on a question of personal privilege. There is no question about that, and now his statement is challenged, and we are going to listen to his vindication. I don't think we ought to cut him off.

Mr. LAMPSON: The gentleman has been given by a vote of the Convention fifteen minutes in which to state his question of privilege and the only ruling the chair can make is to confine him to a statement of privilege.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order has been made that the member proceeding under this rule is out of order.

Mr. LAMPSON: The chair can confine him within the rule, but he has his fifteen minutes. The president has ruled that the member is in order, but an appeal has been taken from that decision.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, and the question is now only whether the decision shall be sustained.

A vote being taken and a division being demanded seventy-two rose in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT: The chair is sustained. The member from Allen has the floor.

Mr. STOKES: The members of this Convention are here to transact business. I, therefore, move that this matter be made a special order for Friday afternoon at two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Allen has the floor.

Mr. HALFHILL: Gentlemen, this is the matter I had in mind which I asserted upon the floor of this Convention and which I thought was a matter that demanded of me some statement here this morning. I said I had practically stated what the Hon. John A. McMahon had stated in the supreme court and for which he is taken to task. I did so state and I now refer to page 4335 of the transcript of the official reporter, in which the gentleman from Mahoning, who had just left the floor, asked me some questions on a matter then pending, and in answer to those questions I said:

Personal Privilege — Abolition of Capital Punishment.

And the question that has gone through the courts of Pennsylvania or any other state of the Union cuts no figure in the discussion and is quite beside the point. This is the sovereign state of Ohio and you are making fundamental laws for it, and I point to a condition which seems to me ought to be apparent to any man who is not biased or prejudiced to the extent of desiring that the supreme court of the state of Ohio should be shackled by a rule that should not be inflicted upon any court. What this proposal ought to do is to fix the rule that a majority of the courts shall control, and I say unless you do it, you will live to see the day when this hysteria, this attack upon the courts, made here, will be a thing to rise up and plague you. It is the courts of Ohio and courts of the country that we owe the liberties of the country. They protect the liberties of the country and the rights of the individual. And these cases that have been cited here, some thirty in number, to show that individual rights have been transgressed by the supreme court of Ohio are a slander upon the courts of the state of Ohio unless you take into account the hundreds of other cases where the rights of the individual have been fully and fairly protected by holding statutes unconstitutional, and I can cite a number of them right here in these reports.

Now upon that point I claim that the assault made here upon McMahon is an assault upon me as a member of the Convention and it should have been answered in debate if I was not right, and inasmuch as I am correct in that I made that statement in debate I believe it is within my rights and privileges to make the remarks I have made. I thank the Convention.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman read the full explanation of the question which occurred in debate when you asked the question? Will you not do me that justice? Will you read this? [Handing the member from Allen some papers.]

Mr. HALFHILL: Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON: I was not speaking about that at all.

Mr. HALFHILL: This is entirely another portion of debate.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you read it?

Mr. HALFHILL: I will not. It is entirely another portion of debate.

Mr. KING: I move that we proceed with the regular order.

Mr. PIERCE: I move a reconsideration of the vote on Proposal No. 62.

Mr. DOTY: I second the motion.

Mr. WOODS: Gentlemen of the Convention: I want to call your attention to the statutes of Ohio on this proposition as they are, right now. First, I want to make the point that I made yesterday that this is purely a statutory matter. There is not a thing in the constitution about the matter. It is all taken care of by statute. Now if you put a provision in the constitution that capital punishment shall be abolished, where are you going to leave our present criminal statutes? For instance, take section 12400 of the General Code, which provides:

Whoever, purposely, and either of deliberate and premeditated malice, or by means of poison, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape, arson, robbery or burglary, kills another is guilty of murder in the first degree and shall be punished by death unless the jury trying the accused recommend mercy, in which case the punishment shall be imprisonment in the penitentiary during life.

Are you repealing part of that section and leaving the rest of it in existence? This is a matter you want to think about. We want to leave the statutes of this state in such shape that we can prosecute men who commit murder. Every attorney here knows that whenever we try a man for murder it is a technical crime and you have to prove every element of your case to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt. Now you are going to have a mix-up in every trial and a statute conflicting with the provisions of the constitution. I say to you, and I am willing to submit it to the fairness of any lawyer in the body, if you abolish capital punishment it should be done by statute and not by the constitution. You will make an awful mistake when you do it in the constitution.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose this were submitted to the people and the people vote on it the first of September next and adopt it. What would be the condition of criminals charged with murder in the first degree between the first of September and the time the legislature would meet?

Mr. WOODS: I don't know what the condition would be, but the first man convicted for murder in the first degree would raise the point and probably would get off by it.

Mr. THOMAS: Can that not be taken care of in the schedule?

Mr. WOODS: I don't know. You are dealing with something different. Every lawyer knows it only takes a little doubt in a murder case to bring about an acquittal by the jury. Now I want to call your attention to the present condition of the statutes in Ohio. Just remember what we have to prove in this state in order to convict a man of murder:

1. That the person assaulted is dead.
2. That the person alleged was the person killed.
3. That the accused struck or assaulted the deceased at the time and place alleged.
4. That the striking was with the instrument alleged in the indictment, or with any other instrument capable of producing death in a similar manner.
5. That death was caused by the blows inflicted by the accused.
6. That the accused did the act purposely and of deliberate and premeditated malice.
7. Venue.

And everyone of those you have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt. I submit to you, gentlemen, that the statutes of this state simply go to the utter limit, the clear limit. You can not electrocute me for committing murder in the state of Ohio under existing law unless I deliberately plan it all out beforehand to murder somebody. I have got murder in my heart, and I have had it there for some time. It has all been planned. The word "deliberate" is used in the statute and I submit to you, gentlemen, that the Constitutional Convention of Ohio in 1912, ought not to deliberately put something in the constitution that is a statutory matter in order to save the lives of men who will deliberately plan to take the life of another.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. FACKLER: I think the proposal should be changed in a slight form. If we adopt it as it is and what we do is ratified, all criminals charged with first degree murder could not be punished until the legislature fixed the punishment for the crime. If this proposal is reconsidered I have an amendment to submit which I think will remove that objection, and will make the punishment for first degree murder the same as that provided now when a recommendation for mercy is given.

Mr. WINN: I want to call your attention to section 1 of the schedule of the constitution of 1851, and I think it is manifest to every person that something similar to this must be enacted by this Convention. That section reads as follows:

All laws of this state, in force on the first day of September one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, not inconsistent with this constitution shall continue in force, until amended, or repealed.

Therefore you can see that before we conclude our work here we must of necessity pass something to keep in force the laws now in force; otherwise most of the proposals already agreed upon would create great confusion. I think the objection of the member from Medina [Mr. Woods] should not have any weight here because eventually in taking care of all the other proposals we will of necessity take care of this one by providing that the laws shall continue until the legislature shall alter them.

Mr. TALLMAN: I am opposed to tying the hands of the legislature as long as this constitution shall stand. I think legislatures that meet after the adoption of the work of this Convention—at least some one of them—will have a chance, whenever there is a great public demand, to do away with capital punishment. That public demand has never yet in my judgment arisen, and in my judgment it is extremely foolish for us to assume that this Convention can legislate, because it is nothing but a matter of legislation which the legislature could pass. The legislature could pass a bill similar to this proposal at any of its sessions within the next thirty, forty or fifty years. They would have it in their own hands. What you propose to do is to tie their hands so that no matter what the circumstances or condition may be in the future they can not act. Now what condition way arise? Even when we have capital punishment mobs often take the law into their own hands. How much more readily will they do it in aggravated cases where there can not be capital punishment inflicted by law? I say mob rule will increase one-half.

Then again why should the state burden itself with the care of a man who deliberately and premeditatedly takes the life of his fellow man. Why should a taxpayer keep him in durance vile and be at the expense of his board, at the expense of taking care of him in some way, in order to protect society? That time has not arrived yet and I don't think it ever will arrive.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Would not your argument apply as well to a man who commits burglary? Why should we take care of and board and feed and confine a man who commits burglary?

Mr. TALLMAN: A man doesn't have to commit burglary with premeditation. Here is what I object to: It being so thoroughly a matter of legislation, why do we arrogate to ourselves that this one hundred and nineteen members know more of the circumstances and conditions of society, and what society will need for the next thirty or forty years, than any legislature that will convene in all that time? Why should we tie the hands of the legislature during all that period? Have we all that superior wisdom?

Mr. KRAMER: Is not that whole section there purely legislative? Is not this legislative: "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and inhuman punishment inflicted, nor shall life be taken as a punishment for crime," etc. Is not that part we are attempting to add directly in harmony with all the rest of the section?

Mr. TALLMAN: It is in a measure legislation, but it establishes the principle that for the minor crimes bail can always be given and that right can not be cut off by the legislature. It is elementary in its nature, and for that reason is not legislative although it is found in legislation, and it takes care of the rights of innocent men who were kept out of prison before trial.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I used to feel, taking a broad view of the matter, that it was more humane to abolish punishment, until recently, when I began to study the matter. Since then I have changed my mind. In view of the statute requiring such an overwhelming proof of guilt that it is practically impossible to convict an innocent man of murder in the first degree, I believe we are perfectly safe so far as conscience is concerned, and I think there are many criminals in this state and in many states who would make it a business to submit to impulse to murder inherent in their characters if they knew there was no punishment for it beyond imprisonment for life. I believe we ought to have some way of adequately repressing unrestrained impulse to murder.

Mr. WINN: Do you think a provision of a statute or of a constitution inflicting a death penalty would have deterred that negro from committing that crime?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I think the negro under our constitution would indulge his proclivities—

Mr. WINN: What is your notion about what stimulated him?

Mr. BROWN of Highland: His natural depravity, the very thing we are trying to guard against and rid ourselves of, the untrammelled use of the impulse of natural depravity to commit murder.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: "Vengeance is mine" saith the Lord. I trust that this Convention will make the proposal of the member from Butler [Mr. PIERCE] part of the fundamental law so that it may be a clarion cry to our sister states, who have not adopted similar measures, and to the civilized world that the Fourth Constitutional Convention of Ohio is not only progressive in matters political, but is also progressive along the lines of broad humanity and that greater civilization which is touching us. To hold man responsible on account of his environment, or by reason of heredity or by reason of some creative power for which he was in no way responsible and can not control, though the individual man may be a brute, is not humane, and it is time that society refuses longer to be brutal. All of the statutes of the world will not prevent a man whose brain is beyond his control from committing crime, nor will they deter any of the other individuals sufficiently weak from committing crime. A civilized state ought to say that on account of the individual's mental weakness, and on account of the creative power to which he did not contribute and which he can not control, it will refuse longer to act as the carnivora by taking human life. Let us discard the brutality of judicial murder and show that we are really and truly created in the image of God.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Mr. READ: I would like to say in corroboration of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] and in opposition to the gentlemen from Medina [Mr. WOODS], Belmont [Mr. TALLMAN], and Highland [Mr. BROWN], who regard this as not being a constitutional matter, that it is a fundamental principle. The statute law deals with details and we will arrange for these afterwards, but here we are laying down the fundamental principle that belongs to the constitution. It is just as fundamental as the other part of the clause about bail and punishment, etc., which are found in the old constitution.

It is my judgment that no one proposal the Convention can pass will be more commendatory of its wisdom or greater proof of its progressiveness than the passage of this proposal to abolish capital punishment.

It is repugnant to the moral sense, debasing to the nature of man, to stain his hands with the life-blood of his fellowman. The sacredness of human life and the safeguards which should be thrown around it to protect it from the murderer require the most careful and stringent provisions. It is well that the wisdom of the ages should be invoked to help blot out this iniquity.

It is not true that capital punishment deters from the commission of crime. The sight of a dozen scaffolds or a hundred electrocuting chairs will not prevent a man from committing murder. That has been the experience and is the statement of those who have charge of prisoners and who know much more than we do about this matter.

It is an important question—What shall we do with the depraved wretch who, in anger, with malice, or from fear, cruelly kills his victim? Shall we in turn kill him and descend to his depth of infamy? Or shall we consign him to the gloom and monotony of prison life that he may drag out a miserable existence, held by the chains his own misdeeds have forged, where, conscience-stricken, forsaken and doomed to hard labor, he may work out the effects of his wrongdoing until his forfeit is paid? Is it not better that he should thus pay the penalty of his crime than the state, in cool and deliberate repetition of his crime, should murder him?

For the state of Ohio to discard a practice that imposes a demoralizing function on the executors of its law would be to remove a great stumbling block from the legal pathway to a broader justice and more advanced civilization.

We read in the archives of the past that the earliest forms of punishment were prompted by the idea of vengeance, but as broader and wiser views of life and the causes leading to law violations became better understood, the idea of retaliation and retribution began to make way for the theories of prevention and reformation. Now it is well established in the minds of philanthropic, thoughtful men that the chief aim of all punishment should be reformation, not revenge.

The advocates of capital punishment sometimes quote to us from Holy Writ that "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed." It should be borne in mind that this was merely a primitive and local regulation, a sort of license granted the friends of the dead victim to slay the slayer. It was superseded later, repealed, as it were, 850 years later, by a fundamental law, a command by Jehovah. It was given out on Mt. Sinai, in one short, distinct, decisive, imperative sentence, to Israel and to all the world. There was no exception made. It was sounded in thunder tones, midst fire and smoke to all the people and to all generations of men. To the individual, to the prosecutor, to the judge and jury, the highest tribunal of the land, the Lord said "Thou shalt not kill."

Will you, dare you, in defiance of divine decree thwart the purpose of the Almighty and arrest the development and redemption of a human soul? It is well that the magnitude of the responsibilities you ask the state to assume in taking a human life should give you pause.

Mr. PECK: I move the previous question.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the vote by which this proposal failed to pass be reconsidered?

Mr. WOODS: I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. DOTY: The previous question has been ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The point is not well taken. The motion to lay on the table was lost.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question now is, Shall the motion by which the proposal failed to pass be reconsidered?

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the proposal.

Mr. FACKLER: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After line 13 add the following: "Until otherwise provided by law, persons convicted of crimes heretofore punishable by death, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary during life."

Mr. McCLELLAND: I hesitate to enter upon the discussion of legal matter for fear that a farmer and ex-minister might make the same mistake in discussing law that the lawyers do when they attempt to discuss a biblical question. After listening to the discussion of the Bible by lawyers I was reminded of what Robert Burns said:

"Some books are lies
Frae end to end
And some great lies
Were never penned
E'en meenisters, they hae been kened
In holy rapture
A rousing whid at times to vend
And nail't wi Scripture."

That was humorous about the ministers because they don't so often make mistakes, but if Burns had been here yesterday and listened to the lawyers attempting scriptural quotations he might have put that same idea of his in poetical phrase and said:

E'en lawyers, they hae been kened
In legal rapture
A rousing whid at times to vend
And nail't wi Scripture.

But that would have been too near the bald facts to be humorous. It is a little surprising when the legal fraternity come to use scriptural arguments to see the perfect confidence which they assume that they understand the Scripture beyond dispute.

I shall not enter into any scriptural argument. There is not time for it in ten minutes, and where it was used for nearly half an hour, as it was yesterday, you could not expect to answer it in five or ten minutes, but the statements were made with such abandon, with such exaggeration, and with such freedom from accuracy as to be of little value it seems to me. But further than that, it was argued we are compelled to take this step and adopt this proposal in order that we may be progressive as told us yesterday. Now there are five states that have made this progressive step, and I think it was stated that all of the five adopted it over fifty years ago. The other forty-three states of the Union do not believe in it and have not adopted it, because they have not seen that it worked advantageously or was a wise provision in those states where it has been adopted. It seems to me it is rather hasty for us to assume that we are in the line of progress when those who have done it did it more than a generation ago, and the results there, even according to the quotations from letters of governors, gave, not judgment in regard to the provision of the constitution there, but their personal opinions only, and that without any chance for observance or comparison.

The question is not merely whether it is well to abolish capital punishment. I am not sure, were this a legislature and I had the honor to sit in the body and a bill was before the legislature to abolish capital punishment, that I should not vote for it. It appeals to me as to every kindly man in its behalf. There is a strong sentiment in its favor, but that is one thing and it is another thing to tie up the legislature for all time to come by a constitutional prohibition.

The legislature next winter can pass a law which will abolish capital punishment, and then if the state finds in the near future that it is not working well, that it is not producing good results, that mob law increases instead of diminishing, they may find it desirable to repeal the law, but if we put it in the constitution it can not be repealed.

Mr. EVANS: There are not as many people hung as ought to be. The number ought to be increased instead of diminished. I have visited in Pulaski and Carroll counties, Virginia, and I am acquainted with those people, and I am familiar with several characters which were in the terrible tragedy at Hillsville. I knew Judge Massie very well and knew him to be an upright, honest man, and everything that could be desired of a citizen. He was shot down in cold blood, and I believe that in a case of that kind to let a man off with his life would be abominable. The state of Ohio has been in existence one hundred and ten years, and we have had a fixed policy as to crime, that we leave the detection and punishment of it to the legislature. We have done that since 1802, and I am proud of the state of Ohio because there is no crime defined in the constitution. I am opposed to limiting or qualifying the police power of this state in this organic instrument we are about to make. The matter of defining and punishing crime ought to be left entirely to the legislature. I think it was all well enough to change from hanging to electrocution, but I am in favor of the retention of capital punishment. I say, don't let us mar the record of this Convention by putting anything in the constitution that infringes the exercise of the police power by the legislature. We should not limit the police power in the slightest degree. Let us keep up our proud, honorable history as a state in that respect. There was a great deal of mawkish sentiment manifested in this Convention about the question of woman's suffrage, and there was much more manifested on the question of capital punishment. I believe if a man commits crime he should be punished. I fully agree with the sentiment which would so manage society and its affairs as to prevent the commission of crime, but this Convention has frowned down on that method. I want to do away with this vote selling and vote buying. I thought it would help to do it if we had made an educational qualification for suffrage.

I considered that would be progression in the right direction, but you turned that down, and for the next hundred years we will have to deal with these people who sell and buy votes, and will have to be governed by political bosses who deal with us at their pleasure.

Now don't let us make another mistake. We made a mistake there and condemned ourselves to the rule of bosses and to buying and selling votes in perpetuity. Now let us in this particular follow the policy of the state for a hundred and ten years and not change it.

Mr. PECK: I again move the previous question.

DELEGATES: No.

Mr. PECK: If you want some more talk then I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT: The previous question has been regularly demanded, and we will take a vote on it.

The motion was lost.

Mr. DOTY: The mistakes of the Convention as viewed from Scioto county are somewhat like the mistakes of Moses—some of them never happen. The mistake to which the member from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] adverts and about which he is very much concerned, is not a mistake unless others of us agree as to restricted suffrage. If the member from Scioto has any idea or feeling that the votes of people can be purchased because they have not a school education, that is another matter. But I don't understand that anywhere in the state of Ohio the people convicted of vote selling have been particularly ignorant. Sometimes they were not.

But to come to this question: I have observed in the short time that I have been on earth that there is an element in the enforcement of law which seems to have been overlooked, and I don't think it is a question of religion or the interpretation of the Bible or the tremendous showing of what the lawyers have done for humanity. I think it is a question of whether the laws are certainly executed.

The member from Shelby [Mr. PARTINGTON] gave some statistics yesterday that are to my mind a very strong argument in favor of the abolition of capital punishment. He did not use the statistics to that end, but so far as I could judge they did not fit in with the able argument he made in support of his contention.

Mr. WOODS: Do you not think there is a whole lot of other criminal statutes that ought to be repealed?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. WOODS: Then start in and take them all out.

Mr. DOTY: Start in and if it is right I will vote to take them out and if it is wrong I won't. The member from Shelby [Mr. PARTINGTON] pointed out that one murderer out of three in England was executed for his crime, whereas in this country not to exceed one to one hundred or one to eighty or one to fifty-seven, or some big number. Does not that show to your mind that there is something the matter with the punishment, or with the certainty of punishment, or whatever it may be?

Mr. STALTER: I want to ask you if the penalty for all murders were execution, and if the illustration as given is the difference between first and second degree murder? Have you given in your figures both first and second degree murders?

Mr. DOTY: Who used them?

Mr. STALTER: The illustration you gave from the gentleman of Shelby.

Mr. DOTY: I do not understand what he referred to or just how you are going to divide his statistics, but I undertake to say that the punishment for crime is more certain in England than here, and I say to you it is the certainty of punishment that deters rather than the severity. That is just as true in Michigan and China and Ohio as it is in England. Certainty of punishment is what we should endeavor to secure. A very wise man has said that if you make the laws too sanguinary the juries will fail to convict. Many a time a jury fails to convict in a capital punishment case because they think the laws are too sanguinary. They don't want to hang a man.

Mr. WOODS: How about the recommendation for mercy?

Mr. DOTY: The recommendation for mercy is coupled with the execution of the law. That is something that shouldn't be allowed. The jury should not be allowed to say whether a man should be punished in one way or another. The jury should simply say "guilty" or "not guilty." The result of the whole thing is that we have nine thousand murders and only one out of fifty-seven of the murderers is executed, and we see juries, prosecuting attorneys and judges getting away from the sanguinary part. Don't forget that next Friday night there will be a man electrocuted in this city, and we are citizens of the state of Ohio.

Mr. JONES: It seems to me we are making a great mistake in reference to this matter for two reasons.

In the first place, it is purely a legislative matter. As I have heretofore said on other questions, there are some legislative matters proper to be dealt with in the constitution, but this is not one of them. Those matters about which there is no substantial differences of opinion among the people, fundamental rules and principles, even if of a legislative character, can be properly incorporated in the constitution. Those provisions intended simply to regulate the exercise of some power can also be properly included, but here you have a question of pure penalty for a specific crime and there is just as little reason for this bit of legislation as there is for legislation in the constitution in respect to any other specific crime.

Another thing, if this is to be a rule proper to embody in the fundamental law, it is likely to remain for fifty years, and we are tying up the people of the state no matter what the demand in the future may be so that they can not do what they want to do with regard to a penalty for a specific crime. It has been suggested here that the death penalty does not prevent crime. No penalty prevents crime, but does anybody or will anybody contend that the death penalty does not restrain the tendency to commit crime? Does not life imprisonment tend to restrain the tendency to commit crime? And if life imprisonment will tend to restrain the tendency to commit crime, if a man's life is more precious to him than his liberty, how can you say that the possibility of his being deprived of life will not restrain? If the matter is left in the hands of the legislature it will be what gentlemen constantly referred to in the discussion on the initiative and referendum, as the "shotgun behind the door." You don't have to use it unless you want, to, and you need not use it in any specific case unless the judgment of twelve men, who have had an opportunity to consider all the circumstances, after full deliberation and under a charge from the court, with all these safeguards that can be thrown around the exercise of judgment by any body of men, say the death penalty should be inflicted.

Can anybody say that under such circumstances it is liable to be an instrument of vengeance, that it is liable to be used wantonly or improperly? We all know that the great trouble with the administration of the criminal law in this country is to get enough convictions, to get a jury of a man's fellow citizens to find him guilty as often as they should. The great tendency is to run in the other direction, and the uncertainty of the execution and enforcement of law is the very thing, as referred to by the gentleman from Cuyahoga, that causes the great prevalence of crime in this country. It does not follow that because you have the power to inflict the death penalty that there is going to be any less certainty with regard to the administration of the law. Juries can go right along recommending mercy and life imprisonment will be inflicted instead of the death penalty. We have had too much mob law in this country. Some of you may remember a few years ago when thirteen lives were taken by the military in this state in defending a negro. What was the crime there? A woman had been outraged and the cry was that there was no adequate punishment. A man deliberately went to the house of a lone woman and assaulted her, and the righteous indignation of that community rose against him. That is typical of every community. They feel that under such circumstances the law provides no adequate punishment for the crime and they want to take the law into their own hands.

Mr. EARNHART: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: This matter has been discussed from all phases except one, and in the few minutes I have I want to travel in that direction. The whole matter resolves itself into one question.

The delegate from Warren [Mr. EARNHART] here yielded the floor to Mr. Elson who moved that the Convention recess until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

The motion was carried and the Convention recessed until the time indicated.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by the president and the gentleman from Warren [Mr. EARNHART] was recognized.

Mr. TALLMAN: I ask the member from Warren to yield. I want to ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. EARNHART: I yield.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Belmont asks unanimous consent to introduce a resolution. Is there objection? The gentleman from Belmont moves that the consideration of the pending proposal be postponed three minutes.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 105:

WHEREAS, The laws of Ohio provide that whoever in the night season maliciously and forcibly breaks and enters an inhabited dwelling house with intent to commit a felony shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary during life; and

WHEREAS, It appears to be the sense of the majority of this Convention that murder in the first degree should only be punished by imprisonment for life; therefore

Be it resolved by this Convention, That there is no substantial difference between the crime of burglarizing an inhabited dwelling during the night season and murder in the first degree.

The PRESIDENT: The resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I move that we resume consideration of the proposal which was pending when the resolution was offered.

The motion was carried and the delegate from Warren [Mr. EARNHART] was recognized.

Mr. EARNHART: The purpose of action on this matter should be wholly to diminish the commission of murder as much as possible. Taking that view of the matter, my own opinion is that when a man is executed it to some extent diminishes the value that ought to be set upon human life. We well remember that when we had public executions thousands or at least hundreds of people would congregate to see a criminal executed. That to my mind had a disastrous effect upon the morals of the community. I am satisfied in my own mind that this matter, as does every other example, carries great weight, and in order to diminish the number of murders we want to make it a matter of educational development and sentiment that will rise above that. Gentlemen to substantiate argument from this floor have seen fit to go back and quote from Scripture that when one man kills another his life ought to pay the penalty. I take it that there is more virtue in the present age and that we ought to confine ourselves to the present generation. I think in the matter of industrial activity, scientific research and the better conditions of morality we rise greatly above the ages to which the gentlemen have referred in order to substantiate arguments they have produced in favor of capital punishment. It seems to me the lesson is too plain. We remember when a few men were killed in the first skirmish of the Civil War what a thrill of horror it sent through every citizen of the nation, but after a while, when the big battles came on, unless there were twenty or thirty thousand men killed it was not thought to be much of a battle; the people became used to it; they expected it. You remember a day or two ago when the wires flashed the news and the newspapers published the account of the great steamship disaster how it thrilled the people? We had lost some of the feeling we had during the Civil War because we had partially recovered from it. Right along that line I want to say that when you abolish capital punishment and teach the people the importance of human life you will restrain men who would otherwise have it in their hearts to snuff out human life. I fully believe in the years gone by we have been setting an example that not only did not deter but that worked to the contrary. The dime novel gives instances in the "Wild West" when over a game of cards one man pulls out a pistol and kills another, and it educates the people to the opinion that human life does not amount to much anyway; so my whole argument is based upon the fact that when we rise above that ourselves we will lessen the evil results. Human tendencies are against it. We can see now that it is almost impossible to get a jury to convict a man for murder in the first degree without recommending mercy. We see it in the hearts of men, and properly so, and the assertion has been made upon the floor that it is purely a legislative matter. Whether that is so or not I do not care. I want this Convention to say to the people of the state of Ohio that we will rise above former conditions, and by this measure we will show not only to the people of the state of Ohio but to the people of other states as well, whose eyes are upon us now, that we are going to rise above present conditions. We are going to enlarge human conditions by placing in our laws a provision against capital punishment. I do not think I underrate the intelligence of the Convention to such a degree that it will not when the final vote comes, be on the side of humanity and right.

Mr. HAHN: Mr. President and Members of the Convention: I am in favor of the abolition of capital punishment. I believe in the sanctity of human life and I believe that every one of us, every citizen individually and the state collectively, should teach and preach the sanctity of human life. But as long as the state is the first murderer, as long as the state kills, what is the example set to us? There cannot be an idea that sanctity of human life is taught to our people when we ourselves kill. I believe my life under all circumstances is the most sacred and most inviolate possession that I have, and where is the man, where is the society, where is the state that has a right to divest me of it—to take from me my most sacred and most inviolable right? What is the state? The state is merely an agreement or contract which we enter into that the whole community shall be ruled according to a constitution. We have a right to concede to the state that it may take away under circumstances our substance, but we have no right to contract that it may take away our own life. If we say we have a right to take away our own lives it is pronounced the most immoral practice imaginable, and if we say we are in favor of the state taking away our lives, we are in favor of suicide. If I have not a right to take my own life no one else has, and I have no right to contract that anyone else shall. No principle of morality justifies me in taking my own life. It is a fundamental principle of society that I shall protect my life first of all, and consequently I have no right to give a right to the state which I do not possess, and the state has absolutely, according to all principles of morality and justice—no matter what the laws may be—no right to take the life of any individual.

We have heard about the Bible sanctifying the taking away of human life. My friends, the Bible has been misused whenever a great question was before the world. The Bible is the book of books, the greatest book in human literature. It is an inexhaustible source of religious sentiment, teaching and morality, but at the same time wherever there was a great issue one party always wants to take the Holy Book in its hands and defend its course by it, and so does the other party. The Bible is the grandest book imaginable, but in an age like this, where we have to develop civic morality and legal principles, the idea of revelation must not prevail. We must look at the Bible from the standpoint of evolution, from the standpoint of the historical development of the religious and moral genius that spoke to mankind. All of these laws at one time were excellent, but at the present many of the laws of the Bible are disregarded. Why do we stick to just this one law? You will find in that same Bible that man shall not shed blood. How many are there now that keep that commandment, and why do we want the other? My friends, it is inconsistency in our nature. On the one side we are for humanity and for righteousness and we shrink from doing wrong to anybody. We say love thy fellow man as thyself. On the other side we are in favor of the principle of revenge, for capital punishment is nothing else but revenge—fierce, brutal revenge. There is no justice, there is no morality, there is no humanity in it.

They consider the crime: Yes, gentlemen, there is heinous enormity in the crime of killing a person, but we must not always look merely at the enormity of the crime. We must sometimes consider the criminal himself. Who is the criminal? Why was not there a single word spoken here of kindness and humanity and sympathy for the criminal? Are all criminals depraved? Oh, no, my friends; there are criminals who are not themselves to blame that they are criminals. Is it our fault when we inherit consumption or cancer or insanity or shortsightedness or deafness or blindness? No more is it the fault of a great many criminals that they have criminal proclivities and that they were born with criminal eccentricities.

The time of the gentleman here expired.

Mr. REDINGTON: I am not in favor of capital punishment, but I am in favor of punishing severely any person who commits the crime of murder in the first degree. I am one of those who believe that we can devise ways and means whereby such a man can be punished sufficiently without taking his life. I think with solitary confinement or some other means we can provide something that will strike more terror to the heart of the average criminal than the fact that he takes only the chance of being electrocuted. We are seeking to prevent crime, and you will find you have not prevented crime although you have had upon the statute books for many years this particular mode of capital punishment.

I do not believe you have a right to take a man's life. Whether we can prove it or not we all believe that man is immortal, that he has a soul. If we were called to prove that, the wisest man could not prove it. He cannot prove the transmission of souls. He has to rely upon the revelation of the Good Book to prove that fact, and we all believe it, and if a man does have a soul what right have you to cut off his future without chance of reform? Are you so stingy that you cannot provide some home for this man in order that he may have some time to prepare himself for eternity?

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

I find members are basing some of their arguments on the Scripture. Scripture oftentimes is misused. I do not believe my Creator, who is all powerful and all wise, and a God of love, ever authorized that statement of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." I do not believe that my Creator ever authorized a story that He hardened Pharaoh's heart from time to time and caused pestilence and misery and the death of thousands and then by chicanery inveigled the Egyptians out into the bed of the Red Sea and drowned them like rats. I do not believe my Creator ever sent the wild bears from the woods to eat the children up because they called a prophet "old baldy." I believe those stories are libels. I believe the Creator was as wise ten thousand years ago as today, and you couldn't get the average man to do today what Jehovah sanctioned ten thousand years ago, according to some of those stories. You can quote them, but the next thing is to prove that our great Creator ever sanctioned them. I believe if you have a villain in your community who is so far devoid of good morals and good citizenship that he deliberately commits a murder, it is your duty to devise some punishment whereby you can not only reform the man but can strike terror to the hearts of others who would do likewise; but that you have any right to snuff out that life or send him into eternity without preparation I deny. I believe that the age and the time has come when we should take an advanced step and say that we will not be a party to a judicial murder. Who in this audience would willingly be an executioner? Who would willingly strike the fatal blow to snap out a human life? If you don't want to do it, why authorize anybody else to do it? I say to you, no matter how low a man is nor how guilty let him have his life and suffer with it until nature takes it from him.

Mr. FARNSWORTH: There is a bluff on the Maumee river near my home that has an interesting history. History tells us that in early days there were two friendly tribes of Indians camped near the bluff. The braves would go out into the forest to hunt while the children played around the wigwams and the squaws performed the labor incident to the family. One day by some mischance a child fell over the bluff into the river and was killed. Is so happened that the wife belonged to one of the tribes and the husband was a member of the other. When the husband returned at nightfall he was very much incensed at what he considered the neglect of his wife in not attending to the child, and, taking advantage of the Indian law, based no doubt on the Mosaic law, he in turn pushed her over the precipice to her death. Her friends in the other tribe, believing in reciprocity, took the first opportunity to kill him, and so the barbarism continued until the civil authorities had to take a hand. That was the Indian law of a death for a death. Shall we, in spite of our boast of higher civilization, lower ourselves to the barbaric level of killing one man because he has killed another?

There are other phases that have been overlooked. You have spoken of the effect on the man who is executed. Have any of you stopped to think of the jurors? Have any of you ever been one of the jurors who sent a man to death? If you have been, do you care to repeat the experience? Does not that feeling have a tendency to keep the best and most civilized men from jury service?

I myself believe that in the near future we shall evolve some plan of reforming as well as punishing convicted criminals. I believe that punishment should be twofold, punitive and reformatory. Oftentimes it is not the criminal's fault entirely; often his ancestors have had something to do with it. Human nature is not wholly bad. There is a chance to reform every one. A man may change his course in a moment, but he must have time to reform. I believe it is a duty we owe to a community to give every convicted criminal abundant opportunity to reform, and I have ample faith that at some time in the near future we may devise something that will reform as well as punish.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: A great many years ago God handed out the law to Moses. He gave the Ten Commandments and among the ten was this: "Thou shalt not kill." That is all I have to say on this question.

Mr. ANTRIM: Last Friday when I returned home I took this proposal with me because I knew it was coming up this week and I wanted to vote intelligently on it. When I returned home I was not decided as to how I should vote, and so I took several hours on Saturday to look up some statistics and read one or more excellent articles on the subject, and I want to say that after I had finished my reading and my investigation and had given the subject some thought, I decided that the wise thing to do was to vote to abolish capital punishment.

We have heard one argument repeatedly on the floor of this Convention and that is if we retain capital punishment it will exercise a deterring influence on the criminally inclined. I do not believe it. Statistics show it is not true. Take the state of Maine. The statistics of Maine have been very carefully collected and we learn that during the twenty years preceding the time when they abolished capital punishment there were two hundred and fifty or two hundred and sixty homicides. During the twenty-three years following that period, when they didn't have capital punishment, the number of murders went down to a hundred and thirty-five and that, in spite of the fact that during the latter twenty-three years the population was much greater than during the first twenty years.

Another thought. In the years from 1880 to 1883 there were twenty-six murders committed in the state of Maine. That was when they had capital punishment. In 1883 capital punishment was abolished and the number went down from twenty-six to eighteen. That proves that capital punishment in that state did not exercise a deterring influence on the criminally inclined.

Another point: One of the saddest things about the whole matter is that the innocent must suffer with the guilty. We have heard a great deal said in the course of this debate that most murders are committed among the lower classes, but I think if we investigate the subject pretty carefully we shall find that a great many are committed among the highly educated and well-bred classes. The murder that occurred in Virginia last year, the homicide that took place in Massachusetts and the case of the dentist in England and others might be cited. It is these cases that are specially sad. If we electrocute or execute such men we can see the tremendous amount of suffering the families of the well-bred and intelligent that are left behind.

Mr. WATSON: A great deal has been said in the course of this argument in favor of the murderer and his family, in favor of his wife, but nothing has been said in favor of the wife and family and relatives of the man who is stricken down in cold blood, and deliberately so by the murderer. The gentleman from Warren [Mr. EARNHART] spoke about public lynchings. No one on the floor is advocating such a thing. We do not believe in those public lynchings and that should not have been lugged into this debate. We have heard recently of the numerous mine disasters in this country, where hundreds of lives have been snuffed out, and in the majority of those cases it has been murder on the part of the corporation, which has become a law violator, and yet we hear no voice raised in protest against that murderer. A good many of the corporate interests of the country have become absolute murderers by the violation of laws designed to protect their employees and there is no talk against them. There is no outcry against them. When we look at the Cherry Valley disaster and sum that up it is absolute murder through violation of law. If Mr. Antrim's argument means anything then we should take away the jail sentence to lessen the number of house-breakings in this country. Oh, no; don't think for a moment that if you will lessen the penalty you are going to decrease crime. That is not the way to do it. As has been said, this provision is just "a shotgun behind the door" for the protection of society, and I hope it will remain there.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am decidedly in favor of the abolition of capital punishment and I hope it will carry for two reasons.

First: Taking up one objection, it has been stated that this is pure legislation and that it has no place in the constitution. Not so. It is no more legislation than the provision in the bill of rights which says trial by jury shall be preserved inviolate. That simply prevents the legislature from doing that one thing. The people have the right to say in the fundamental law that the death penalty shall not be inflicted for any crime committed in this state. It is simply barring the legislature from prescribing that penalty for any crime. It is no more legislation than the other matter to which I have referred.

In the second place, it is a principle in modern penology that the criminal law should undertake to deter from the commission of crime, and should undertake the reformation of the person convicted of crime as well as to punish for the offense already committed. It is a well-known fact, and a study of statistics will disclose it to be a fact, that the death penalty for any crime is not a deterrent in any greater degree, indeed not to as great a degree, than a lesser penalty strictly enforced. The deterrent feature of all criminal laws depends on the certainty of enforcement more than on the severity of the punishment.

One may quote Scripture to prove or disprove anything. If we had relied upon Scripture this country would still be blessed with slavery, for the fundamental argument in favor of slavery was biblical authority. If I understand anything about the Bible, and I am neither a lawyer nor a preacher, so perhaps I do, the net teaching of the Bible is that humanity is progressing and that the spirit of Christianity is to assist in progress from barbarism to enlightenment, and I submit that in this year of our Lord it is a revolting proposition that one murder justifies another.

Now, as a matter of fact, every one knows that with the death penalty in this state, already referred to by the gentleman from Medina [Mr. Woods] there is not an accused person brought before the court under indictment for a first degree murder but that the question has to be put, and is put, to each juror, "Have you conscientious scruples against the death penalty? Would your verdict be influenced at all by the fact that if the accused person is found guilty he would be subject to the death penalty?" In no other crime and with reference to no other penalty is that question asked of a juror. Whoever heard a juror asked "Is your conscience such that you cannot find a man guilty because he would be sent to the penitentiary if found guilty?" Since that sentiment exists, we are defeating one of the ends of criminal legislation by imposing a penalty where it is known in advance that some if not all of the jurors may be affected in their judgment upon the evidence presented by the fact that they have a hesitancy in finding a man guilty because the penalty is one that they think ought not to be imposed.

Mr. HALFHILL: Mr. President and Gentlemen: We have but one lamp to guide us and that is the lamp of experience. We have but one method to get light upon a question and that is from history; and both history and experience incline us to the belief that we are progressing in the social scale.

On this particular question we have gone back a good way to cite authority. You remember the old law quoted by the reverend gentleman from Holmes [Mr. WALKER]. But even that sanguinary declaration had to be modified later by the Levitical law which established cities of refuge; and even in pagan countries there existed in the temples the right of sanctuary, and a great deal was done even in pagan days to moderate the severity of the law which declared that "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man his blood shall be shed." Think of it! Our ancestors in England, from whom we get this law, in the year 1300 began to slacken a little. They occasionally got a little stronger by burning heretics, etc., but the gradual tendency was toward civilization and greater clemency, until one hundred years ago there were only two hundred crimes for which they did actually hang a man. In Blackstone's time there were three hundred and sixty-five such offenses. There was a rule in the English parliament when it enacted a criminal statute not to affix any penalty, because as a matter of course and as a matter of common usage the penalty went along with it and that was to hang. They exacted the supreme penalty for every crime except stealing property of less value than one shilling. So we have made some progress. There is not a crime in England today that is punished capitally except treason, piracy with violence, blowing up dockyards or arsenals, and murder in the first degree.

Gentlemen, I believe if any man has ever been associated with a murder trial he knows that he was under a very grave responsibility. The responsibility is something frightful to contemplate, for judge, jury, attorneys and all concerned. Society can punish and that is all that society ought to do. This idea of vengeance, relic of the old lex talionis, does not exist today and should not be advocated in any Christian country. The idea of society is to punish and prevent, punish and reform, and it is just as safe for society to immure one guilty of murder in the penitentiary for life and take away the executive power of pardon unless newly-discovered evidence is produced sufficient to warrant granting him a new trial at the hands of the jury, as it is to hang him. Is not that all that is necessary? I feel deeply upon the question and always have been convinced, ever since I first investigated, that capital punishment was both unnecessary and wrong. Here is that awful fact: That you may make a mistake in hanging a man and you can never rectify it. When you make that kind of a mistake there is no way to undo it. Now, that is the legal and moral side, but there is a utilitarian side. It does not prevent crime. Juries are too loath to administer it. The sureness and the quickness of punishment is what prevents crime; and if you sum it all up together you can safely lay down the general proposition that it is not right for the state to take the life of any one of its citizens or to take away that which it cannot give back.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I dislike greatly to vote against the proposal introduced by my friend Mr. Pierce and I am willing if he desires, at the next session of the legislature, or if the initiative and referendum passes, through that source, to help him pass such a law as he is now seeking to have this Convention pass. When I told a member of this Convention that I felt obliged to vote against this proposal he said "Why, Smith, you are cruel." Well, I think it is cruelty for this Convention to submit to the people so many propositions of a legislative character. Every man in this Convention could, with a very little thought, get up some meritorious proposal and bring it in here and win our sympathy and support, but it would not be our duty to vote for it for that reason. We were sent here to do a definite work, and that work was to change the organic law of the state and not to pass laws. Why, if we start here and pass legislative provisions we will be here until next year and possibly draw another hundred thousand down. I am sure nobody wants to do that. Every additional proposal submitted to the people puts added burdens on the people. It is going to take some time for the people to study these proposals, and all I want is to appeal to you that where we can, let us draw the line; let us decide to vote against proposals purely legislative; let us resolve to cleave straight to the line of duty, and that is changing the organic law the way the people who sent us here wanted it changed.

Mr. DUNN: There are a few of us who have said very little in the Convention, but you will notice that we have been doing one thing—we have been voting. I confess that on this question it is a difficult matter for me to decide how I shall vote. I have not obtained all the information from the addresses of members of the Convention which I would have been glad to have received, but I shall vote on the side of mercy. It seems to me that when we have any great question before the Convention, we divide into two camps as enemies and argue our prejudices, instead of coming together and studying the question unitedly and trying to solve it in favor of the whole people. This question of abolishing capital punishment is certainly an exceedingly important one. I want to vote right on it. I am very doubtful whether you can say the state commits murder when she puts into execution a law in favor of capital punishment. The state in some degree stands in the place of God. If she decides that the good of society demands the punishment of a criminal in this way, I doubt that you can say the state commits murder. That is not a valid argument to me. I want to know one thing: What is the effect of capital punishment upon those who are in danger of becoming murderers? I remember when a student that this principle was laid down—I do not give the words exactly: "All public descriptions of any crime have a tendency to produce repetitions of the crime." If that is true, if it is a psychological fact, I ask this question: Does capital punishment lead to other murders or does it not? In a short talk with our honored secretary, who has made a very careful study of the subject, I found that the figures are against capital punishment. So I shall vote against capital punishment.

Mr. STAMM: This question has been ventilated from the standpoint of the lawyers and the preachers and the professors and the laymen, but very little has been said from the standpoint of the criminologist. This discussion should be viewed from every angle and we should have some views from medical experts on this question. If you will allow me I will quote a few expressions of those myself:

Penal law was formerly based more on philosophical than psychological grounds until about 1850. Regnault, Herbart, Drobish, Waits and Wundt showed that the objects of psychiatric-forensic judgment are diseased conditions of the brain, which have to be studied by means of all technical and anthropological aids of modern science, and not from the every-day psychological standpoint of the layman or from the unreliable analysis of metaphysical criterion. A careful study of criminal conditions along the line of modern science makes us apt to consider sheer moral depravity as a diseased condition of the brain which may have an hereditary origin, or be the result of some latent neurosis, epilepsy, hysteria, which may essentially limit the exercise of what we are wont to call free will.

Morel, the great French alienist, wrote some seventy years ago (Traite' des Maladies Mentales, p. 544):

I do not doubt for an instant that laws which regulate the penalty among all civilized people will some day have to undergo some modifications and the honor will redound to the physicians who have learned to recognize the many changes which heredity impresses upon the organism?

Kraft Ebing, probably one of the greatest psychiatrists, has no doubt that the anthropological study of criminals will bear fruit and secure a firmer basis for the question of responsibility as well as the method and form of punishment. He says:

The time will come when our views in regard to certain criminals and the penalty in its ethical and judicial foundation, especially where penalty of death comes into question, will become untenable; where the criminal will be treated or considered more like a dangerous unfortunate and where the death penalty will be viewed as monstrous and inconceivable as witch burning and torture of former ages are looked upon by us today with a sense of shame.

Abolition of Capital Punishment.

Everything in this world has its cause; if the causes are the same the effect will be the same. Statistics demonstrate that if the causes remain the same the number of crimes will be the same, so that we can approximately predict how many crimes will be committed next year, even to their detail; how many cases of theft, how many cases of rape, how many murders; nay, even how many of these are carried out by the revolver, knife or poison. This should make it clear enough that crime is a social disease which may limit itself to the individual, but has its social origin.

Germany has five murders to one million inhabitants; so has England; France has twelve, Spain forty-five, Italy seventy-six and the United States seventy-five.

Lombroso says:

I have always found in my own experience that outrageous murders not to be explained according to the ordinary psychology of criminals are accompanied by psychical epilepsy.

Ferri, in Criminology, says, p. 8:

As for craniology, especially in regard to the two distinct and characteristic types of criminals, murderers and thieves, an incontestable inferiority has been noted in the shape of the head by comparison with normal men. An examination of the brains of criminals, whilst it reveals in the man inferiority of form and histological type, gives also in a great majority of cases indications of diseases which were frequently undetected in their lifetime. Thus Mr. Dally, who for twenty years past has displayed exceptional acumen in problems of this kind, said that all the criminals who had been subjected to autopsy (after execution) gave evidence of cerebral injury.

Mr. BOWDLE: Mr. President: Just a word in addition to what I had to say yesterday. I am happy to notice that the ministerial unanimity has been broken on this subject in the highly wise and philosophical utterance of Mr. Dunn. I am delighted to see that he has placed his Ebenezer by the side of the Captain of our salvation, whose mission in this life was to bring love and substitute it for the carnivorous instincts of humanity. It is said that this is not a proper matter for the constitution. I submit that if the matter of taking a glass of beer and eating a ham sandwich is properly within the constitution, the taking of human life is well within the limits of the constitution. So I shall expect every "dry" in the Convention to take precisely that view of the question.

It is very stimulating to observe that the law of love is gradually infiltrating into the hearts and minds of men. The object of Christ's coming was to bring that law of love and substitute it for the temporary and often cruel code that Moses was the head of and which had served its purpose in a rapidly evolving human body. I picked up last night the constitutions of some of the South American republics. It is instructive to see in those Catholic countries, to which we send so many missionaries for their conversion, their constitutions show how they are endeavoring to substitute the law of love for the law of ferocity and revenge.

In the constitution of Argentina I found this:

The penalty of death for political offenses, torture of all kinds, and the whipping-post are abolished. The national jails shall be healthy and clean; they shall be intended for the safe-keeping and not for the punishment of the prisoners, and any measure which, under color of precaution, may tend to subject the prisoners to more hardships than are required for their security, shall render the court authorizing it liable to answer for it.

I found in the constitution of the United States of Colombia this provision:

The legislature shall only prescribe death as a punishment for the cases which are defined as the gravest, the following crimes judiciously proven, to wit: Treason to one's country in a foreign war, parricide, assassination, arson, assault in a gang of malefactors, piracy, and certain military crimes defined by the military laws.

At no time shall the death penalty be inflicted except in the cases provided in this article.

Thus in the United States of Colombia the ordinary crime of murder is not punished with death.

I find likewise in the republic of Ecuador the same broad views and the same love shown by those people in whose conversion we, the people of the United States, are so interested. And so throughout the constitutions of South America you find this effort to substitute the divine law of love for the old revengeful law. In the recent contest between Argentina and Chili over the national boundary, which was settled without resort to arms, the good women of Buenos Ayres and Valparaiso got together and erected an heroic statue of the Christ fourteen thousand feet above the sea level, on the boundary line, a testimonial to the efficacy of the principles of the Captain of our salvation in the settlement of international disputes.

Mr. WALKER: In your investigations did you find that human life was any more highly regarded in South America than in this country?

Mr. BOWDLE: I do not know whether they have any higher regard for life than we have. I do not know that we have such a high regard for human life in our advanced christian civilization here, but I know they are making an effort to get away from the old-time law. I am happy to see a reference to the pamphlet gotten out by our very accomplished secretary, Mr. Galbreath, which shows that statistics demonstrate that the law of love should be substituted instead of the carnivorous law.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Madison: A few years ago when we planned a reform in our method of capital punishment and changed from hanging to electrocution, a certain Irishman said that they had changed the plan in Ohio; that they didn't hang them any more, but killed them by "elocation." A further step in this progressive movement is now being taken, namely, we are trying to decapitate by constitutional oratory. In order to prevent further decapitation, I move the previous question.

Abolition of Capital Punishment—Relative to Question of Personal Privilege.

The previous question was regularly demanded and a vote being taken the main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is carried and the question is on the adoption of the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER].

Mr. EVANS: I move to lay that on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is out of order. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT: The question is now on the passage of the proposal.

Proposal No. 62—Mr. Pierce. Relative to abolition of capital punishment.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio. That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. At the time when the vote of the electors shall be taken for the adoption or rejection of any revision, alteration or amendments made to the constitution by this Convention, the following section, independently of the submission of any revision, alteration or other amendments, submitted to them, shall be separately submitted to the electors in the words following, to-wit:

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 9. All persons shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, except in cases of homicide, where proof is evident or the presumption great. Excessive bail shall not be required; nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted; nor shall life be taken as a punishment for crime.

Until otherwise provided by law, persons convicted of crimes heretofore punishable by death, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary during life.

SECTION 2. At such election a separate ballot shall be provided for the voters in the following form:

TO ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

	Abolition of capital punishment, YES.
	Abolition of capital punishment, NO.

SECTION 3. The voter shall indicate his choice by placing a cross mark within the blank space opposite the words, "Abolition of capital punishment, YES.", if he desires to vote in favor of the section above mentioned; and within the blank space opposite the words, "Abolition of capital punishment, NO.", if he desires to vote against the section above mentioned.

SECTION 4. If the votes in favor of the section above mentioned shall exceed the votes against the same, then said section shall take the place of section 9 of article I, of the constitution, regardless of whether any revision, alteration or other amendments submitted to the people, shall be adopted or rejected.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. PECK: Before we go on, I beg leave to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Hamilton asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution. If there is no objection the resolution will be offered.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 106:

Resolved, That no member of this Convention shall be permitted under the guise of a question of personal privilege to reply to any criticism made in any other place than in this Convention in regular session; any reply made to criticism in debate shall be made the same calendar day on which such criticism is made or not at all.

The PRESIDENT: That goes over under the rule. The next business in order is Proposal No. 64 and the question is on the passage of the substitute.

Conservation of Natural Resources.

Mr. TETLOW: Believing that this Convention has reached a stage in its proceedings when we should have more action and less words, I have condensed into a few words my views on the question now under consideration.

The subject matter contained in this substitute proposal is of great import to this great commonwealth and will grow in magnitude with each passing year, and I feel that we living in this age owe to the coming generations the preservation of our natural resources, that fundamentally belong to them as well as to us. This proposal, if adopted, will give the lawmaking power of the state authority to provide for the conservation of all our natural resources, to adopt and regulate systems of mining that will tend toward the preservation of life; prevent the waste of minerals and provide for the measuring of coal. The principal mineral of this state and nation is coal, and being familiar with that industry I shall illustrate from that standpoint. The natural resources of this nation have been chiefly responsible for its wonderful progress, and coal has contributed most largely to its success. We see its power utilized in sending the ocean greyhound across the deep, we see it sending the throbbing locomotive speeding over rails it helped to make, we see its bright glow and feel its warmth within our homes, we see its power and energy in our industrial life, and, realizing its full value, we should conserve this power that means so much to future generations. The production of coal in the United States from 1814 to the close of 1910, including anthracite and bituminous coal, was 8,243,351,259 tons, and according to D. J. A. Holmes, director of the national bureau of mines, we have lost, never to be recovered, by our wasteful and destructive methods of mining approximately 5,000,000,000 tons of coal, and from my personal knowledge of mining conditions I know we lose about 40 per cent through our national methods of mining. Consequently I feel that Dr. Holmes in his estimate of loss is approximately correct. Since 1872 Ohio has produced approximately 600,000,000 tons of coal, and at the ratio of loss indicated our loss in this state will approximately be 240,000,000 tons. Ohio produced in 1910, 34,424,951 tons. In 1911 the Ohio tonnage was 30,342,039 tons. At the same ratio of loss in the last two years, Ohio lost over 25,000,000 tons that can never be recovered.

In European countries and under their system of mining over 90 per cent of the coal is mined and consequently less than 10 per cent is lost, which shows conclusively our weakness, and it also reflects discredit upon the system we employ.

What emphasizes the necessity for action is the amazing increase in our tonnage to meet the increasing demand and consumption, and to emphasize more fully I submit for comparison the tonnage production of two decades ago and the present production. Ohio in 1890 produced 11,494,506 tons and in 1910, 34,424,951 tons, showing an increase of about 300 per cent; in the United States, the production in 1890 was 157,770,963 tons and in 1910, 501,596,378 tons, or an increase of over 300 per cent, and when we consider that we are mining our most available and workable seams and add thereto the remarkable and ever increasing demand, should we not think of the conservation of this mineral by preventing the great loss in our mining operations?

In speaking of the great loss of human life in our mining industry I do so with deep and mingled feelings; and many, many times have these words burned into my very soul that "man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." Yes, my friends, I have spent my entire life in and around the mines, and I have seen hundreds of my fellow workmen go to needless and untimely graves, but with all that I haven't yet lost faith in mankind, and when the time comes that human life is placed above dollars justice will begin to reign.

It is a fact that all the ingenuity of man has been directed toward the cheapening of production, and in the mad race we have lost sight of a higher duty, the protection of human life.

I submit for your consideration a brief statement of the mortality in the mines. Taking the year 1910, which is a fair average for basis, we have the following indictment that cries out against our system of mining:

In Belgium the death rate per thousand persons employed was .95; in Prussia, 1.98; in Austria, 1.04; in France, 1.17; Great Britain, 1.43 and the United States 3.91. This shows our death rate four times greater than that of Belgium, whose mines are more dangerous, their shafts being deeper, involving greater problems in ventilation, timbering and equipment.

In 1910, 161 fatal accidents occurred in Ohio, 672 men were injured and the death rate per thousand employed was 3.3. In 1910, 3051 lives were lost in the mines of our country and since 1886, 36,586 lives have been lost. In European countries the mines are worked principally on what mining men term "long-wall advancing" or "long-wall retreating." By this system practically all the coal is taken out and the traveling and haulage roads are protected by artificial walls built of rock or slate, the old workings of the mine are quickly closed by the pressure and weight of the overlying strata and it leaves no space in the old abandoned workings for the accumulation of gas or coal dust.

In this country the principal method used in mining is known as the "room and pillar" system. About 60 per cent of the coal is mined by this process and about 40 per cent that is not recovered is used for pillars, which in the end is false protection, because in the old abandoned workings a condition is created that is dangerous. Proper ventilation is rendered impossible and the old and abandoned workings become a storage place for gas or coal dust, which are the elements that cause all of our mine explosions.

Some claim that it would cost a few more cents per ton to mine coal under the European system. I cannot accept this claim as correct, but even if it is the result to be obtained warrants the small extra cost.

In dealing briefly with mine explosions I desire to make in the beginning the unqualified statement that every one of the catastrophes due to explosions could be prevented. As I heretofore stated, there were two elements that furnished the basic cause of explosions, inflammable gas and coal dust. The inflammable gas encountered in mines, known as marsh gas or commonly called fire damp, creates its greatest destructive powers when the atmosphere becomes charged with about seven per cent of the gas. When the percentage of gas is below three per cent it will not ignite. Consequently if the sections of the mine are properly ventilated gas can be diluted and rendered harmless and driven from the mine. Coal dust is more dangerous and deadly than gas because it is more difficult to remove, but if the mines in the dry sections are sprinkled and the air currents charged with moisture by artificial means, or the dust is removed, the danger could be eliminated. The greatest handicap in proper ventilation and cleansing dust from the mine to protect life and property is our present "room and pillar" system. If we adopt European methods we will be able to more adequately protect life and conserve our mineral resources. I recognize that the one great crying need in the mining industry is national regulation to circumvent the stone-age cry of competition that arises when a single state attempts to rectify existing wrongs. My reason for wanting a constitutional provision giving authority to enact laws regulating the measuring and weighing of coal is to protect life and prevent fraud. For many years the miners have endeavored to have their employers pay them upon the basis of "mine run," or for all the coal they produce, but they have never succeeded, and they, in their weakness, have been denied justice by the strong. At present the miners of the state are paid only for coal that passes over a screen having an area of 72 superficial feet, with a mesh supposed to be an inch and a quarter between the bars, and the amount of nut coal and slack passing through the screen will average about 35 per cent.

One thing about these screens that is self-evident is that the coal passing over and through them wears the bars and increases the size of the mesh. Thereby injustice is done, for the wearing of the screen never favors the miners. From personal observation I have seen screens so worn that the miners were losing fully ten per cent of earnings that rightfully belong to them. You may ask why the miner would permit such a condition, but he usually suffers in silence for fear of discrimination. So with all his latent slumbering power he is oppressed through his own weakness.

In 1898 a law was passed in this state "to provide for the weighing of coal before screening" for the protection of miners, but it was declared unconstitutional by our supreme court, while the same kind of a law has been held constitutional in West Virginia, Kansas and Illinois. The Ohio court held that the law was an unwarranted invasion of the right of contract and that it placed a premium upon incompetency. I contend that our state has, under its legislative branch of government, the right to regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other and the manner in which they shall use their property when the regulation of such is necessary for the public good.

If there were any basis for the action of the court in declaring that the law placed a premium upon incompetency at that time that claim cannot be raised now, because a complete evolution has taken place in the industry. At that time the great majority of our tonnage was produced by the hand-pick method, and there being no sale for fine or slack coal, the employers took exceptional care in selecting practical workmen, because the less fine coal produced the greater returns on their investment. The present conditions are directly opposite.

Of the 34,424,951 tons produced in our state in 1910, 30,083,468 tons was mined by machinery, so the machine now does the undercutting that required the practical miner in the past. The fine coal has become a valuable commodity, due to the patent stokers and modern methods of extracting the head units from fine coal, and the more fine coal produced the more goes through the screen and the greater become the returns of the employer. In the past the practical miner was in demand; now the inexperienced miner who produces the most fine coal is in demand.

Right here I desire to make a statement that in Illinois and West Virginia, where they have the mine-run system and where the miners are paid for all the coal they mine, they have increased their tonnage production to a greater extent than any other states in the Union in the last decade.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to ask you a question right here purely for information.

Mr. TETLOW: All right.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to know whether or not the wage-scale in the mining district is not based entirely upon the lump coal they mine, if the wage-scale is not higher in Ohio than in West Virginia, if the operators do not depend upon the fine coal really for their profit, and if Ohio can be asked to regulate or compel payment for all the coal mined until West Virginia is organized and brings up the wage-scale there?

Mr. TETLOW: I answer that by saying it makes no difference to the honest employer, because in the wage contract between the miners and operators they have a price fixed for screen coal, that which passes over a one-and-a-quarter-inch screen. They have a price for mine-run coal proportionately less according to the amount screened. For instance, if the miners were getting $1 per ton for lump coal over an inch-and-a-quarter screen they would get sixty-six and two-thirds cents for run-of-mine coal. So it makes no difference to the operator whether the miners are on a mine-run basis or a screen-coal basis, if he is actually paying the miners for all the coal he mines, but in this state we have mines producing three thousand tons of coal in eight hours, and every ton of lump that passes over the screen wears it down and consequently the spaces become greater and the miner is always losing, and it is this injustice we cry out against. All we ask is that we shall be paid for that which is marketable coal, coal which can be sold in the market. There is no reasonable objection to the proposition, and it will not prevent the operator from screening the coal and making different grades to meet market requirements.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is there any provision in the present constitution under which these regulations can not all be made by statute?

Mr. TETLOW: Because the supreme court in this state decided in 1900 that it was an invasion of the right of contract and that it set a premium upon incompetency. But conditions have changed and I am satisfied if our court today had to rule upon the same question it would hold it constitutional because of these changed conditions. Practically all of our coal at that time was mined by the hand-pick method. There was not any sale for fine coal, only for the lump coal, and the fine coal was lost, but conditions have changed. Patent stokers have come into use. Fine coal is marketable; in fact, if you go into some of the state institutions of this state you will find they are using fine coal the miners do not get paid for.

Mr. HOSKINS: One other question about West Virginia: Is it possible in Ohio to increase the wage-scale, or the money paid to miners, so long as conditions exist as they are in West Virginia?

Mr. TETLOW: I do not think this is a proper place to discuss the question of wages, or whether the operator should pay in advance or not. Recently they have agreed to a contract giving a fraction over five per cent increase in Ohio to take effect as soon as it can be arranged, perhaps for the first of May.

The point is this—and I want you to understand it thoroughly—it does not make any difference to the honest employer if thirty-three per cent of your coal passes over the screen—it makes no difference whether you pay sixty-six cents per ton mine run or one dollar for lump, for they are relatively the same. What difference does it make to the honest employer who wants to pay for that which the miner produces, whether he pays sixty-six cents mine run or one dollar for lump, because, as I say, the only disadvantage is that the screen wears and the miners are always getting the worst of it? The miners have never been strong enough to get justice and that is why I think we should have a provision allowing us justice in this regard.

Mr. KRAMER: I never saw a coal mine. Do the miners get anything for that which goes through the sieve?

Mr. TETLOW: Not a cent.

Mr. KRAMER: Is that all coal?

Mr. TETLOW: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: By way of preface to a question I am about to ask, I had understood that this proposal and the two proposals into which it was merged, provided for conservation, that is saving, to the end that the supply might be made to last longer, and I would be glad if you would explain to me—I am not at all expert on this line—but how will this tend to make the production last longer for the consumers of the country?

Mr. TETLOW: I tried to make it as plain as I could from a practical standpoint in the beginning. The only way to conserve mineral resources is by adopting certain methods of mining. Under our system, now in practice, we leave forty per cent of the coal under the ground that can never be recovered. Europe has systems of mining by which they mine practically all of their coal; in fact, some of the largest mining operators mine one hundred per cent of their coal while we mine less than sixty per cent. I claim that is the reason of our great loss. The waste of minerals ought to be regulated, and we should give the legislature power to regulate mining to bring that result about.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If I understood your answer to Mr. Hoskins it is that there must be something provided in the organic law that is not there now to enable that result to be brought about?

Mr. TETLOW: Exactly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: And I could not see where it was.

Mr. TETLOW: This proposal combines a number of things. We have in it the conservation of the forests and of the minerals and of the water power, and it also gives the legislature power to regulate the measurement of coal, and, speaking upon that particular part of the proposition, the weighing of the coal.

The great influx of inexperienced workmen into our mines has added greatly to our death rate. Take a mine generating gas; the air currents are rendering it harmless, but some inexperienced person leaves open a door which is used to direct the air current, the air is cut off from the section generating gas, an explosive mixture generates and the inevitable result follows. We have laws in this state that require each mine generating gas to be examined each morning by a fire-boss or inspector before the men enter the mine; he is required to make a written report on a blackboard outside the mine and to report thereon the condition of the mine, and if there is any danger in any section he is to so report. Then we permit men to enter the mine and work therein who cannot read or understand our language. Don't you think, my friends, the time has come for us to say, "I am my brother's keeper"?

In conclusion, I desire to say this proposal provides for the conservation of all our natural resources. As we look about us we see our timber almost exhausted. Should not we lay the foundation now to prevent the waste of our minerals? We should conserve our streams that future generations can harness their power and send electricity flowing into the needed channels. We, for the love of humanity, should protect the life and health of those who go into the bowels of the earth and give from the darkness of the mine so much light to the world.

Mr. STOKES: You speak about forty per cent here being left for pillars. What do they do in England?

Mr. TETLOW: They take the slate and rock that come out of the mines and with it build walls along the travel and haulage way; they remove all the coal; they do not use any timber, and consequently, when all the coal is taken from under the roof, the pressure gradually fills in the spaces made by the removal of the coal.

Mr. KRAMER: In the first part of the proposal you have laws "may be" passed in reference to forests, and then the latter part of the proposal says laws "shall be" passed. Was there any particular object in putting the "may be" in one place and the "shall be" in another?

Mr. TETLOW: None at all. It really doesn't make any difference. We can not force the legislature to pass the laws, but we can give them the power and the word "may" or "shall" does not make any difference whatever.

Mr. KRAMER: Is there any objection to making all of them "may" or all of them "shall," so the legislature could not think one was any more peremptory than the other?

Mr. TETLOW: No.

The delegate from Lawrence was here recognized.

Mr. LEETE: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I wish to speak upon this question of conservation of natural resources of the state, because I believe that in this conservation we are all more or less interested, and the people that are to follow us in future generations are more interested than in almost any other question, and as my two friends have spoken upon the conservation of the forests and the mines respectively, I shall confine myself to the conservation of water power.

Conservation of water power! Some one would ask, What is it? It is the preserving, guarding, protecting and keeping in a safe or entire state everything necessary to the developing of said power. Some would ask, Is there any reason for us doing this? Why should we conserve water power? If you spend more than you make what is the inevitable result? Trouble and disaster, sure and quick.

Now, heat, light, force, energy and power are the essentials necessary to all people. Do you know that you are destroying the forests more than four times as rapidly as they are being reproduced, and that in cutting, logging and clearing you are so utterly reckless in the manner in which you do it that practically all the good timbers are taken and none but the worthless remain; that the young trees and underbrush are destroyed as well; that stumps, tops and litter are left in such piles and confusion that they invite forest fires which usually do complete the destruction the following year?

Mr. O. W. Price, vice president of the National Conservation Association, says in an excellent work of his:

Forests are to streams what the storage battery is to the electric wire—the source of useful power, and energy, and current in reserve.

When the rain falls on a forest, it spatters against the roof of leaves, and the heavy hard-pounding raindrops are broken up into a fine, soft mist. Any one who has stood under a tree during a shower doesn't need to be told that. When this mist reaches the ground under the trees, it falls on a soft bed of dead leaves. This bed has a wonderful power to soak up and hold water; and so the rain soaks slowly into the leaf litter, much as water does into a cloth, until it reaches the soil beneath. This is called the mineral soil, because it was made by the gradual wearing away of rocks of many kinds, which took more years than we count.

The water slowly works on down through this mineral soil, following cracks and channels already worn by the action of water for thousands of years; continually starting new channels of its own, joining with other rivulets, and so forming streams and even rivers underground. It is these underground waters, finding their way to the surface on the mountain sides, and in the valleys which make springs.

When the forests are gone, all this is changed. The sun beats down on the leaf litter, dries it up, and the wind scatters it, until only the dense, mineral soil is left, which bakes with the heat until it is sometimes nearly as hard as brick. When the rain falls on it, very little soaks in. The rest runs off down hill into the streams, carrying a part of the soil with it. We can see this going on in many places from the train. Over there is a bare hillside with great raw gashes and gullies worn in it by the countless little torrents of muddy water which have dashed down it after each hard rain ever since the forest was destroyed.

The author, continuing, in substance says that farther down the stream we see it filling its bed with debris, changing and cutting its banks to pieces, spreading over the rich land and turning good farm lands into unsightly sandbars and hideous patches of sun-baked mud. The stream has already taken and is taking its revenge for unwise use of the ax and fire.

Now gentlemen of the Convention, we believe all authorities agree that the exhaustion of the natural elements, such as the forests, oil, gas and coal, and which are now used to produce power, is in sight. Need I now ask, Have you not spent what you did not make, and have you not forever prevented your children and children's children from using these essentials? If that is so, what are our duties toward and what can we do to control and conserve the one remaining source of power in the state, namely, water?

Do you realize that we are now at a turning point in human progress and in the manufacture and transmission of power; that farseeing men and capital are now beginning to look forward and are securing suitable sites for the development of power, and that the state must move, and move quickly, if it wishes to protect and control the streams and water powers? Under this proposal the state can declare and maintain conservation districts and enforce scientific plans for the development and control of the waters therein. The practice heretofore has been to look for a great waterfall, build a large dam to secure a high and elevated head to develop large power, and use the same, usually for mill purposes, without any idea or care for stream control.

The effect in Ohio is usually an excess of water in the spring, damaging adjacent lands and properties, and with a scarcity in the fall.

Let us change all this and use common sense; store in suitable lakes, reservoirs and behind regulating dams, upon the high lands and upper courses of the streams of this state, the excess of the waters and rains falling during the winter and spring months, allowing, say, one three hundred and sixty-fifth part of this excess of these stored waters to pass on each day to the power sites below, and there utilize the power in the weight of the water as it falls by gravity in its onward course toward the sea. In this manner you can control the stream as to volume and constancy of supply, effectually stopping the filling up of its bed and of destructive overflows.

And further, from this constant volume you can develop an abundance of power for the uses of the people of the state without calling on the other natural resources of the state, and, further, this power will be everlasting, and as the cost of electrical transmission is not prohibitive in distances under one hundred and fifty miles, there will not be a single city or community in the state that can not be amply supplied with power from some conserved district within the state.

Some will ask, will it pay? In answer I will say capital is now seeking to acquire rights on a number of streams in the state, and have already secured some, and the people in the vicinity where such rights have already been secured will wake up some day to the fact that they are at the mercy of some corporation.

Mr. M. D. Burke, member of the American Society of Civil Engineers, in a pamphlet, says:

Conservation of Natural Resources.

Three direful evils not only threaten us, but are actually upon us, because of our failure to conserve and properly use the rainfall:

First. In its rapid and unobstructed descent from the uplands, slopes, and hills it carries with it, not only the soil, but it furrows the slopes with gullies, and produces slides of great extent, and is thus denuding and destroying millions of acres of valuable land.

Second. It carries such quantities of sediment into the larger streams that they become clogged, their channels are filled with bars, they erode their banks, destroying other lands, thus adding to the vast volume of sediment and they lose their usefulness as channels.

Third. In times of heavy, long-continued rainfall the larger rivers overflow their banks, and the property loss of the inhabitants of their valleys is very great, intense suffering, and even loss of life, resulting from these disastrous floods. In the smaller valleys the soil is frequently washed away from large areas of bottom lands, leaving barren wastes covered with sand and rock. Farmers spend much time and labor in building brakes and dykes in efforts to save from destruction their most valuable lands.

Four desirable benefits will accrue from a proper conservation of the rainfall:

First. By holding back the water you will retain with it the soil which it may have started from the hillsides or cultivated fields, and after this sediment shall have fallen to the bottoms of the pools only the clear water will escape, and the soil will be free for the taking and may be returned to the farms if wanted. The soil will thus be saved.

Second. By controlling the flow of the various tributaries the volume of water passing down the main channel will, like that of the controlled streams, be so nearly a constant flow that, after this work shall have been well advanced (it may be completed by generations yet unborn), the streams will not overflow their banks, and disastrous floods will be known only in history, and be read about as are the other hardships of the sturdy pioneers. Thus the losses and sufferings incident to disastrous floods will be eliminated.

Third. The water from the controlled streams will reach the navigable channels in nearly constant quantities, and will carry with it but little sediment. Hence it follows that the navigable channel will have a constant flow, which will be ample for navigation, and its channel, not being filled with debris, it will not be forced to erode its banks, but will deepen its channel, so that but little expense will be needed to maintain it in proper form for use by boats. Inland navigation will thus be secured.

Fourth. Impounding the water of the numerous tributaries upon the higher lands, places it in such position that it is available for power. Using it for that purpose does not detract from its value for any other purpose, nor eventually retard its arrival at the sea, or, by evaporation, to the clouds. By using it for power we will place in the hands of the American people a force which will enable them to retain their present position in the van of progressive nations, and they can do anything which power will enable any people to do, without burning a stick of wood, a ton of coal, a foot of gas or a gallon of oil.

By passing this proposal you will not take one right or thing from any one, but you make it possible and mandatory for the state to protect the people and coming generations from "innocent stockholders" or capital seizing all the natural resources, thereby leaving the people to their mercy.

Mr. DWYER: I do not believe in Western Ohio there is one available water power. They are always trying to get water power, but there is very little water power.

Mr. LEETE: We want to control the excess water that falls in the spring and winter and keep it back and hold it in a reservoir so that one three hundred and sixty-fifth of it can be allowed to escape each day and keep the water-volume constant in our streams.

Mr. DWYER: I had a report made to me as to the water power in Western Ohio and the best that could be figured was seven hundred horse power, and that certainly wouldn't amount to very much.

Mr. LEETE: You are wrongly informed.

Mr. TETLOW: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 14 after the word "regulation" insert the following words: "of methods".

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: There is no longer any doubt entertained as to the necessity for the conservation and preservation of our timber supply. The nation is wisely taking steps to preserve our forests and many of the states are doing efficient and effective work. Among those states Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, Michigan, Nebraska, California, Washington and in fact nearly all of the states are doing something toward the preservation of the timber supply. Ohio is doing practically nothing except in an advisory way. Our experiment station will advise with the owners of timber lots as to how to care for them, and if a demand is made they will send from the forestry department of the experiment station a man to examine the lot and advise as to its management. They will also furnish landowners of the state a limited number of a certain kind of trees, provided they are planted and cared for under their direction. Other than this, we are doing practically nothing, except what is being attempted by the Ohio Forestry Society, of which I have the honor of being a member and on the executive board. Prof. A. L. Lazenby, of the State University, is president of the society, and it is maintained entirely by contributions from its own members. The professor is now abroad studying forest conditions. I know something of the difficulty of persuading landowners to take any real interest in this subject.

About the first argument offered is that they are required to pay taxes on this land and they can not afford to let it lie idle, and hence they turn stock into the timber lands and the pasturing of the timber lands is very detrimental. Perhaps you may have noticed as you go over the state that in those plats that are pastured the tops of the trees begin to die off in a few years and eventually the entire lot is destroyed. What we want to do is to encourage the owners of timber land to devote it exclusively to the growing of timber; we must take into consideration that the preservation of the timber supply in a great measure aids precipitation. There is no question any more that the timber of a country, in a great measure, controls the precipitation and the flow of streams, and it seems to me that these two propositions fit nicely together, and that we should give this proposal very careful consideration. One of the most important economic questions, it seems to me, is the control of the stream-flow of this country. I would like to quote just briefly from a report of Raphael Zon, chief of silvics of the United States forestry service. In this very exhaustive report, made to the forestry department, he says on this proposition:

Of all the direct influence of the forest the influence upon the supply of water in streams and upon the regularity of their flow is the most important in human economy. * * * A national policy which, though considering the direct value of forests as a source of timber supply, fails to take full account also of their influence upon erosion, the flow of streams, and climate, may easily endanger the well-being of the whole people.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is it the intention of the proposal to materially change the laws relating to the control of the use of water in ordinary small streams that flow through farms and the country and that are used for ordinary purposes?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: No; I don't think so. It is only enlarging the use of them. The riparian rights would be entirely reserved to the owners of the land.

Mr. JONES: I ask this question because I have not had an opportunity of knowing anything about the proposal: What is the power with reference to the encouragement in the matter of planting and cultivating forests that is proposed to be conferred in addition to what the legislature now has?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I do not know that there is any particular additional power granted except the freeing of those tracts from taxation.

Mr. JONES: That is what I was coming to. Does that language confer any power except what now exists?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Not so far as I know.

Mr. JONES: Then all is included in the one proposition to exempt timber land from taxation?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I presume it is.

Mr. JONES: If it is desirable, in order to conserve the natural resources, to exempt timber from taxation, why not exempt pasture land from taxation—land that is put in clover—for that is the greatest conservator that we have in agricultural matters? Why not exempt land put in grass and clover, especially land put in alfalfa, the greatest of all conservators?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I think it can be clearly shown that the forests have a greater influence on climatic conditions than any other agricultural product.

Mr. JONES: But may I ask if it is the purpose of this to regulate climate or to conserve natural resources?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: We are seeking to encourage the other things by preserving forestry. One of the most important features that we have knowledge of is the control of the climate.

Mr. JONES: Do you think it is more important to encourage the growing of timber than to encourage the growth and cultivation of those things that feed mankind?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I might answer that by asking another question: What would be the result if all the timber were removed?

Mr. JONES: In the prairie country, where it all has been removed for a million years, we have the richest soil in America and the greatest producing soil.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I think conclusive evidence shows that forests have a great influence upon the precipitation and upon the climate. In the growing of forests trees there is no immediate result to the owners, while in the growing of the other crops you have mentioned there are immediate results.

Mr. JONES: In what way is it proposed to conserve natural sources in reference to draining swamp lands? Do you mean that if a man happened to own swamp land the state would have some power to exercise a different control over that than with reference to other lands he owns?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Not at all unless the individual owner is not able to reclaim that land himself.

Mr. ELSON: The idea is to exempt from taxation all the forest land of the ordinary farmer?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: All the forest land devoted exclusively to the growing of timber.

Mr. ELSON: What is there to prevent a coterie of millionaires buying up a whole county for a hunting preserve?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I don't know that anything would prevent it. I would not object to it. In that case we would get just what we are seeking for.

Mr. ELSON: Suppose they would buy up a whole county?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Better yet. If there is any argument in the fact that forests are a great means of conserving natural resources and providing precipitation, controlling our streams and their flow, that would be a great advantage.

Mr. ELSON: Would you favor a large part of the state thus being in the hands of a few wealthy individuals and exempt from taxation?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Of course I would not favor conditions of that kind. Now I have not a written speech and the questions disarrange my thought just a little.

Mr. EBY: Can you deduce any scientific evidence that the amount of forests have anything to do with precipitation?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: If you will wait a moment I think I can demonstrate that to you. I have just stated that in the exhaustive report of Raphael Zon he speaks of the important influence of forests in the supply of water in streams. Further he says:

Of the 44,015,400 square miles of land surface of the earth 79 per cent drains directly toward the ocean and 21 per cent forms an inclosed inland area without ocean drainage. The 79 per cent may be called the peripheral area of the earth's surface, and the importance of the evaporation from it is, on the whole, very great.

Prof. Ed Bruckner computes the "continental vapor" evaporated from this peripheral area to be about 21,000 cubic miles (20,871.3 cubic miles). It plays, therefore, even a more important part in supplying moisture to the air than does the vapor directly evaporated from the ocean. Bruckner estimates that the peripheral regions of the continents are capable of supplying seven-ninths of their precipitation by evaporation from their own areas.

He then gives a lengthy table which I shall not quote from. He continues:

An analysis of these figures discloses the fact that one-fifth of the entire vapor on the earth's surface comes from the evaporation on land; that only 7 per cent, or 5,997.5 cubic miles, of all the water evaporated from the oceans enters into the precipitation over land, and that 78 per cent of all the precipitation that falls over the peripheral land area is furnished by this area itself.

This is after an exhaustive examination, not only in the United States, but in other countries as well. I am quoting just short paragraphs from this report, because it is too extensive to read at length:

If precipitation over land depended solely on the amount of water brought by the prevailing winds directly from the ocean, rainfall would, of course, be confined only to a narrow belt close to the sea. Not all the water that is precipitated, however, is lost from the air current. A large part of it is again evaporated from the land into the atmosphere. The moisture-laden air currents therefore soon lose the moisture which they obtain directly from the ocean, but in moving farther into the interior absorb the evaporation from the land. Hence, the farther from the ocean the greater is the proportion which evaporation from the land forms of the air moisture. In fact, at certain distances inland practically all the moisture of the air, or at least as great a part as that formed originally by the water evaporated direct from the ocean, must consist of that obtained by evaporation from the land.

While the removal of the forest might increase the evaporation from the ground itself, yet the more rapid run-off and the absence of transpiration by the trees would reduce the total amount of water evaporated into the atmosphere. The land, even if taken up for agriculture, could never return such large quantities of rain into the atmosphere as the forests did. The result would be that less moisture would be carried by the prevailing winds into the interior of the country, and therefore less precipitation would occur there.

Mr. JONES: Will the gentleman yield to a further question?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Yes.

Mr. JONES: Do the records show that on account of the falling off of timber in Ohio in thirty-five years there has been any decrease in the amount of rainfall in this state?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I am not prepared to say that there has been any.

Mr. JONES: Are you not aware that the records of the weather bureau show there has not been any change?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I presume that is so, but you will admit that the run-off has been greater. There has not been near the percentage retained in the soil.

Mr. JONES: Is it of not more importance to have the land of Ohio fit for cultivation and so used as to produce the most of what the people of the country demand than to produce something that is not demanded?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I think you are right about that, but it was shown yesterday by the author of the proposal that there were almost a million acres of waste and other lands in the state of Ohio that can not be used for agricultural purposes. It is those tracts of land we are endeavoring to provide for reforestation, and also for the state to purchase lands of that kind and reforest them. We would then get the benefits from them, whereas now none is derived from those waste and abandoned lands.

Mr. JONES: Is it not a fact that substantially all the lands in Ohio will produce grass, and would not efforts at conservation be better directed if directed along the line of getting those lands in grass rather than into forests in consideration of the fact that there are millions and millions of acres in this country that can not be used for any other purpose except forests?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I think the gentleman knows there are many tracts of land in Ohio that do not even grow good grass that might be used for forestry purposes.

Mr. JONES: Could they not be made to grow grass?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I would not say they could not be made to grow grass, but you must acknowledge the fact that the taking off of the forests, even if the land were sown in grass, the run-off from those hilly tracts would be very much greater than from the forests. You know that a rainfall will continue for hours after the ceasing of the actual rain because the leaves catch it and it falls gradually on the beds of the forest, and if the bed is in good condition it gathers that moisture and it is carried off through seepage and not in the rapid run-off which produces the excessive floods we have now over what we had a few years ago.

I didn't expect to use so much time, though as chairman of the committee I believe I have some additional time.

Now I want to speak briefly in reference to the increase of floods brought about largely by the clearing off of our forests. This is a report by William L. Hall and H. Maxwell to the United States department of agriculture:

Popular opinion for years has been that floods are increasing in frequency and duration in many rivers of the United States. Until within a year, however, there had been no careful examination of records to see whether or not this popular opinion is based upon fact.

About a year ago it was thought worth while to look into the records to see whether any changes were discernible. The results were surprising. It was found that in many of the streams which take their rise in the Appalachian Mountains there has been a steady increase in the number and duration of floods during the past twenty or thirty years.

The increases seem to be greater on those watersheds where the condition of the surface has been the most changed. They are greatest in such streams as the Ohio, Cumberland, Wateree and Santee, where the most forests have been destroyed, and least on the streams where forest conditions have been least changed.

On the Ohio River measurements are given for twenty-six years. During the first half of the period there were 46 floods; during the second half 59. The number of days of flood during the first half was 143; during the second half, 188.

Repeated European observations, extending over long periods of time, and shorter observations made in this country, conclusively show that evaporation from water or other wet surfaces on the floor of the forest is but one-third or one-fourth that from similar surfaces in the open.

It is evident that any factor which decreases the surface or superficial run-off and increases the seepage run-off is of the utmost importance in regulating the flow of streams.

It seems to me that this is conclusive evidence that the destruction of forests has considerable to do with the stream flow and it seems to me that this question is of so much importance that the state of Ohio ought to take its place in the forefront among the states attempting to conserve and encourage reforestation or afforestation of our timber land. There is one authority, Mr. W. D. Carroll, of the United States forestry service, who says he thinks the best results can only be accomplished if the nation and states join hands in this work.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: There has been a demand for this for many years. I have heard it from being associated with farmers. I think, however, the persons who would be disposed to take advantage of the privileges if the land were made free of taxation, might turn this into a method of speculation which would go beyond the purpose of the thing proposed, and as a partial safeguard against a potential abuse of it I wish to offer the following amendment:

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 6 between the words "the" and "growing" insert "original."

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: That amendment is offered for fear of the persons who have land, as I have, for instance, in large pasture fields, covered with worthless growing shrubbery which never will make timber, and never will make much at all, and can be properly utilized after a while for something else, but will never grow what you might call timber.

Mr. HALFHILL: I desire to call the attention of the president to the special order set for the hour of four o'clock.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Will that allow for the exemption from taxation of such tracts?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Under this proposed amendment of mine it would permit persons who wished to grow timber originally planted by the person who owned the land and devoted it exclusively to timber—they would be privileged under the laws as made under this proposal; but suppose we don't say "original" and say "growing of forest trees." That might be held to cover such pasture lands as I have described. They might seek to escape from taxation upon large areas of land covered with shrubbery growth, and I think "original growing of forest trees" in there would safeguard somewhat. It would then read: "Laws may be passed to encourage the propagation, planting and cultivation of forestry and exempting from taxation, in whole or in part, wood lots or plantations devoted exclusively to forestry"—there is the end of the "exclusively"—"or to the original growing of forest trees." Now, the "growing of forest trees" does not come under the restrictive meaning of the word "exclusively," so I say "original growing of forest trees" would safeguard that so no one could take unfair advantage of it.

Mr. ULMER: I do not think it is necessary to have a very extended debate upon this proposal.

This is a matter of public economy. The protection of forests and the reforestation of land is something of great value to all the people in the state. The value is not alone confined to the owner of the forests, but it is a general good. As I understand the purpose of this proposal, it is to encourage reforestation and also to give the legislature power to buy land which is of little value for agricultural purposes for the purpose of reforestation. We certainly should give the legislature that power. In all European countries you find that the government takes extra care of forest land. Every government over there owns great tracts of forests, and these forests are valuable, not only in the form of timber, but as a protector of moisture to the land, and a protector and regulator of the flowing of water.

It is all out of place to raise these questions of detail. This is not a place to deal with all these minor questions of detail. We are passing on matters of general principle here. I think that we should give the legislature the power to pass such laws and let them work out the details. We can not work out the details of everything we do here. Let us adopt the principle and then it is up to the legislature to see that speculation can not slip in.

Now, as to the matter of mines, we all know that our riches in the earth are to a great extent wasted, not only to this present generation, but to the generations to come, and proper and economic handling of those matters would be a saving both to us and to them. We should not waste anything, but should save all that is possible for future generations. The regulation of mining is a matter in which the state should take a hand. The mining disasters we have had in this country are simply horrible to contemplate. Hardly a week passes that we do not see in the paper where ten or twenty or a hundred lives have been lost. Is it not the province of the state to protect the men who go down into the bowels of the earth from the speculator who has no sympathy and does not care for life because human life is the cheapest thing in the market today? Therefore, I say the part of this proposal dealing with mines is a just and proper regulation.

As to the water power, I think the streams belong to the whole people, and the state should have control over them. When any company or corporation in any part of the state produces power to sell to the people of the state the state should have it in its power to protect its people and to fix what the company should pay for this right in the first place, when it is buying its franchise, and at what price it shall sell the product of this water power.

What have they in the little country of Switzerland? After electricity, the great inventions came up. How long did it take that people to see the value of their natural resources? They have an immense amount of water power there, and the people, through the initiative, reserved all the water power rights to the government. Any corporation that wants to use some of the water power has to go to the government, and the government says what that company shall pay for the right and fixes the price at which the company can sell its product to the people. I think we should have the same thing.

In fact, from a careful perusal of this proposal, I can see nothing wrong whatever in the proposal. It is all good. There is not one word of wrong in it, and wherever anything develops from which a private corporation could try to take undue advantage the legislature can handle it. I hope the proposal will pass without any substantial change.

Mr. FOX: I want to ask Mr. Leete a question. I didn't understand something in his paper. In Mercer county we have the largest reservoir in the state, the largest artificial body of water in the world. There is a movement on foot now by some organization in the northwestern part of the state to get water from this reservoir by leading other reservoirs into this Mercer county reservoir, thereby bringing the water to a higher level. In that way, south of the reservoir, the water will back into the farms, and thus thousands of acres will be under water. Would this interfere with that in anyway at all?

Mr. LEETE: I am not familiar with the conditions there, but under the conditions of this proposal if any persons are injured in any way or form they will have to receive compensation for whatever damage is done. Whatever damage is done by reason of the development of water power that damage must be paid before the parties developing the water power may take it, in the same manner in which condemnation for railroad purposes is done. I do not really understand your conditions there. In fact, I understand there is a reservoir there and the development of power contemplates the raising of your reservoir so that there can be a constant flow of water there.

Mr. FOX: Yes; they want to lead other areas into that.

Mr. LEETE: We want the state to say where the conservation shall be, and what shall be the plan by which the excess water falling on the watershed shall be taken care of. That will all be studied out and worked to one scientific end.

Mr. FOX: I don't exactly understand it. I would like to be in favor of this proposal, but if it would permit any such a thing as that—the flooding of those thousands of acres in my county—I shall certainly have to vote against it. The farmers received $34,000 a few years ago for damages sustained, and they had to earn it twice before they got it. I think proper protection should be provided. A thousand additional acres would be under water.

Mr. BEYER: I would like to have a slight amendment made to this proposal, and I beg the indulgence of the Convention for a few minutes to explain why I want this amendment and exactly how I want it.

I heard some doubt expressed as to the importance of this question. There can be none. Any one who thinks it is not important is wrong. We spent three weeks on some questions, and if we make a mistake in settling them we have a chance to correct them and change them in a year or two, but there was a mistake made by our nation in destroying our woods which never can be made good, and I think it is now our duty to do the best we can to save what is left of the national forests. Of the forests that our forefathers found when they came to our eastern shores nothing is left but a few crippled trees. Travel along any railroad and look out of the windows of the car and see for yourselves.

It was suggested a few weeks ago on this floor that all development and industry in this country will have to be dug out of the soil by the farmers. That may be true to a certain extent, but the farmer himself and the good machinery on his farm will not get him good crops. Those depend on two things; the first is the soil and the second is the condition of the climate. If we remove all our forests the fertility of the soil will be gone in a short time. It will be washed off and it never can be replaced, and if our woods are cut down and the winds and the storms have a chance to sweep over the country, it will not be possible to do good farming any more. Why is it that our wheat fields all over Ohio are bare? Why is it we have to go over and sow them in oats and thousands and thousands of bushels of wheat are lost? Why is it we pay $15 a bushel for clover seed? Some people say the farmers make money, but they don't with clover seed at $15 a bushel. We don't sell clover seed; we have to buy it, and then, when we pay that awful price for it, it is doubtful if we will have a crop. Why is it that dams in the rivers can not hold the immense floods that we have every spring? Because the rain fall is not regulated any more by our woods, and it comes down and runs off all at once. There is nothing to hold it in the ground, and finally, after the water has gone, we have a dry spell. That is the reason cloverseed is up to such an enormous price. It is because we have cut down our woods and can't do anything else to remedy the evil but replant our woods by reforestation.

History is the best teacher of mankind, we say. Now let us go back to some other country. The Holy Land was the land of milk and honey, but if you go there today it is a desert. Why? They cut down all the cedar forests from their mountains.

Spain four hundred years ago was one of the richest nations on the earth under Charles V. What is it today? A few regiments of soldiers and a few vessels were sufficient to whip that nation. France for centuries conserved her forests, but the kings were finally destroyed, the Revolution came and everybody thought they could do as they pleased. They cut down all the forests and France has spent millions and millions of francs to replant them, but could not do it on the mountains. We haven't done much better. They say we are progressive and we are industrious. That is true in many respects, but we haven't been in this respect. Statistics will show that in England, Scotland, and Ireland they raise thirty-five bushels of wheat to an acre. We raise from nine to twelve, in spite of the virginity of our soil. Why it is? Because the moisture is not distributed any more. Gentlemen, we have an opportunity here. Let us do something to get our forests back and preserve what is left of them. Let us put the rest of our forests under management, and let us replant such tracts of land as are not much good for any other purpose. I have read the statistics of the state of Ohio and I see that there are ten counties that have from six thousand to fifteen thousand acres of land reported no good for any other purpose. Why can't we see that these tracts of land will be given to the county to make forest reservations? In forty years from now it will be grown up to such an extent that those counties will not have to pay a single cent of local tax. All the income necessary could be derived from the timber land. They have this in other countries and it will pay us, and pay us better than to clear the land, which itself won't grow much, and by the clearing of which our other land is deteriorated. I would like to have not only state forest reserves, but county and township and municipal forest reserves. I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "purpose" in line 9 insert "by counties, townships and municipalities".

Mr. STOKES: I move the previous question on the pending amendments.

The PRESIDENT: The question is, Shall the debate be closed on the pending amendment? The effect is to bring to a vote the three pending amendments.

The main question was ordered.

A vote being further taken on the amendment offered by the delegate from Hancock [Mr. BEYER] the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Highland.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: May I have the consent of the Convention to make a few words of explanation?

DELEGATES: No.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the amendment of the delegate from Columbiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out the following: "and exempting from taxation, in whole or in part, wood lots or plantations devoted exclusively to forestry or to the growing of forest trees."

Mr. KING: Several have objected to me to that clause in this proposal and I am convinced myself that it is conferring a very broad power upon the legislature and not in that part of the constitution which will be devoted to the subject of taxation. Therefore, I don't think it belongs in this proposal, and it ought not to be conferred at this time.

Mr. MILLER, of Fairfield: I just want to read in connection with this the state tax commission's report to Governor Harmon:

The commission suggests that the constitution might well be so amended as to place beyond doubt or question the power of the state to levy taxes on incomes, inheritances and the production of minerals; and also to permit the exemption of timbered tracts of land from taxation in order to encourage forestry.

I hope the amendment will be defeated and I move to table it.

The motion was carried.

Mr. STEVENS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after line 3 and insert the following:

"The legislative authority shall have full power to provide for the conservation of all the natural resources of the state and to that end, may pass laws to encourage forestry, regulate the production of coal, oil and gas and preserve and control the water power of the streams."

Mr. STEVENS: If you will refer in your proposal book to Sub-Proposal No. 64 it will enable you more readily to see the purpose of this amendment. It seems to me up to this time in the discussion of the matter we have gotten the thing in a sadly complicated condition.

It was not in the best condition as to language at the start, but the discussion has rendered it more complicated than before. The amendment I propose seeks to do everything that anybody suggests toward the conservation of the natural resources of the state, and if I know anything about the English language I believe I have expressed it in shape to meet the purposes intended. I will read it: Strike out all after line 3 and insert "the legislative authority"—that is not only the general assembly, but the people at large under the initiative and referendum—"shall have full power to provide for the conservation of all the natural resources of the state"—could anything be more comprehensive than that?

Could anything reach the purpose better than that?—"and to that end may pass laws to encourage forestry, regulate the production of coal, oil and gas and preserve and control the water power of the streams."

Everybody knows the principal waste is in coal, oil and gas, and under this amendment all of that can be provided for by proper legislation as time goes on and necessity arises. This does all that the other does and it does it in good, plain English, and anybody can understand it, and when it comes to the legislature they will know exactly what it means. There is no room for misunderstanding if you pass my amendment. Let us get one amendment expressed in good, strong, expressive English so that somebody will know what it means.

Mr. DOTY: If your amendment were adopted and placed in the constitution could the legislature, if it wanted to, conserve forestry in this state by exempting from taxation certain tracts of land devoted to that purpose, if in their judgment they thought it was wise to do so—could they do it?

Mr. STEVENS: By passing a bill to do it they could.

Conservation of Natural Resources.

Mr. DOTY: But would they have that power under this amendment?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; if you want to encourage anything or do anything is not the best way to encourage it to go out and set an example? That is the best way to do it.

Mr. DOTY: There may be some other way, but suppose the general assembly decides that the best way in their judgment to conserve forestry is to exempt forest land from taxation. How could they do it?

Mr. STEVENS: By passing a bill for that purpose.

Mr. DOTY: Don't you know another part of the constitution prohibits exemptions from taxation, except certain things, which doesn't include this?

Mr. STEVENS: The other part is no nearer to being adopted than this.

Mr. DOTY: It is the constitution today.

Mr. STEVENS: Then take care of that when it shows up.

Mr. DOTY: Do you think the people of Ohio will do as Captain Evans wants them to do—turn everything over to the legislature on taxation?

Mr. STEVENS: I think we will finish the job.

Mr. DOTY: You want to do half a job now and half some other time?

Mr. STEVENS: I don't want to cross a bridge until I get to it.

Mr. STILWELL: In your reference to conservation of water power you limit it to "streams." Why not include lakes?

Mr. STEVENS: I rather infer that you are not going to have very much water power unless there is a stream.

Mr. STILWELL: I don't think your answer is pertinent to the question.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is. You have to have a stream before you have any water power.

Mr. STILWELL: But you have lakes as well as streams, and don't you know the state has no streams?

Mr. STEVENS: I don't say "state streams". I say "streams".

Mr. LAMPSON: Would not there have to be an exemption for that class of property specially named in order to take it from the prohibition of the uniform rule in the constitution?

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly, and if this Convention wants to do that they can do it by that means better than by putting it in here. That is the easiest way.

Mr. DWYER: The power to exempt from taxation is strictly construed and must be specific. There must be specific power to the legislature to relieve from taxation, otherwise the legislature can not do it, and therefore you must have it specifically granted to the legislature to exempt this property.

Mr. TETLOW: I want to analyze the situation just a moment. In the first place we have three proposals coming to this Convention that provide for conservation of our natural resources. One is by Mr. Miller, of Fairfield, exempting forest land from taxation; one from Mr. Leete in reference to water power and one by myself with reference to the minerals of the state. My proposal was amended in the Judiciary committee to cover all the natural resources of the state. The original number of my proposal is 230. Yesterday we had a special committee to take the three proposals and concluded to deal with the question all at once, so that we could discuss the subject intelligently. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS] is adopted everything aimed at in my proposal is defeated. The only thing you can do to conserve the mineral resources of the state, so far as applicable to coal, is taken away. We have lost since mining began two hundred and fifty million tons of coal by wasteful methods. If you want in the future to conserve those minerals and prevent that waste it can only be done by regulating the methods of mining. You can not save this coal by enacting laws for the production of coal. We do not want to limit production. If we can produce one hundred million tons annually, let us do it. Let us get all of the coal out of the ground, but let us not lose any. We don't want to limit production. What we want to do is to save all the coal in the ground to the people who live upon the top of it and not leave millions of tons underneath, lost forever. This proposal now before the Convention provides for regulating the method of mining, and that is the only way to conserve the minerals. The amendment also eliminates the question of regulating the weighing and measuring and marketing of the minerals, and that is one thing we want above all the others. I move that the amendment offered by the member from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS] be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. WOODS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 5 strike out "and exempting from taxation, in whole or in part."

Mr. WOODS: I want to vote for this proposal, but I do not want to vote in this way on matters of taxation. I do not think the farmer members of this body can afford to do it. If you are singletaxers vote for it. The principle is involved right in this proposition before you now. If you don't want to get that principle started in the constitution cut that out. I want to support the proposal, but I am opposed to this thing of everlastingly exempting property from taxation. We ought to be going the other way.

Mr. HARTER, of Huron: Do we need any encouragement to reforest land?

Mr. WOODS: I have never studied that.

Mr. HALFHILL: As I understand it that is the only thing that this is put in here for—to encourage it.

Mr. WOODS: If you take this out the general assembly can pass laws to encourage it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you say they can do it now?

Mr. WOODS: It is a question in my mind whether they can not do it. I am strongly for conservation and I am willing to have the proposal strong.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Is any farmer going to take his broken land and set out young trees and reforest it unless some encouragement is given?

Mr. Lampson here took the chair as president pro tem.

Mr. WOODS: This doesn't provide for the farmer to do it. The state may buy up the land and do it. It may be done in many different ways under this proposal. I don't know how they intend to do it. I don't think we should say how it shall be done, but we simply should say it may be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: My understanding is that it is to allow young timber to grow; partially exempting the land from taxation.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Do I understand you to say that some farmers would be against exempting timber land from taxation?

Mr. WOODS: I said I didn't think the farmer members of this Convention in face of what they will have to meet in a few days can vote for this. I don't want to see you vote one way on this and then turn around and vote another way a little later on.

Mr. PECK: Is not this substantially the same proposition just made by Judge King and voted down?

Mr. WOODS: No; I only take part of Judge King's amendment.

Mr. PECK: But it is the substance?

Mr. WOODS: I was for his amendment.

Mr. PECK: And it was voted down promptly. Now I move that we lay this on the table.

The vote being taken the amendment of the delegate from Medina [Mr. Woods] was laid on the table.

Mr. MARRIOTT: Now I move the previous question on the whole thing.

The previous question was regularly demanded and a vote being taken the main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the passage of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 91, nays 12, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 64—Mr. Miller, of Fairfield. Relative to the conservation of our natural resources.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws may be passed to encourage the propagation, planting and cultivation of forestry and exempting from taxation, in whole or in part, wood lots or plantations devoted exclusively to forestry or to the growing of forest trees; and also provide for reforestation and holding as forest reserves such lands or parts of lands as has been or may be forfeited to the state, and may authorize the acquiring of other lands for that purpose; also to provide for the conservation of all natural resources of the state, including all streams, lakes, submerged and swamp lands or other collections of water within the boundaries of the state, and for the formation of conservation districts; and shall provide for the regulation of all force, energy and power developed or to be developed from said water; and shall provide for the regulation of methods of mining, weighing, measuring and marketing of all minerals.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. DOTY: I now call up the committee's report on Proposal No. 291.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The secretary will read the report.

Mr. DOTY: I don't want it read. It was reported and read yesterday.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The secretary will read the proposal.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HALFHILL: I file the report of a minority of this committee:

The report was read as follows:

A minority of the Initiative and Referendum committee, to which was referred Proposal No. 291, entitled "To submit an amendment to the constitution relative to the recall of public officers, submit as a minority report the following:

Section 1a of the proposal agreed to by the majority report describes the scope, purpose and intent of this proposal and is in the following words, viz:

"Every elective public officer of the state of Ohio, or of any of its political subdivisions, may be removed from office at any time, by the electors entitled to vote for a successor of such officer, through the procedure and in the manner herein provided for, which procedure shall be known as the recall, and is in addition to any other method of removal provided by law."

That for the purposes of this minority report it is not necessary to consider any of the subsequent sections of said proposal, for in its entirety it is obnoxious to the spirit of our institutions and is a supplemental blow aimed at the integrity of representative government.

Recall of Public Officers.

That the judges of our courts, being also elective public officers in this state and included within the scope of this proposal, the same is a gratuitous assault upon the honor and integrity of our judiciary, and no condition subsists or has ever existed in Ohio, that remotely justifies creating any such procedure, or making it a part of our fundamental law.

That the duties of every elective public officer of this state are defined by the law of the land, which law their oath of office compels them to obey and support, and if any transgress this obligation they should be tried by the law on charge duly made, before a proper tribunal, with orderly procedure under rules of evidence acknowledged and subsisting in all stable governments, and they should not be assailed from the hustings and tried at the polls by popular tumult or be compelled to face destruction of their honor through a verdict rendered by clamor, corruption, or partisan prejudice.

Therefore, if present methods of impeachment and trial for an unfaithful public official are deemed cumbersome or inefficient, we recommend such change in the organic law as will meet and remedy any condition fairly shown to exist, and we further earnestly recommend that the majority report be not adopted and that Proposal No. 291 be indefinitely postponed.

JAMES W. HALFHILL, CHAS. O. DUNLAP,
E. L. LAMPSON, NELSON W. EVANS.

Mr. HALFHILL: Gentlemen of the Convention: A minority of the Initiative and Referendum committee, in dealing with substitute Proposal No. 291, have filed a report here in which they recommend that the majority report be not adopted, and that this Proposal No. 291 be indefinitely postponed. The substance and scope and purpose of Proposal No. 291 as embodied in the report of the majority of the committee is properly set forth and can be better explained by a reading of section 1a than in any other way.

This section, agreed to by a majority of the committee, is in the following words:

SECTION 1a. Every elective public officer of the state of Ohio or of any of its political subdivisions, may be removed from office at any time, by the electors entitled to vote for a successor of such officer, through the procedure and in the manner herein provided for, which procedure shall be known as the recall, and is in addition to any other method of removal provided by law.

So I take it, that sufficiently explains what is embodied in this proposal and sufficiently explains the purpose of this minority of the committee in submitting to you the report recommending its indefinite postponement.

In other words, I do not see that it is necessary, upon such a report as we present here, for the minority to attempt to analyze or discuss the good or bad features of this particular report, inasmuch as we are objecting to it upon principle. I would admit, for the purpose of argument in discussing the body of the report in all details, it has had removed from it some of the features of the recall as it appears in some of the western states where it has been adopted, meaning those features which are most objectionable, but the reason we have assigned in the minority report can be properly stated or paraphrased about as follows:

It is our belief that such a proposal as No. 291, if made a part of the constitution of Ohio, would in fact be a supplemental blow aimed at the integrity of representative government. And some of us who have discussed these other two heavenly twins of recent birth, the initiative and referendum, which accompany the recall, have so expressed ourselves heretofore to the Convention that you at least know in a measure the views of the member who now addresses you upon this particular question.

The proposal states that the judges of our courts, being also elective public officers, are included within the scope of this report, and that is attempted to be made a part of the constitution. I say that the proposal so states, which is not really a correct statement, but the proposal declares that all elective officers in the state of Ohio shall be subjected to the provisions of the recall as defined in the proposal, and inasmuch as all of our judges of all of our courts, from the supreme court down to the most petty court, are elective officers, then the provisions would extend to them.

The time of the gentleman here expired and on motion was extended ten minutes.

Mr. MARRIOTT: I don't think the gentleman is bound by the ten-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: This is a question upon a minority report of the committee. We have not reached the second reading where fifteen and thirty minutes are allowed. This is to be treated as an ordinary amendment.

Mr. HALFHILL: We submit that judges, being all elective officers, a proposition to engraft the recall into the constitution is in fact a gratuitous assault upon the honor and integrity of the judiciary in Ohio, and that no condition exists or ever has existed that remotely justifies creating any such procedure or making it a part of our constitution. I have not heard at any time any assault made upon the courts of Ohio that has been backed by any real or genuine reason that would justify a changing of the ordinary and accepted way of impeaching public officers, or resorting to a method which is practically new and only a matter of experiment. And we further submit as a portion of the reasons for recommending the indefinite postponement of this proposal that the duties of every elective public officer in the state of Ohio are defined by the law of the land, which law their oath of office compels them to support, and if any transgress this obligation they should be tried by the law on charge duly made before a proper tribunal, with orderly procedure under the rules of evidence acknowledged and subsisting in all stable governments, and that they should not be assaulted from the hustings and tried at the polls by popular tumult, or be compelled to face destruction of their honor on a verdict influenced or rendered by clamor, corruption or partisan prejudice, and just the conditions I have enumerated would follow if a law were passed putting into operation the recall of judges.

Recall of Public Officers.

Now, gentlemen of the Convention, if it shall be found upon examination of our law, either the fundamental law of Ohio or the statute law of Ohio that there is not now an ample remedy whereby we can reach and cure any defects that ought to be reached and cured for the purpose of removing from office an unfaithful public servant, can we not remedy the method by impeachment, and can we not provide a way in which the public servant who is charged with having transgressed his oath of office can come into court or come into some tribunal, and be met face to face with his accusers, and have the evidence introduced and have the verdict rendered by an impartial tribunal rather than by a general vote at the polls? Who could state a proper indictment in two hundred words, and who could state a defense in two hundred words, upon a question that might affect the honor and integrity of a man to the extent of destroying his entire usefulness as a citizen? And we know that there are occasions in which public prejudice is great and public feeling runs high, in which even the office of judge, as great as it is and as respected as it is, might be dragged down, and the judge himself humiliated and his usefulness proscribed by a popular vote at the polls, influenced by prejudice and passion, whereas in truth and in fact, he was not guilty as charged.

The recall is claimed to be justified by the fact that any representative is but a general agent of all the people, and that being only a general agent of all the people that agency can be determined at any time by the people, and that we can by recall of the agent put an end to the agency. But I submit, if you are going to discuss it on that line, and all the writers in favor of the recall do so discuss it, that the parallel is not correct, and the representative is not the agent, and those rules of law should not apply because the agent always acts in the name of his principal and binds his principal, which is the people; and if you are going to insist upon legal terms in discussing this question, that the representative is a trustee, and a trustee always acts for and on his own account to the extent of being personally responsible, what is he responsible for? He is responsible for observing his oath, and his oath requires him to support the constitution and the law, and if he transgresses his oath he, personally, is responsible, and his beneficiary should have the right to take him into court before the proper tribunal and impeach him and remove him from office. Those are the conditions we think should obtain in a civilized community and in a great state like Ohio. We feel that you could easily remedy the defects in the law of impeachment if they are shown to exist, and even if it is necessary put the remedy into the fundamental law, but this particular method of removing public officers should not be engrafted upon the fundamental law of the state of Ohio.

Mr. DOTY: I wish to demand the yeas and nays on this when the vote is taken. I don't want it overlooked.

Mr. FACKLER: Gentlemen of the Convention: I think we ought to realize exactly the question that is raised by this minority report. The report does not undertake to criticize the majority report or the proposal, but it undertakes to say there should not be any means whatsoever provided by law in this state whereby the sovereign citizen may say to his servant, "You are misrepresenting rather than representing me, and I want to stop your power to misrepresent." This is exactly the position in which this minority report places you. It does not go to the merits of the specific proposal before the Convention, but says it is not possible to draw any provision providing for popular removal of officers that will be satisfactory.

Now the gentleman who has just preceded me spoke about the recall of judges. That is going to the merits of our proposal, and if the Convention in adopting the recall proposition sees fit to embody the proposition with reference to the judges, it can do so, but in agreeing to the minority report you say no official—executive, legislative or judicial—shall be subjected to recall. Again we hear the cry that representative government is being assaulted. What is representative government? It is a government in which the man who for the time is exercising power is acting presumably in the interest of a majority of the people, and if a majority of the people are of the opinion that he is not so acting why should not they have a right to remove him? Is not that making it truly representative? We have seen very often men elected to a position and after they were elected they would right-about-face and no longer represent the men who elected them, but misrepresent them. How many cases of that kind have you had in legislative bodies? How many on the part of executives in this country? And when we say, "Just leave the power in the hands of the people all the time in order that the official may have as much regard for the citizen after the election as before," I do not see that there is anything very revolutionary about that.

But they say it is not right that the official "should be assailed from the hustings and tried at the polls in tumult." I will wager when the gentlemen were all conducting their campaigns before their counties they didn't say they were going out and appealing on the hustings in tumult. By what wonderful transformation is it that the intelligent electorates which sent these men to the Convention became after election day an insane mob, and continue insane, mark you, until a few years later, two or four or six years later, at the statutory period, they have another lucid interval and the electors of the state are again qualified to vote for the men who shall lead them? Men who believe in the recall believe in the sanity of the American people all the time, and that they are just as capable the day after the election to pass upon the qualifications of men who are to have the elective offices as they were on election day—nay, much better qualified, after the official has been tried and tested, to pass upon his qualifications and abilities than before they found him out.

We need not be afraid of this recall. No argument has been offered before you, and can not be, to show it has worked badly where it has been tried. It has not overturned representative government. It has made it more truly representative, and I ask you to vote down this minority report and place this question before the Convention on its merits and let us argue it out.

Mr. EVANS: Is it the expectation of the majority of this committee that from this time forward in the history of Ohio we shall only elect rascals to office that we have to recall?

Mr. FACKLER: No, but we do expect sometimes to elect rascals to office, and when we do elect rascals to office we want to let the people have a chance to take them out of office.

Mr. DWYER: The gentleman himself would come under this recall—

Mr. FACKLER: Yes; I am willing to place myself before the people to represent their will and be subject to recall when I don't.

Mr. PECK: I am very glad to be able for once to agree with the gentleman from Allen. He and I have disagreed many times and although I have great respect for the force and ingenuity with which he has presented his propositions, I have disagreed generally with them. I believe we voted together only once or twice, but I think we are going to vote together on this proposition.

I do not believe in the recall in Ohio. I am opposed to it and I hope the Convention will take the short way of putting an end to this business by adopting the minority report. I don't think the majority report should have been brought in here. I do not believe there is any necessity for the recall in Ohio. Our terms of office are so short that any practical application of the recall will keep the state, the counties, the localities, in a turmoil all the time, and if you want to disgust the people and make them disregardful of public life just give them elections all the time, morning, noon and night, breakfast, dinner and supper.

Mr. FACKLER: Has the gentleman read the proposition before the Convention to see that only at regular November elections officials can be recalled?

Mr. PECK: What good will it do? You elect a man and you have to wait a year before you recall him. In another year he would be out. I tell you there is no necessity for it. You have only two-year terms for most of the officers, and at the end of that time, if he has not done well, recall him. Most of them are anxious to be re-elected and the judicial term is short. This measure simply tends to keep the state in a turmoil for no good purpose.

Now look at it on general principles. Every man elected in our state and country has a certain number of opponents. They are his active critics. He goes into office subject to that sort of criticism and it won't take much for his opponents in many of the cases to bring about a cry for a recall. I don't want that sort of business. I don't believe it would be a good, a healthy or a proper policy. I do not want a government of factions that will be trying to drive this man out or put that one in. The people can proceed in an orderly and methodical way every two years to change their officers. They have done so and our experience with elective officers in the state of Ohio has been good. I have asserted in Cincinnati time and time again that the most courteous, polite and attentive officers were the men who were elected by the people. They have generally been efficient. There have been exceptions, but they were few, and the officers elected have done their duty and done it well, and their appointees have done their duty, and I see no reason why we should provide means for faction and opposition to create turmoil about every fellow elected to office and try to overturn the government. When the regular time for election comes around the people can take care of it. I am "forinst" the recall.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I also plead guilty of being in accord with the gentleman from Allen on this proposition, although I am frank enough to say that the recall embraced in this majority report is the most conservative recall proposition that I have ever read.

I am not dogmatic in my attitude of opposition to the recall of the administrative, legislative and executive officials, but I do not believe it sound public policy to make use of the recall in reference to either of them. I recognize that there may be some merit in the contention that as the executive, legislative and administrative officials, under our theory of government, are elected by the majority of the people, and supposedly to represent the preference of the majority on the particular political or other issue that may be before them at the time of the election, if the said officials fail to carry out the wishes of the majority which elected them, that same majority might have the right to recall them. Even this point of view, however, is based on the supposition that the same majority which elected them must recall, but not a part of that majority, added to the minority, which latter first opposed and voted against them. I trust you will grasp and appreciate the force of this proposition, because it ought to have a very important influence in determining the action of the present proponents of the recall.

An elected official whose duties are either administrative or executive is subject to being "ousted" from office under the theory of the advocates of the recall when the minority who voted against his original election, and therefore against the policies which he is supposed to represent, united with a sufficient number of the dissatisfied majority to create a new majority, which has the power to put the seal of condemnation upon this official who was elected but a short time before, and for a fixed term, to represent the political wishes of a majority, the greater part of whom are still in sympathy with the political views and actions of the official in question. It seems to me that this subverts the whole theory of our government. Is it unreasonable to suppose that the just-defeated political party, which is then the minority, will not always join with a discontented percentage of the majority to turn their minority into a majority? This would be the cleverest politics, if for no other purpose than to disrupt the majority party.

I have given you the view simply from the political standpoint. I am equally opposed to the proposition from sound public policy, because all of our public officials, executive, legislative and administrative, are elected for a comparatively short term. If there be dissatisfaction with their conduct the people have the opportunity within a very few years, generally not exceeding three, in most cases two years, to dismiss incapable or corrupt officials. In my judgment the injury that can be done by a public official during a short period of two or three years is slight, and the damage to the public interest not nearly so great as the inconvenience and demoralization of the public service by the recall, which, as before stated, can be accomplished by the original opposing minority plus a small percentage of the original majority. In my mind stability of government, whether of municipality, county or state, is as essential for successful administration in the interests of all the people, as is stability in the management of business affairs. Especially do I consider the recall ill-advised and wholly unnecessary where we have the far greater and more democratic political instrument at our hands, namely, the initiative and referendum. In reference to the recall of the judiciary my opposition to this is as irrevocable as were the laws of the Medes and Persians. Elective judges, although owing their title to their office by reason of the majority or plurality vote of the electorate, are not elected to carry out the wishes or political ideals of the majority or plurality vote which gave them title to their office. They are elected solely to expound the law, and this expounding of the law has absolutely no connection whatsoever with the wishes or political ideals of either the majority or the minority. The judiciary take a most solemn oath and assume the greatest moral and legal obligation when they take their office to absolutely ignore the wishes or ideals of the majority or the minority. Every elector, in casting his ballot for a judge, does so with the tacit understanding on his part that, so far as the candidates for judgeship is capable of doing, he will decide every case that is presented to him solely on its merits; that he will expound the law as he understands it, and that he will not be governed by the wishes of majorities any more than he would be governed by the wishes of a single individual out of that same majority. Any other view would mean anarchy, socially and politically. Personally, I have always advocated a limited tenure for the judiciary, so that in the event of a corrupt judge (possibly the greatest evil that can afflict humankind) he can be got rid of by failure of re-election at the expiration of his term, for I recognize that impeachment is very unsatisfactory, and, where the judge is mentally corrupt, or at least where there is no evidence of what I would call physical corruption, it is practically impossible to get rid of him by impeachment proceedings.

Mr. DONAHEY: I move that the majority and minority reports be laid on the table.

Elson,	Matthews,	Worthington.

The president announced that ninety-two members had answered to their names.

Mr. CORDES: [During roll call]. The gentleman from Wyandot has a leave of absence—

Mr. DOTY: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that all further proceedings under the call of the Convention be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The president wishes to report a mistake in announcing the vote last night. The vote was forty-nine in favor of the motion to table and forty-eight against. So the report of the committee and the minority report are both tabled and the question is on engrossment.

Mr. LAMPSON: Engrossment of what?

The PRESIDENT: Engrossment of Proposal No. 291.

Mr. LAMPSON: I make the point of order that the proposal was included in the majority report which went to the table. The report is an entirety and it can not be separated. If the secretary will read the majority report he will find that the original proposal is named in the body of the report.

The secretary [reading]:

Mr. Fackler submitted the following report: The standing committee on Initiative and Referendum, to which was referred Proposal No. 291—Mr. Watson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended.

Mr. LAMPSON: The report is back with the "following amendments." The report in its entirety is laid on the table and it takes with it all the papers which accompanied it. Under our rules all the papers referred to the committee when the report is made are reported back. Whatever they may be, they are part of the report. Our rules recognize as a distinct thing reports, proposals and amendments. Rule No. 57 reads as follows:

The laying of an amendment upon the table, or its indefinite postponement, does not carry to the table the proposition sought to be amended.

But that rule distinctly refers to the laying of an amendment on the table. This is the laying of a report on the table, an entirely different thing, which under the rules is treated as a distinct thing, and whenever the report went to the table it carried with it all the papers connected with it, and in this particular case the proposal itself is named right in the body of the report and the report can not be separated.

Mr. DOTY: If the point of order were sustained, it would violate every principle upon which the rules of this Convention are builded. These rules under which we are operating are similar to the rules of the house of representatives of this state which have been in force for many years. They are built upon the theory that looks to the life of a measure. The whole tendency of the rule is to preserve the life of the proposal and not for its death. That is shown by our Rule No. 57, which makes it possible for this Convention to stop debate upon an amendment without touching the life of the main question. It resolves itself back to what is the main question now before this Convention? What was the main question when this report was made? When the committee reported back Proposal No. 291 with some amendments, the next step of that proposal under our rules was engrossment. That was the main question. I am speaking of the majority report, because the principle is the same no matter how many minority reports we have. The majority of the committee recommended what? That that proposal, which was before the Convention and which was a thing by itself, shall be passed, provided the amendments that the committee proposed are incorporated. Mark you, there are two things, the proposal itself, the next stage of which is engrossment, and the subsidiary proposition amending it first before it gets to a final vote on the main question. It is just exactly like we are doing here every day when we propose an amendment to a proposal. Sometimes we lay that amendment on the table. Here, instead of a member offering an amendment, the committee proposes an amendment, and by our action we laid that amendment on the table. That sort of motion under a proper and fair interpretation of Rule No. 57 lays the amendment itself on the table and does not go to the main proposition. There can be only one main proposition under any circumstances. At various stages of our process in getting these measures through, the main question is sometimes one thing and sometimes another.

Recall of Public Officers.

Mr. DWYER: The motion to lay on the table embraced both. The motion was to lay the report and the amendments on the table.

Mr. DOTY: If that had been the motion I would be wrong, but I will read the record. I heard the motion made.

Mr. DWYER: I heard the motion made too, and it embraced the whole thing.

Mr. DOTY: The record reads: "Mr. Donahey moved that the majority report and the minority report be laid on the table." So there was nothnig said about the main proposition. The main proposition before the Convention was only one thing and that was engrossment.

Mr. LAMPSON: Will you allow me a suggestion?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: We hadn't reached the second stage and before we reached that we laid both reports on the table.

Mr. DOTY: We reached that stage right after the report had been read the second time.

Mr. LAMPSON: We had referred it to a committee—

Mr. DOTY: That is not a stage necessary to the life of any bill, as the member knows. We can introduce a proposal right now and not refer it to a committee and carry it to engrossment the next stage, but you cannot take it from first reading to second reading without engrossment.

Mr. KNIGHT: Under the gentleman's theory, where is the proposal?

Mr. DOTY: Before the Convention on the question of engrossment.

Mr. KNIGHT: How did it get there?

Mr. DOTY: By being returned to the house by the committee to which it was committed.

Mr. KNIGHT: Embodied in their report?

Mr. DOTY: The proposal is not embodied in their report. I defy anybody to show it. It is referred to in the report because necessarily the report must refer to something. But it is not embodied in the report, as the member from Franklin [Mr. KNIGHT] well knows.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose we grant what you say about where the proposal is now. When we recessed, according to your idea, it was suspended in the air above the table? Did it drop when we recessed?

Mr. DOTY: What happens when we recess when the member from Ashtabula has the floor? Does he drop on the floor or is he suspended in the air?

Mr. LAMPSON: I don't stand on the floor.

Mr. DOTY: No, you go to lunch, but you come back and demand your rights. We have been doing that so many times that I think even the member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] understands that. When we recess whatever right a proposition has it retains.

Mr. LAMPSON: When before in this Convention upon presentation of a report and action upon it have we considered that the proposal was an independent report? At no time in the proceedings of this Convention have we separated a proposal from our action on the report.

Mr. DOTY: We have done it every time we have acted. There is never a time that we don't act separately. The first thing we do when the report of a committee comes in is to act upon the report, which is what? To amend the bill before engrossment.

Mr. LAMPSON: To postpone a report carries with it the report and everything connected.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, the postponement of a whole proposition, as we did the other night, when the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] made a motion to postpone the whole thing, and the whole thing was postponed. It was not killed and it came up at the time to which it was postponed, at the same stage and in the same condition as when the gentleman asked to have it postponed.

Mr. LAMPSON: If it were not for Rule No. 57 would you contend—

Mr. DOTY: No, that is the whole thing—Rule No. 57.

Mr. LAMPSON: You admit that under general parliamentary law the proposal went with it?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; and just right there—that is what I said when I started in, that our rules looked to the life of a proposition rather than to its technical death. That is the very reason we have Rule No. 57 in our rules.

Mr. LAMPSON: Laying the proposition upon the table does not necessarily kill it. We have rules for taking it from the table.

Mr. DOTY: I know, but it comes near killing it. For instance, there is just once a week that this Convention, by a majority vote, can take from the table any proposition that has been laid on the table. It takes a two-thirds vote any other time; that is, it takes a two-thirds vote for a suspension of the rules so that a motion to take the thing from the table can be made. Any time but Monday night it takes a two-thirds vote to get the privilege of making that motion.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you not admit that a special rule taking some particular thing out from the operation of the general rule must be construed strictly?

Mr. DOTY: I say it must be construed in accordance with the thoughts of the majority of the Convention. If a majority of the Convention desires a strict construction and desires or upholds a point of order so as to produce a strict construction looking toward the death of this or any other proposition in the same predicament, that must be the rule of the Convention.

Mr. LAMPSON: Find in Rule No. 57 anything about laying reports on the table.

Mr. DOTY: Of course, the member is simply trying to make a distinction between a report that amends and a motion that amends. That is all the difference between the member and myself. I maintain that the fair and honorable and straight interpretation of Rule No. 57, looking to the life of the proposal by Mr. Watson, is the interpretation I am contending for, and there is no difference in the parliamentary effect between a committee recommending an amendment and a member recommending an amendment. The upholding of either motion amends the proposal and that is all there is to it. Therefore, if the committee has recommended an amendment and that amendment is laid upon the table, in all fairness we are in the same shape we would have been if the member from Ashtabula had proposed an amendment and it had been laid on the table.

Mr. LAMPSON: Were only the amendments laid on the table or were both the reports laid on the table?

Recall of Public Officers.

Mr. DOTY: That is what the record shows. The report was in effect to amend. The report does not incorporate or embody the proposal itself, but just refers to it so that if it is adopted we know what proposal is adopted.

Mr. WINN: Suppose the minority report had been laid on the table—

Mr. DOTY: We would have come to a vote upon the majority report.

Mr. WINN: But if the gentleman from Ashtabula is right, why would not that carry the whole thing? The proposal is referred to there.

Mr. DOTY: You are right.

Mr. LAMPSON: If you had moved to lay the minority report upon the table that would have been the scope of the motion.

Mr. DOTY: That is what I contend for. The member from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] is right at last. If we had moved and carried a motion to lay the minority report on the table the majority report would have still been before us. Do you dispute that?

Mr. LAMPSON: No, but the motion included something else.

Mr. DOTY: We included something else. Now just use your imagination a while—

Mr. LAMPSON: I am not using imagination—

Mr. DOTY: I know you are not, you haven't any. As the gentleman from Defiance [Mr. WINN] put it, if a motion had been made to lay the minority report on the table and it had been carried where would we have been according to the legitimate carrying out of your theory? It would have carried the whole thing.

Mr. LAMPSON: No, it would not.

Mr. HALFHILL: Does that take the original proposal as it went into the hands of the committee—is it the engrossment of the original proposal that is before the Convention?

Mr. DOTY: It is, in my judgment.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then the proposal recommended by the majority of the committee you treat as an amendment?

Mr. DOTY: That is on the table and the question is on the engrossment of the original proposal, and if that question is voted upon by a yea and nay vote and is voted down that is an end of it. It is engrossed, it goes on the calendar for a second reading.

Mr. THOMAS: I suggest that the president rule.

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. LAMPSON: I respectfully appeal from the decision of the chair.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] appeals from the decision of the chair.

Mr. JONES: I do not profess to be expert upon parliamentary rules—

Mr. DOTY: There are not such things.

Mr. JONES: —or the rules of this Convention, but it does occur to me as an ordinary layman upon the subject that all that is necessary to solve the question at issue is to make a simple application of what is admitted by the two gentlemen. They both agree that under general parliamentary rules the carrying of this motion to table would carry the whole matter to the table. Now, it is contended that Rule No. 57 creates an exception to the operation of that general rule. It is only necessary to apply the familiar principle that applies to all legal propositions, that an exception to a general rule can only relate to the matter mentioned in the exception. What, therefore, in the matter mentioned in the exception? The general rule carries the whole matter, proposal and all, to the table. Now, the matter mentioned in the exception is this: "The laying of an amendment upon the table—"

Mr. WINN: I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT: State the point.

Mr. WINN: The president having ruled that the point of order of the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] is not well taken and the appeal having been taken, there is nothing before the Convention except the appeal, which is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT: An appeal is debatable and the gentleman is in order.

Mr. JONES: I again want to call your attention to the matter included in this rule that makes an exception. As I said before, the whole matter, including the proposal, in the absence of this rule is carried to the table. Now, Rule No. 57 provides this: "The laying of an amendment upon the table, or its indefinite postponement, does not carry to the table the proposition sought to be amended." So this rule only relates to action upon amendments, and this not being an action upon an amendment it is clear to my mind that the general rule obtains.

Mr. MOORE: Mr. Watson brings a proposal to this Convention, No. 291, which proposal is referred to the committee on Initiative and Referendum. That committee amends this proposal and brings its report to this Convention, which report is laid on the table. The proposal itself is just as much alive as ever. The work the committee has done has not been concurred in, but has been laid on the table, and the proposal itself is as much alive as ever.

Mr. LAMPSON: I just want to say one word. If the gentlemen will consult the journal they will find that the motion was to lay the majority report and the minority report upon the table and there was no question of amendments.

Mr. HALENKAMP: Suppose the proposal were introduced and referred to the committee and a majority of the committee in reporting it back to the Convention recommended certain amendments, and the minority of the committee recommended certain other amendments, and the amendments of neither satisfied a majority of the Convention. How could the Convention proceed so as to get action on that proposal?

Mr. LAMPSON: They can move to recommit it, they could adopt the report or proceed to amend the proposal in numerous other ways, but whenever they laid the report on the table it would be there until taken off.

Mr. HALENKAMP: They could not dispose of the majority report or the minority report—

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes, they could. They could dispose of the minority report by itself and then they could take any action on the majority report that they saw fit, but if they decided that they didn't want to consider the majority report and laid it on the table it would rest there with all it contained and with all it was connected with until taken therefrom.

Recall of Public Officers.

Mr. STEVENS: I voted for this motion to table these two reports, but I want to say that the main question up here is a question of recall, and if we are going to kill the recall in the Convention let us do it fairly and squarely and not by hair-splitting technicalities. I want the motion to prevail, but I want the prevailing of that motion to be fairly and squarely understood. Let us not have the friends of the recall, and there are lots of them in the Convention and outside, saying, after we go home and submit our report, that we wiggled the thing through and killed it while the minority was not looking.

Mr. LAMPSON: I am in entire sympathy, so far as the vote on the main proposition is concerned, with the gentleman, but this is a question of parliamentary procedure affecting not only this proposition but affecting every other one that may in like manner come before the Convention. I do not think we would allow our judgment on parliamentary proceedings to be warped by any opinion on the main proposition. I am willing to join with the gentleman in helping to bring about a fair vote on the proposition.

Mr. STEVENS: Do you not regard the main proposition as vastly more important than a parliamentary proposition?

Mr. LAMPSON: It is perfectly easy to take the main proposition from the table.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, once a week. Is it easy now?

The PRESIDENT: The president is ready to have a vote on the appeal. The president will state his reasons for making the decision. It has been the invariable practice of the president that when a report of a committee is made reporting a proposal back to the Convention to use this form: "The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee." When that motion has been carried invariably the next step has been this—the president has said with reference to all these questions: "If there be no objection the proposal will be engrossed and placed on the calendar for second reading." If objection is made at that point, clearly that objection brings before the Convention the question of engrossment, and on the license question that objection was made and a vote was had on that. It is true that in all these other questions we have hurried from that point because there has been no objection. As soon as a report of a committee is agreed to the president says: "If there is no objection the proposal will be engrossed." There has been no objection and the Convention has not taken notice of that step. It seems to me the point of the member from Cuyahoga is well taken, and at any rate the Convention suffers nothing. The decision is on the side of the greatest possible deliberation and consideration of the proposal pending.

The question now before the Convention is an appeal from the decision of the chair and the question is, Shall the decision of the chair be sustained?

Mr. HALFHILL: If I may be permitted to suggest, the simple way is to withdraw the appeal and make a move to take the two reports from the table.

Mr. LAMPSON: At the suggestion of the delegate from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] I withdraw the appeal and I move that we take the minority and majority reports from the table.

Mr. DOTY: I second the motion.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I now renew my demand for a roll call on the adoption of the minority report.

Mr. EVANS: I ask a clear statement of the question now to be voted on.

The PRESIDENT: The committee reported back this proposal with amendments. A minority report was made. The question now is on the adoption of the minority report and the secretary will read the minority report.

Mr. LAMPSON: I suggest that all the secretary need read is the recommendation of the minority report at the end of the report.

Mr. THOMAS: I want it all read so the members will know what they are voting on.

Mr. TALLMAN: The adoption of the minority report does away with the majority report.

Mr. LAMPSON: Indefinitely postpones the majority report.

The minority report was read by the secretary as follows:

A minority of the Initiative and Referendum committee, to which was referred Proposal No. 291, entitled "To submit an amendment to the constitution relative to the recall of public officers," submit as a minority report the following:

Section 1a of the proposal agreed to by the majority report describes the scope, purpose and intent of this proposal and is in the following words, viz:

"Every elective public officer of the state of Ohio, or of any of its political subdivisions, may be removed from office at any time, by the electors entitled to vote for a successor of such officer, through the procedure and in the manner herein provided for, which procedure shall be known as the recall, and is in addition to any other method of removal provided by law."

That for the purposes of this minority report it is not necessary to consider any of the subsequent sections of said proposal, for in its entirety it is obnoxious to the spirit of our institutions and is a supplemental blow aimed at the integrity of representative government.

That the judges of our courts, being also elective public officers in this state and included within the scope of this proposal, the same is a gratuitous assault upon the honor and integrity of our judiciary, and no condition subsists or has ever existed in Ohio, that remotely justifies creating any such procedure, or making it a part of our fundamental law.

That the duties of every elective public officer of this state are defined by the law of the land, which law their oath of office compels them to obey and support, and if any transgress this obligation they should be tried by the law on charge duly made, before a proper tribunal, with orderly procedure under the rules of evidence acknowledged and subsisting in all stable governments, and they should not be assailed from the hustings and tried at the polls by popular tumult or be compelled to face destruction of their honor through a verdict rendered by clamor, corruption, or partisan prejudice.

Therefore, if present methods of impeachment and trial for an unfaithful public official are deemed cumbersome or inefficient, we recommend such change in the organic law as will meet and remedy any condition fairly shown to exist, and we further earnestly recommend that the majority report be not adopted and that Proposal No. 291 be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is that all of that report?

Mr. DOTY: It is not. That is all of the report that is a report. The rest is a stump speech.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like to know what attitude we are placed in in voting upon this proposition. I am in favor of the indefinite postponement of the entire matter, but if I heard correctly yesterday there were arguments involved in that report to which I cannot subscribe. That is the reason why I might hesitate to vote for the minority report, whereas if it were a simple recommendation for indefinite postponement of the entire matter, I would be willing to vote for it, because I believe that you who are in favor of the initiative and referendum are lugging in too much and that there is danger of injuring the chances of the adoption of the good things you have already done. I am in favor of the indefinite postponement of the whole proposition, but I am not willing to subscribe to all of that argument.

Mr. DOTY: Then just make a motion to strike out all of the stump speech of the member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] and that will relieve the situation.

Mr. HALFHILL: I object to that.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am not on to all of the parliamentary skids.

Mr. LAMPSON: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: Does not the gentleman understand that all he votes for is the conclusion at the end, that the rest is mere argument?

Mr. DOTY: If you call it an argument, all right.

Mr. HOSKINS: The only proposition was whether or not a vote for indefinite postponement of this matter was a vote upon all of the allegations contained in the bill of particulars.

Mr. LAMPSON: The only thing that we are voting upon is the report.

Mr. DOTY: That is all.

Mr. HOSKINS: Waiving aside all questions of any stump speech that may be contained in the minority report, I desire to suggest to the members of the Convention that we ought not to pass this proposal. It is really not a recall proposal at all in the ordinary acceptance of that term. It is a sort of makeshift on which I fear some of the gentlemen of this Convention desire to go on record for probably political reasons. Possibly it is not intended for anything else. I heard the demand made last night to have a record vote. I was content to let this baby sleep where you placed it yesterday and that is where it should have remained. The stump speeches of the majority report and of the minority report all belong in the grave yard, and I desire, as far as I am concerned, to put them there. I hope that before this Convention is concluded you will simply put both of these reports upon the table where you had them last night.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I want to ask Mr. Hoskins if he is willing to vote that the majority report be not adopted and that Proposal No. 291 be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HOSKINS: Undoubtedly. I have not the language before me, but I move—

Mr. KING: I have just what you want written up.

Mr. HOSKINS: Are you sure of it?

Mr. KING: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: I yield the floor to Judge King then.

Mr. KING: I offer the following motion—

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the agreement to the amendment to the minority report.

Mr. DOTY: If we vote this amendment in we have the main question on the matter. Then if the main question is passed on by a yea and nay vote we will have a fair and square vote on it.

The secretary read the motion of Mr. King as follows:

Resolved, That Proposal No. 291 and the report of the committee amending the same be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DOTY: That is a different proposition, but it is perfectly satisfactory when you understand it. That is a resolution postponing the whole matter. It takes out the stump speech and brings up the question whether you will have the recall on a yea and nay vote.

Mr. HOSKINS: I desire to protest that we did not put up any such issue. The gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] is simply attempting to draw a line when the line is not drawn in the proposition at all. Your recall proposition is a mongrel, hybrid cross-breed. It is not a recall proposition at all and ought not to be set up by any one who believes in the recall. I want to reiterate that I believe it is forced in here for the sole purpose that certain gentlemen may go upon the record for the purpose of running for office this year. I do not think there is anything else in it.

Mr. FACKLER: The gentleman from Auglaize undertakes to criticize the report of the committee by saying it is a mongrel recall. It provides for the recall of every elective official, twenty per cent for state officials, twenty-five per cent if he is any other official. It provides that the recall can only be voted upon at regular annual elections. That was to get away from the argument constantly made by those who opposed the recall that the expense incident to a special election for the recall would defeat it. It provides also that in the recall elections a majority of all those voting at the election must vote in favor of the recall of the official in order to remove him from office. If the gentleman from Auglaize wants to have a record vote, let him come before the Convention and amend it and fight it out just as we did the initiative and referendum, but any man who votes for the resolution of the gentleman from Erie [Mr. KING] places himself on record as opposed to any kind of a recall coming out of this Convention.

Mr. WINN: There are fortunately a few of us who are not candidates for office and who have no political aspirations.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: Did you say "a few" or "two"?

Recall of Public Officers.

Mr. WINN: I said a few. I want to say that there are a few of us who are not candidates for office and who have not any political aspirations. Those of us who are in that class have no fear of the effect of our votes upon the people. We have no fear of the recall in case we should be elected. So we are safe on all sides. Now I think every member of this Convention should understand and every elector in this state should know that whoever votes in this Convention in favor of the pending motion, which is to postpone indefinitely the proposal, votes that way to avoid an actual definite distinct vote upon the proposition.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Will there be any doubt in the minds of our constituents if we vote to postpone it that we are against it?

Mr. WINN: My notion is that there will be no doubt, but the member from Auglaize, whose judgment is as good as yours or mine, thinks that the electors of the state might be fooled that way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You know that you and I may yet be candidates for office. Is not that true?

Mr. WINN: That is such a remote possibility that it has not affected me so far as my position on this question is concerned. I want to say again before I take my seat, that there is just one way by which we may have an opportunity to amend something that is before us so as to make a satisfactory recall proposition. Hence if the member from Auglaize [Mr. HOSKINS] is in absolute good faith respecting this question, then let something be pending here around which we may build such amendments as may be necessary to make it workable, and then we can vote for it; but if this motion prevails the whole proposition is dead, probably forever so far as the Fourth Constitutional Convention of Ohio is concerned.

Now I am in favor of the recall. I have never occupied any position where I did not understand that I was a servant to those who sent me there and that they had a right to kick me out when they wanted to. There is not a man in the hearing of my voice who ever employed a man to do work for him without retaining within himself the right at any time to discharge such employe. I have in mind now an instance of a man who has held office over and over again in the state of Ohio who, when called upon to bear in mind the oath he took at the time he took the burdens of the office, said, "I have but little respect for the laws of Ohio." I would have it made so easy that a man can be made to have respect for law, and when he pledges himself to support the constitution of his country and the constitution of his state and the ordinances of his municipality, I would have him know that he must respect every one of them; and that when he disobeys that oath of office those who placed him in office should have the right to put him out. I say when you have a man in office surrounded by the recall he will have respect for the constitution of the country and of the state and for the ordinances of his municipality.

Mr. EBY: Has not that man been repeatedly elected mayor of that municipality by a majority of the people of his municipality?

Mr. WINN: And if a majority want to recall him I want it made easy to do so.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose there are three candidates, a democrat, a republican and a socialist, and that the socialist party compose forty per cent, and the republican party thirty-five per cent and the democratic party twenty-five per cent. The socialist would be elected, but not by a majority of the votes. The other two by combining could recall him.

Mr. WINN: Certainly, and I would have it made so easy that whenever that man did not regard his oath of office the majority of his constituents could recall him. We are always willing, except in a case of that sort, to trust the dear people. We all say we have confidence in the people and I am not afraid that when a man in public office discharges the duties of his office as he should that there will ever be a time when the majority of the people will ask to have him recalled. It is only when he disregards the trust placed in him and tramples under foot the laws of the land that they want to recall him, and then they ought to have a right to do it.

Mr. PETTIT: I have not had an opportunity to say anything on this subject heretofore and I desire to say very few words now. We had an eloquent discussion some time ago on the initiative and referendum and there was a wonderful sight of talk about trusting the dear people, on very small per cents too, on that subject and one gentleman from Hamilton county was very loud in his vociferations as to the dear people on that proposition. I want to say, in order to make the initiative and referendum what it should be we should have the recall immediately following it. If we can trust the people on the initiative and referendum, why not trust them on the recall? One of the arguments that has been advanced here against the recall is that the county officers only have a two-year term now, but there is a proposal before the Convention extending the term to four years and making them ineligible to re-election. Why should any official in any county have the right to neglect his office and the people not have the right to recall him at a general election at the end of one year? If we are going to trust the people on the initiative and referendum, trust them on the other proposition. I don't know what right the member from Auglaize has to question any man's honesty on this matter. He talks as though favoring the recall were mere sentimentality on our part. We have had instances in my section of the state where the recall should have been applied. They say that judges ought not to be recalled; that is mere sickly sentiment. A man who is a coward on the bench was a coward before he went there. I am in favor of the recall and I believe a majority of the Convention are.

Mr. EARNHART: I want to say a word in defense of some of us who are candidates.

Not having any instructions from the people of my county in regard to this matter I want to say that in this as in every other case where I have no instructions I intend to vote what my judgment tells me is right. I intend to hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may. I intend to fight for what I think is right. If I go down in defeat I want to go for what I think is right and proper. I think this recall is an accompaniment of the initiative and referendum, to put in the hands of the people a weapon that they need now and will need in the future, and I want to be recorded on the side of progress. I don't want the state of Ohio to be found wanting when the opportune time comes to be placed in the front rank of the sisterhood of states.

Mr. READ: My conception of the situation at present is that we are not voting strictly upon the report, but it is more a question of justice to the proponents of this proposal. Many of us were elected delegates with the understanding that we would advocate the adoption of the recall. Now there comes in here a minority report as a substitute for the majority report and a motion is made to indefinitely postpone a proposal which has come out in regular order from the Initiative and Referendum committee. Out of courtesy to that committee's report this Convention ought to be permitted to consider that proposal. Anything that keeps this Convention from properly considering it is unjust, unfair and discourteous to that committee as well as to others who are trying to get the recall before the Convention. I therefore appeal to the members of the Convention to vote down this minority report in order that the majority report may be properly presented and that it may go to engrossment and come up before the Convention in due time.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: It seems to me it is quite unfortunate that this proposal has to be considered before the fixing of the terms of the different officers. If we are to have long terms of office I am quite sure that the recall proposal will receive additional help, but under our present tenure of two years a good many of us feel that we now have sufficient opportunity to recall.

Mr. FACKLER: The term of executive officers has not been lengthened.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: If the recall goes through, the short ballot committee will recommend a four-year term for state officers, and the proposal of Mr. Baum provides a four-year term for county officers. If I thought those terms would be given I would vote for the recall, but under the present tenure I shall vote against it.

Mr. PIERCE: When I was a candidate for the position of delegate to the Constitutional Convention I went before the people of my county and told them that I was in favor of the recall applied to all officers, including the judiciary. I was the only candidate out of nine in my county who did that, and for some reason or other I received more votes than any other candidate before the people.

I am in favor of the recall. I am particularly in favor of its application to the judiciary. I think if we can get it for that office it will do more to reform the country than any other one thing that this Convention can do. I believe, if the citizen can take an ordinary man and make a statesman out of him before the election, that after the election he ought to be able to take the statesman and make an ordinary man out of him. If we can trust the people to put us into office we ought to be willing to trust the people to take us out of office. It is amazing to me that officers who claim they are in favor of rule by the people will come to a convention like this and try to prevent the people from ruling. We adopted the initiative and referendum to give the people more power and we now should adopt the recall for the same purpose, and I hope the amendment offered will not prevail. I would like for the gentleman to withdraw it, because I would like to see this question reduced to an issue. I agree with the gentleman from Defiance

[Mr. WINN] that we should get this question at issue, where we will understand it and where the people of the state will understand it, and let us have a fair, square, honest vote upon it. It is immaterial, except so far as my individual vote is concerned, whether it be voted up or voted down, but I do want to give the people of the Convention an opportunity to vote honestly so that the people will know what we are doing.

Mr. HALFHILL: Let us take a little inventory of the situation and find the point at which we have arrived in discussing the question now before us. When this minority report was brought in here signed by four members of the Initiative and Referendum committee, they subscribed their names to a document every word of which they believed to be the solemn truth, notwithstanding the fact that it has been referred to in a way that would indicate that some member or members of that minority committee were preparing stump speeches for their constituents. I am not aware that any one of those four gentlemen is a candidate for any office, and I think in a solemn matter of this kind, where we are considering whether or not we will make a great departure in the fundamental law of the state of Ohio, there is nobody who would put in a report to this Convention which he did not honestly believe and could not conscientiously defend.

Last night before the author of this proposal which we are discussing had a chance to express himself, and while the Convention was in a measure tired, these two reports were carried to the table. I conceive it to be entirely proper that we take them up so that the issue can be fairly and squarely presented, and it is now fairly and squarely presented, and while the four members of the Initiative and Referendum committee who signed the report which sets forth what we believe about this measure recommend its indefinite postponement, we have no pride in that report and are willing that the argumentative part of it be carried out of existence by the amendment presented by the gentlemen from Erie county [Mr. KING]. What does he recommend? He recommends a fair, square proposition to indefinitely postpone Proposal No. 291 and all the amendments relating thereto, and that presents to you fairly and squarely the question. Are you in favor of the recall in the state of Ohio or are you not? If anybody doubts my position upon the question I would like to relieve him of that doubt. I am in favor of hitting it squarely between the eyes and killing it dead forever, and we can do it by sustaining this minority report. I think the recall as understood and applied to public officers is the most obnoxious thing that ever invaded the precincts of the state of Ohio. It is contrary to all the accepted traditions of a free judiciary as we have inherited them from our English ancestors.

Mr. PETTIT: Are you not also opposed to the initiative and referendum?

Mr. HALFHILL: I will answer the question when I get through, if you will pardon me. I say it is the most obnoxious thing as a proposed governmental agency that has ever invaded the precincts of the state of Ohio, and I believe I can prove it on principle. For five hundred years in England the sovereign power of that country, which is the king and parliament, has never interfered with the judiciary and has not dared to do so. For five hundred years in England that has not been done, and now we, in this twentieth century, dare to say that the sovereign power, which is the people, may come in and interfere with the free exercise of the judicial rights and powers of a judge under the law and under the oath that he has taken to observe the rules that control and govern his high office. Judges are elected to represent not only the majority but the minority, and if abstract principles of justice crystallized into the constitution of our state amount to anything, then the judge under his oath of office is bound to stand by and contend for those principles, no matter what the majority of the moment say about it; and if he humbles himself to the will of popular passion and refuses to protect the rights of the most humble citizen, whether the majority demands those rights to be taken away or not, he is not fit to be a judge. However you apply it to other officials, you have the judges incorporated in this proposal, for we elect all our judges in Ohio. I want you to understand now that we are straight up to the question of whether or not you will depart from the accepted traditions that have obtained since our organization as a state, and whether or not you will entertain the entrance into the fundamental law of the state of Ohio of this principle of the recall, for that is what your vote means right now. Any member who is opposed to the recall ought to vote to sustain the minority report.

Mr. STILWELL: Was not the abolition of human slavery a departure from the traditions of the nation?

Mr. HALFHILL: The abolition of human slavery came about through and by virtue of the civil war, but it took a joint resolution of the congress of the United States, recommended for passage by the president and this brought about an amendment to the constitution. That is how that came about.

The time of the gentleman here expired and on motion was extended.

Mr. HALFHILL: Permit me to answer the question of the gentleman from Adams. I was opposed to the initiative and referendum as reported here and I am opposed to direct government. I have always said that I was in favor of the initiative and referendum as an aid to representative government if properly safeguarded, but I do not think the plan adopted by this Convention was properly safeguarded.

Mr. ULMER: I do not have to state that I am in favor of the recall, because when you look over the proposal book you will find Proposal No. 11, relative to the recall, was introduced by me. Although it has not been reported out I have not made any kick because I do not look for notoriety. As long as the principle I stand for is carried out I don't care who gets the credit for it. I noticed that other proposals were submitted and I was satisfied. I hope the minority report will be voted down. I believe in equal rights. I believe the people as a whole have just as much right as any private individual or any corporation, and I believe in the recall which is fair and square, fair to the people and to the public officers and when this minority report is voted down and the majority report is voted up and engrossed, at the proper time I shall have an amendment which will protect the man in office also. We ought to give the people the right to recall any public officer who proves himself unfit, immoral or dishonest, it makes no difference what the office is or to what branch of government the officer belongs. The people should have the right to remove an unfaithful officer. It has always seemed a funny proposition to me that the people can put a man in office and can't take him out. So I say let us vote down the minority report, vote in favor of the majority report, engross the proposal and then have it for a fair, square proposition to be amended.

Mr. HARBARGER: I shall not vote for the recall. While I am personally in favor of the recall, in view of conditions and my instructions and my desire to truly represent the people who elected me, I am compelled to vote against it. As far as I know the wishes of my people, I want to carry them out regardless of my own personal views. I am perfectly willing to have this matter come up and be discussed and fairly voted on, and yet I think I shall have to vote for the tabling of the whole matter.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I do not believe the Convention is in doubt as to what the question is we are going to vote upon in a few minutes. The question is whether or not this Fourth Constitutional Convention of Ohio wants to submit to the people the question of the recall. Now I sounded a note of warning to the Convention yesterday without avail when the question of capital punishment was under consideration. I want to do the same thing now. I am afraid we are going too fast. We are trying to do too much. Just realize, gentlemen, it has taken us four months to pass the proposals that we have passed. The people of the state of Ohio have to assimilate and study and decide upon these questions for themselves before voting on them. Let us band ourselves together and make a firm and united stand. Let us decide upon certain vital changes that we will submit to the people and then be willing and be courageous enough to vote against some of these other propositions which of themselves may be meritorious but are questions which ought not to be submitted to the people at this time when so much is at stake. The submission of these many minor propositions may injure the greater work that we are trying to do.

Mr. PETTIT: Why should not this question be submitted as well as any other question?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: We are all entitled to our individual views on the matter, but I have a clear conviction, gathered from the people I have talked to about the situation and from a consideration of the matter, that if we submit this recall proposal and submit many other legislative propositions like the abolition of capital punishment, it is going to distract the attention and divide the minds of the people on the great questions we shall submit. In other words, it is going to make our work in convincing the people that what we do is right very much harder.

Every additional matter we submit makes it more difficult to center attention, and therefore I am in favor of limiting the number of things to be submitted to the great constitutional questions.

Mr. PIERCE: Are you going to pass over every proposal that comes up hereafter for the same reason?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: No; to be frank with you, I am not. But I think the great propositions are, first, the initiative and referendum. We should bend every energy to get the people to adopt that. Then, secondly, we should make our constitution simple of amendment. And there are some other questions that I shall vote for. I believe, though, we must differentiate one question from another, and, to be entirely frank, this question of the recall antagonizes a great many people. The initiative and referendum antagonize some people and I feel a little safer about the initiative and referendum without the recall.

Recall of Public Officers.

Mr. PECK: You remember that we were elected in Hamilton county and signed a pledge?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. PECK: Do you remember that when the pledge was prepared that the recall was deliberately omitted?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. PECK: And it was published all over Cincinnati that we were not in favor of the recall?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: The understanding is that it was not quite that. It however, was, that we felt it was inadvisable to let the Convention go on record as favoring the recall because it might endanger the initiative and referendum.

Mr. PECK: Well, I am satisfied if we had advocated the recall some of us would not have been here.

Mr. ANDERSON: Did not the Progressive League, of which the mayor of Toledo was president and Mr. Bigelow was secretary and treasurer, meet in convention and discuss what this Convention ought to do, and did they not deliberately and intentionally leave out the recall?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I am not competent to answer that. I think many gentlemen were in favor of the recall. If they left it out, as the gentleman says they did, they left it out as a matter of policy.

Mr. FITZSIMONS: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: If there is one thing I admire above another it is an open opponent, and on that account I raise my hat to the gentleman from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL]. He says he would like to swat the recall between the eyes. I am here to keep him from doing it if I can. However, I admire his spunk. He is out in his own uniform and under his own colors.

There is one thing in his talk this morning that impressed me, and that is his reverence for the English judiciary. I also lift my hat to the same power. The English judiciary has always maintained its own self-respect. It was never influenced by any class when it came to hand out law for the British nation. Three years ago there was the great engineers strike, the greatest industrial conflict in the history of the world. It extended from London to Hong Kong and back the other way. In the eleven months that it continued it all but paralyzed British industry. In all that time the British judiciary never issued an injunction nor was there a bayonet unsheathed. I have seen little industrial conflicts here at home when there was a distinct understanding with the judiciary beforehand that the representatives of a party on one side were to apply for the injunctions and it was arranged that the court would issue them. When the courts become the handmaid of policy, how do you expect honest men to respect them? I am not giving you a story; I am giving you history. All sovereignty is vested only in the people, and I wish to ask, Is the servant above the sovereign? Who says that the American people will interfere with any judge who even tries to approach common honesty in the discharge of his duty? We have witnessed the shortcomings of the judiciary in our day and we regret them, but the people who have been up against this class of abuses want to exercise their powers to prevent those abuses. I have seen judges on our benches handing down decisions as judges when they themselves and their families, as stockholders, were the beneficiaries of the judgment rendered. And then they tell us we should not reach for those men and attempt to recall them. I wish to say the quicker you get the recall into active operation the quicker will you sustain the honest judge and his position. It will always be his pride to say they never mentioned the recall in connection with his name. And the weak-kneed judge, whose son probably is a corporation employe at a large salary and who has taken his inspiration at the breakfast table, is very apt to remember that John is in the employ of the company. Who is not conversant with that view of the situation? We will have our eye on that gentleman and we will have the hooks on him. We can pull him down from his proud pedestal and keep him from besmirching the ermine by rendering a plausible decision in favor of John's employer. The recall will not hurt any honest judge, and it is only the rogues that we expect to go gunning for by the use of the recall.

In conclusion, we cannot be too careful. We are only the trustees of the rights that come to us. Remember that the rights we have are not alone ours, but that we are holding them for those who follow us, and let us endeavor to deliver to those who follow us as large a meed of right as we inherited. If we do that we will have performed our full duties to those who follow after us, and it is up to us to try to do it.

Mr. WATSON: Gentlemen of the Convention: I read the other day on the door cap of the main entrance, of the state house at Chillicothe, Ohio, which door cap now rests in the relic room of this building, these words: "General good, the object of legislation, perfected by a knowledge of man's wants and natures abounding means applied, by establishing principles opposed to monopoly."

That is one of the reasons why I am heartily in favor of the recall.

There is a science of American government. That science is the reflected will of the people. The Jeffersonian theory, as well as that of Lincoln, is that all political power is inherent in the people. That power is evinced by the people throughout our constitution and the laws in three co-ordinate branches of government, the executive, the legislative and the judicial. But how much of the legislative function is in fact performed by the legislative branch of our government? The courts have by a series of interpretations managed to write into the laws in many, and it must be said in most, important cases, interpretations which materially and in some cases absolutely, ignore and reverse the will of the people as expressed by their legislative branch. In short, the judicial branch of the government has gradually overshadowed until it has well-nigh overturned the function of the other branches of the government and made these two co-ordinate departments of government entirely subordinate and beneath and within the power and control of the judiciary.

Recall of Public Officers.

I contend that this is one of the gravest problems confronting us as a state and nation—the greed and usurpation of the judicial branch of the government. I contend that laws created and enacted to represent the people's will and for their benefit should be interpreted by the courts in the light and spirit actuating their enactment, and the judiciary should lend itself to such spirit and interpret such will and spirit of the people. What is the sovereign power of America? What but the people? The constitution of the United States is but their creation. The constitution of the state of Ohio is but another of their creations. When your supreme court has decided a question of which it has jurisdiction in your state, to whom can you appeal? No branch of the government is provided to which such an appeal may be taken. It is absolutely arbitrary and supreme. An answer must at once suggest itself; there is but one tribunal to which an appeal may be taken from the decree of the judiciary—the people themselves. Without that appeal you have created an agency of government that has absolute arbitrary power. If the people have not the right to overturn that decree by recalling the agency that has uttered it, then the creature has become superior to the creator, and your boasted self-government has become a sham and delusion and is merely a counterfeit of what you fondly believe you have.

What recourse have the people of the United States from a decree of the supreme court thereof, an institution created by the people through the constitution as an agency of government?

And yet, when it has uttered its decree, has issued its fiat, has promulgated its mandate, no matter to what extent such decree may violate the principles of liberty or the rights of the citizens, no matter how subversive of all such rights, no matter how revolutionary in form, even though it override its former decision, as it did in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases, and despoil all the cherished canons of freedom, there is no pathway open to the people except obedience. The recall of the judiciary is not an agency to withdraw the judicial powers from that function, but to enliven and inspire the judiciary with the spirit of the times and to make it as responsive to the public welfare as the spirit and will of vested property and gigantic vested interests. Both must have their protection, both at the hands of the judiciary secure that protection. Neither must be absolute, but if a contest shall come there must be in the hearts and souls of the judiciary the feeling that human when in conflict with property rights shall under the spirit and essence of our government be superior. The recall of the judiciary is the means whereby the creator is to place itself above its creature. It is to put into the political life of the nation the application of the scriptural injunction which declares: "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

The recall of the judiciary is as necessary to maintain the supremacy of the people over all their agencies and creations as was the struggle of the fathers to establish liberty and to proclaim it throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof. If it be claimed that the recall will terrorize the judges, I answer that no judge worthy the name will be swerved one jot or tittle from his true opinion, and as proof I cite the fact that no difference can be observed in the decisions of a manly judge at or near the close of his term from those at or near the beginning of his term. I invite your closest scrutiny from now on to the judicial decrees of our own most worthy judge. He comes to the people for re-election, and very properly too, for we all say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into thy reward"—a second term. I warrant no difference will be observed in his decrees because of the fact that he desires the rewards of faithful service. No faithful servant of the people fears the people. It has been said that man can not be trusted with the government of himself. Can he then be trusted with the government of others? Or have we found other men in the form of angels fit to govern him? Let history answer that question. Besides, by section 17 of article IV of the constitution, any judge of the state, since the adoption of the constitution in 1851 can be removed by a concurrent resolution of both houses of the general assembly, if two-thirds of the members elected to each house concur therein. It will be thus seen that the recall is now in the constitution and has been since it was adopted on the third Tuesday of June, 1851, affecting judges alone. Has this summary power terrorized your courts or intimidated them? Has it taken away their independence, this summary recall which has existed for sixty years? And yet men apparently sensible see or pretend to see in this self-defensive power of the people a menace and threat to our institutions.

It is urged that the recall of the judges would subject the judiciary to the clamor of the mob. The man who believes the people are a mob does not believe in a republican form of government. He should leave this country. He has no place here; his spirit is treasonable. Respect the judges, of course, the same as we respect men in other offices who do their duty; no more, no less. We cannot respect them if they are arrogant or tyrannical or treasonable or despotic, and if they are not held responsible they become to a greater or less degree arrogant, tyrannical, treasonable and despotic. They are entitled to the respect earned by the justice and wisdom of their judgment, and this should be measured, not by them, but by the sovereignty that creates them. Let their work be done in the light of the power they serve. The more direct and severe the light, the greater will shine the glory of their work well done.

"Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." Such was the sentiment awakened in the heart of Thomas Jefferson as he stood in the lobby of the Virginia house of burgesses and heard the impassioned harangue of Patrick Henry in a burst of righteous indignation at the attempt of parliament to intrude his country by the infamous stamp act of 1765. And such was the sentiment born anew in the hearts of the twenty-five governors of states when they declared that "tyranny in judicial ermine is as hideous as a Czar." Truly was it exclaimed in that now immortal session of governors, "We have made history." You can trample human rights under foot for a while, but that inherent right, which man cannot give neither can he take away, will assert itself in the sentiment, "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

The PRESIDENT: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order.

Recall of Public Officers.

The PRESIDENT: State your point.

Mr. DOTY: I don't understand that the gentleman's time is up. We are working under the half-hour rule.

The PRESIDENT: No; we are working under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I think Mr. Watson as the author of the proposal should be given time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WALKER: I think under the rule he is granted thirty minutes.

Mr. DOTY: No; I don't think he is. You don't get the thirty minutes until the second reading. The rule is now five minutes.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I move that the gentleman be given time to conclude his remarks.

The motion was carried.

Mr. WATSON: The action taken by the governors is no surprise to reading and thinking men. The surprise is that some action was not taken long ago. Who has not known that for years the federal judiciary has been the "city of refuge" to which the plunderbund flee when the state seeks to protect her people? Every man, trust or combine that sees fit to assail state enactments flees to this "city of refuge"—the federal judiciary. Judge McPherson held the Missouri law confiscatory. Judge Van Devanter (now on the supreme bench because of his service to the trusts and monopolies) held the Arkansas law confiscatory. Judge Sanborn held the Oklahoma law confiscatory, and now he lays on the straw that breaks the camel's back by declaring the same in reference to the Minnesota law.

And then we have Judge Hanford, of Seattle, who was recently hanged in effigy because of his injunction in behalf of the street-car line in Rainier Valley. And was this a mob? No. The speakers were the mayor of Tacoma, one state senator and one man who last year was a candidate for the republican nomination for United States senator.

The Seattle case is vital. Here we have a federal judge against whom the people protest. He had repeatedly given decisions in favor of corporations, and finally, when he granted an injunction to a street-car corporation, restraining the people from even asking transfers, although the state supreme court had decided they were entitled to transfers, the people arose and denounced him in a mass meeting. After this mass meeting the two editors of the Seattle Star and six of the speakers were arrested on a charge of "conspiracy to obstruct justice." If these men are convicted it means that a precedent will have been established which will permit judges under fire to arrest and punish with jail sentences every one who dares to criticize them. It will be the first step toward the establishment of a judicial kingdom. Again I say "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

Also we have the detestable Archbald, of Wire Trust fame, who gave each of the eighty offenders, upon the plea of nolo contendere, the nominal fine of $1,000. Thus it is the federal courts fine the criminal Sugar Trust and the consumers of sugar are today paying the fine.

And then we have Judge Jackson, Judge Grosscup and Judge Pollock, whose names are well known to organized labor because of their servility to the special interests.

Federal court decisions of recent date read like the briefs of corporation attorneys. "Whose we are and whom we serve" has been translated by the federal judiciary to mean the trusts instead of the meek and lowly Nazarene.

I do believe that I should give What's his'n unto Cæsar;
For it's by him I move and live,
And get my bread and cheeser.

Such seems to be the sentiment of the federal judiciary in its outrageous attempts to reduce the states to mere federal provinces.

Rate reductions in North Dakota, South Dakota, Arkansas, Missouri, Oklahoma and Minnesota have all been struck down by the hand of the federal judiciary. Are the ten million people of this empire of states ignorant, depraved or anarchistic? Nay, verily, they are, on the contrary, intelligent, enlightened and patriotic. As the West is the child of the East, these are our children, whose rights are being trampled under foot by this agency of government. When the courts refuse to do homage to the scheme of representative government, then have we judicial tyranny. But why do the governors of the states call upon the supreme court to throttle Sanborn, of the United States circuit court of appeals? Is not the supreme court as now constituted another "city of refuge" for the plunderbund? Justice Harlan thought so in his philippic against the "rule of reason." In order to save Standard Oil and the Tobacco Trust, this, our highest tribunal—save the people themselves who uttered this agency in representative government—reversed its decision in the trans-Missouri freight case.

Why not appeal to the people themselves, who uttered this agency? What is the sovereign power in the United States? What but the people?

Where tyranny begins law ends. It has been said "The tree of liberty grows only when watered by the blood of tyrants." Evidently before this matter is fully adjusted the tree of liberty will send forth new shoots.

Lastly, take the nine long years of "Beef Trust immunity." A federal judge always stood ready with the "immunity bath" to the packers' special plea in bar. How many of these malefactors have inspected jails? It is dawning upon the minds of many that there is truth in the statement that "Laws are like cobwebs, which catch small flies, but let wasps and hornets break through." Such was true in the days of Swift, who uttered these words, and such is evinced to us to-day.

These prosecutions have served only to make the law ridiculous and to bring the authority of the federal government into contempt. In no other civilized country would such a record be possible. Some day our federal judiciary will awake to the fact that they are but servants and not masters.

All this suggests a remedy, and that is the recall. Put the recall on all agencies of government, thereby bringing them into harmony with the spirit of the people who uttered these agencies.

Mr. TAGGART: How will your present proposal affect the federal judiciary?

Mr. WATSON: It will not at all. This is just preliminary to a point I shall bring up later.

Recall of Public Officers.

I notice that Judge Grosscup, whose career has been a reproach both to the judiciary and to the bar and who applied the "immunity bath" to Rockefeller after Judge Kennesaw Mountain Landis had fined him $29,000,000 for rebating, will resign in October. He says:

The formative period is approaching. Next year's presidential election will, I believe, be the last one on the old lines, the settlement for the future will come, not through courts of law, but the courts of public opinion.

The chieftain of plutocracy evidently had read the handwriting on the wall, and is getting out of the way of the rushing avalanche of public opinion that is to scourge from the temples of justice the oppressor and his tyrannical decrees and enthrone the people.

There is no thought of striking down the judiciary and those who suggest this ought to know better. A judge has no right except as the law gives it to him, and the people make the laws. The judge's right to declare a law unconstitutional is not an inherent right. It is granted by the constitution and the constitution is made by the people. In fact, the constitution is distinctly a popular instrument. Individual rights are protected in constitutions because the people who make the constitution want those rights protected, and the people who make the constitution can be trusted to deal as fairly with judges as with other officials. The argument that a judge can have any power not conferred on him by the people, or can rightfully exercise power contrary to the wishes of the people, is either a relic of past monarchy, from which we have departed, or a foreshadowing of the plutocracy which some seem to desire.

The attempt to appeal to religious prejudices is as absurd as it is inexcusable. The religious belief of the people is more secure in the hands of the people themselves than anywhere else. Equally aside from the line of legitimate argument is the argument that the people may act in anger or excitement. Elections provide time for deliberation, not as much time as some of the predatory corporations have taken to wear out the patience of the people by postponement and delays, but time enough to allow thought and deliberate judgment.

It is our view that the purpose of the recall is "to make the judiciary subservient to the popular will." To what will ought the judiciary be subservient? Not unpopular will? We have had enough evidence that judges are human to enable us to withstand the appeal now made to us to put our judges in a class by themselves. Have we not seen influential criminals escape just punishment through their power to touch the sympathies of the court, and have we not seen judges decide political questions with just as much political bias as the ward politician? What state has not had its examples of political judges—and judges are just as likely to be partisan when they secure an appointive judgeship through a pull as when they obtain an elective judgeship through their push. Have we forgotten the electoral commission of 1876? Did we not have five supreme judges on that commission, and were they not the senior judges in length of service, and did they not decide according to their political bias just as the senators and representatives did? It so happened that three of the judges were republicans and only two were democrats; therefore Hayes was seated. Had there been three democrats instead of two in the judicial group of the electoral commission Tilden would have been seated. It all depended upon the vote of one judge, and his vote depended entirely upon his party affiliations. He voted just as he voted at the polls, notwithstanding the fact that great constitutional questions were presented and mighty interests hung upon the decision.

Nothing is to be gained by shutting our eyes to the fact that judges are made of the same kind of clay that was employed on the rest of us, and it is just as well that the judge should have before his eyes constantly the possibility of a rebuke if he goes contrary to the sense of justice in the hearts of the people. A judge will be respected as long as he deserves respect, and why longer? If a judge betrays his trust it is better to let his sin fall upon himself than to have it rest upon the judiciary. There will be more respect for the court rather than less when the people have it in their power to remove an unfaithful servant.

I want to say, gentlemen of the Convention, that what is bringing this question so acutely to the people is not the unsoundness of the heart of the judiciary, but the unsoundness of heart of some of the men who constitute the judiciary, and the lawyers and judges should lend themselves to cut off the barnacles from the judiciary and to hold it up to be called clean, clean, instead of allowing the American people to hold it up and cry out unclean, unclean.

Now if a judge rests under suspicion the distrust is apt to spread to his associates, but when the people have the right in their own hands their failure to use it is an answer to the criticism of an official.

But suppose a mistake should be made occasionally. That is not a sufficient indictment against the system. Mistakes are to be expected, just as our constitutions contemplate the possibility of officials, even judges, proving false to their trust. But the right to make the mistake is what mankind has for centuries been fighting for. Let the mistake, if mistake must be made, be the people's rather than the king's.

Why is the power of removal lodged in the legislature except upon the theory that a judge may deserve to be removed? The recall is a form of impeachment in which the people act as a jury, and they can be trusted much better than any senate, even the senate of the United States. After the seating of Senator Lorimer who will claim that the United States senate is a better body to try an official charged with corruption than the people themselves?

The recall is coming and when it has come we shall have a higher standard of integrity and a more jealous regard on the part of our officials for justice and the public welfare.

Mr. TALLMAN: If the gentleman will yield I would like to move to recess until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

The delegate from Guernsey yielded for the motion and the motion was put to a vote and lost.

Mr. WATSON: One other point and then I am through. As I understand conditions, within a few years, probably two, the charter of the street railway system of Cincinnati will expire, and upon that question—

Recall of Public Officers.

Mr. DOTY: No; the charter will not expire. There will be a re-adjustment of rates only.

Mr. WATSON: Then I will pass that matter. I thank the Convention and will detain you no longer.

The Convention recessed until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess.

Mr. THOMAS: I demand a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: A call of the Convention is demanded. The sergeant at arms will close the doors and the roll will be called.

The roll was called, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Brattain,	Harter, Stark,	Miller, Fairfield,
Brown, Highland,	Henderson,	Norris,
Brown, Lucas,	Hoskins,	Okey,
Campbell,	Jones,	Price,
Cody,	Kerr,	Rorick,
Colton,	King,	Smith, Geauga,
DeFrees,	Lambert,	Stalter,
Doty,	Leete,	Stamm,
Dunlap,	Leslie,	Tetlow,
Dunn,	Marriott,	Watson,
Eby,	Marshall,	Weybrecht,
Fess,	Matthews,	Woods,
FitzSimons,	Mauck,	Worthington.

The PRESIDENT: There are eighty members present.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that all further proceedings under the call of the Convention be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Kilpatrick arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 64, by Mr. Miller, of Fairfield. His name being called, Mr. Kilpatrick voted "aye."

Mr. Shaffer arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 62, by Mr. Pierce. His name being called, Mr. Shaffer voted "aye."

Mr. Pettit arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 62, by Mr. Pierce. His name being called, Mr. Pettit voted "aye."

Mr. Harter, of Stark, arose to a question of privilege, and asked that his vote be recorded on Proposal No. 64, by Mr. Miller, of Fairfield. His name being called Mr. Harter, of Stark, voted "aye."

Consideration of the pending question was then resumed.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand the question before the Convention is the indefinite postponement of all that is before the Convention with reference to the recall. Am I correct?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: I understand at this time we are limited to five minutes. I intend to vote against the indefinite postponement of this matter for the reason that I do not believe in preventing any question from coming before the Convention. Incidentally I wish to say that I am against the recall of those officers other than judges for the reason, that as matters stand now offices to which they are elected have terms of two years. If an officer is recalled it can only be done after he has served one year and then he would go out under his term of office in one more year, so there is very little to be gained by the recall.

Mr. PETTIT: There are some offices with longer terms than two years.

Mr. ANDERSON: I am speaking of those who would hold office for two years. It seems to be somewhat of a ridiculous misuse of the recall to apply it where the term is only two years. If the other report comes in making the terms four years then the recall ought to be added.

Let us look at what a curious mix-up came about in Seattle. A mayor was elected. He was recalled not only by his enemies, but by the friends of the candidate who wanted to be mayor. Then after he was recalled the other man was elected. Then the friends of the man he had just ousted, together with the enemies that any man is sure to make who goes into the office and can't appoint everybody, recalled that man in office. So you see a most ridiculous misuse can be made of the recall. I want to call your attention to another matter. We had a Progressive Constitution League of which the mayor of Toledo was president and our president the secretary, and the league determined that the recall would not be pressed; in other words, that the different candidates over the state would not be asked to pledge themselves with reference to the recall, believing, and I think rightly, that the initiative and referendum was the great thing to be desired, and the thing to which they should devote their energy, with the understanding and belief that after the Convention adopted the initiative and referendum; and after the initiative and referendum had been ratified at the polls, then a majority of the people in the state of Ohio, if they wanted the recall, could grant it.

Mr. PETTIT: Was what that league did binding on any member who did not belong to it or didn't pledge?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I was not a member and it was not binding on me, but the point is that apparently those people who believed in the theory at that time have decided not to press it, believing that the recall would be defeated.

Now I am giving an opinion that has been coming to me more firmly every day, that when we finish our work a constitution will be submitted to the people for the approval of the people in one document with two questions on the outside, one, the question of woman's suffrage and the other the liquor question. If you put the recall in the constitution itself and put it up to the people under the alternative of "new constitution, yes," and "new constitution, no," it will lose us tens of thousands of votes for the constitution as a whole. I believe the Progressive League was right and the recall should not be put in the constitution. I am certainly opposed to it, because we have not decided as yet that all the officers should have four-year terms.

Mr. THOMAS: If all the members of the Convention were through with their dinners, and were here to vote, I would move the previous question, but I want every one of you to understand exactly what this question is. I think it is understood that the recall proposal, as reported by the majority of the committee, is not satisfactory to the socialists in this Convention, or the state. The socialist proposal on the recall is contained in Proposal No. 161, introduced by Mr. Moore, and it provides that, on the presentation to the proper authority of a petition for a recall of an elected officer, verified by ten per cent of the voters of the district represented by such officer, a new election to fill the office shall forthwith be called. There is a lot of mischief that an officer can do in two years from the time he is elected if he cares to undertake it, and in the report of the committee the recall only applies to the first year of a term of office for which the officer might be elected, because by the time the regular election would come around with a two-year term the term would be concluded.

Now while the question is being discussed about the recall of judges, I want to call attention to the fact that there is one judge in Ohio sitting on the bench who was indicted by the grand jury in two counties for embezzlement, and charges were preferred against him in the house and the senate. It is Judge Donnelly, of Henry county. The judiciary committee, a number of the committee now being under indictment themselves, did not consider the grand jury indictments, and refused a hearing on the subject, and the senate judiciary committee said that this indictment in itself was not sufficient evidence to even warrant having a trial on the subject.

Mr. HALFHILL: You would not say because a man is indicted and is defending himself against a charge of that kind he is guilty to the extent that the legislature ought to act on it, would you?

Mr. ANDERSON: A point of order. Is the gentleman of Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] suggesting a question of privilege in this matter?

Mr. HALFHILL: I want to make an answer.

Mr. THOMAS: If my memory serves me he was convicted in one case.

Mr. HALFHILL: Your memory is not correct.

Mr. THOMAS: It appears to me when two indictments by grand juries from different counties are found it ought to be sufficient to warrant at least a trial on that case before the legislature to find out whether there was any truth in that or not. The socialists believe that every public officer should submit himself to the will of the people when the people themselves believe he is not performing the duties of his office, and I feel that this particular amendment to the motion ought to be voted down and that we ought to have an opportunity to vote on the proposal as reported by the committee and amend it in such a manner as to provide for a real recall for judges and other public officers in Ohio.

Mr. DOTY: I desire to move, not for serving any purpose of my own, but for the purpose of having a definite time fixed, for a vote on this question.

I move that further consideration of the resolution by Judge King be postponed until 10:30 o'clock a. m. and be made a special order for that hour on Tuesday and for a vote to be taken on it at 11:30 o'clock a. m.

The motion was carried.

Mr. STILWELL: In order to satisfy what seems to be a desire among the members who expressed an opinion to me during the noon hour upon the subject, I move that when we adjourn today we adjourn until seven o'clock Monday evening.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: As a matter of interest—I do not know whether it interests others, but I want to ask if this Convention expects to recess a week from Monday night with the work all done and to reconvene at some time after that to finish the work of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology? I can not understand how it is possible to act within the limits of what we have resolved to do and take this action which has just been taken.

The PRESIDENT: The next proposal is Proposal No. 230, which the secretary will read.

Mr. TETLOW: I move that Proposal No. 230 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is amended Proposal No. 241—Mr. Dwyer.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. FACKLER: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines 11 to 16 inclusive and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Any judge of a court of record of this state may be removed from office by the governor whenever, after due trial as may be provided by law, it shall be found that such judge is unable to perform the duties of his office by reason of physical or mental infirmity extending over a period of more than six months or that such judge has been guilty of misconduct in office involving moral turpitude, the persistent violation of a clear mandate of the constitution, intoxication while attending to the business of the court, gross inattention to the duties of the office or conduct tending to bring the court into disrepute. Laws shall be passed providing for the creation of commissions having authority to hear and determine the truth of any such charges and prescribing the methods of procedure with reference to the same."

Mr. Colton moved to amend Proposal No. 241 as follows:—

After line 10 add: "When the governor is on trial the chief justice shall preside."

Mr. EVANS: I offer a substitute.

The substitute was read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and the pending amendments and insert the following:

ARTICLE IX.

REMOVAL OF OFFICERS.

Any officer of the state, a district, county, city, village, or township may be removed from his office for nonfeasance, misfeasance, malfeasance, corruption, inefficiency, drunkenness, immoral conduct or for any other cause or causes which the court may deem sufficient. The jurisdiction for removal for all officers except judges of the circuit court shall be in that court. A petition for the removal of a circuit judge shall be filed in the supreme court and be heard there. Such petition shall be presented by any five electors and tax payers in the state, district, county, city, village or township, as the case may be, and security for costs shall be given. The officer shall be notified, as the law may prescribe, and shall have a preliminary hearing. If on such hearing, the court shall require the charges or any of them to be answered, the state shall take charge of the proceeding and prosecute it to a final result. The officer charged may resign at any time and if he does, the proceeding shall be dismissed at his cost. On the final hearing the court may dismiss the charges, or find the officer guilty of one, or more charges, declare his office vacant and remove him therefrom. Costs shall be adjudged as the court may deem proper. All further particulars under this article shall be prescribed by law.

Removal of Officials.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the substitute offered by the delegate from Scioto.

The substitute was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment offered by the delegate from Portage [Mr. COLTON].

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROEHM: I did not vote because I did not know what was voted on in those two amendments. We ought to get through with our business, but we ought to have a full attendance in order to do business. Several nights ago we started to do business. It was necessary to have three or four people change their votes in order to have a reconsideration of a matter and then consume an extra day to get it through. Why? Because we had a poor attendance. I object to having proposals called to which there is some opposition and considered by three-fourths or less of the members of this Convention. I do not believe it is fair to require that three-fourths of those present should be necessary to carry a proposal when it ought to be only a majority of the whole Convention. I believe we ought to have some means of compelling attendance. We ought to have reasonable rules, so the members will be present. I do not know what those amendments are that were lost, but I think that they should be reconsidered, and I move that the vote by which the amendment of the delegate from Portage was declared lost be reconsidered.

The motion was carried.

Mr. LAMPSON: Now what about the other amendment.

Mr. WINN: I make the point that the amendment offered by the member from Portage is a substitute for all the others.

The PRESIDENT: No; it is not.

Mr. COLTON: As the proposal now stands the lieutenant governor presides over the senate and if the governor is convicted the lieutenant governor would naturally succeed him and the lieutenant governor, having that interest, ought not to preside over that trial. My amendment provides that the chief justice shall preside on the occasion.

Mr. ELSON: Is it not a fact that there is no provision for a chief justice?

Mr. COLTON: But there always is a chief justice. One of the judges of the supreme court is chief justice. It seems to me it is a reasonable provision that on the trial of the governor the lieutenant governor should not preside.

Mr. FLUKE: It seems to me we are going at this matter in too much of a hurry. In the absence of the recall the people of Ohio have a right to expect that we submit something to them to allow removal of derelict officials. For that reason I am very much interested in any proposal looking toward the impeachment of public officials. As far as I am concerned — it may be my fault — I have not had an opportunity to inspect this amendment and there are others in the same position. I would like to have some consideration given this matter. It is too important to run over. We would like to hear all of these things read.

The PRESIDENT: The amendment has been read by the secretary twice, but he can read it the third time if desired.

Mr. ROEHM: It was not in order, I believe, to move a reconsideration of the votes by which both of those amendments were lost, and I think the amendment of the gentleman from Scioto ought to be considered for the same reason I made the other motion. I now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT: The motion will not be entertained now. The question before the Convention is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the delegate from Portage.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROEHM: Now I renew the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the gentleman from Scioto was laid on the table.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. LAMPSON: We would like to have the member from Scioto explain that.

Mr. EVANS: I have regarded the provisions in the constitution of this state and every state in the Union where provision is made for the removal of public officers by impeachment as an utter failure, and I think that all of that matter about the impeachment of public officers ought to be stricken from the constitution we are about to make. I believe that every one of the states, except one, and that is Oregon, retains these provisions as to public officers. I have formed the idea that the senate is not the proper body to try these charges. It is entirely too temporary. It is not judicial in its character and its remedy is impracticable; so much so that it is almost impossible, and it amounts to no remedy at all. Now I think that every officer — I don't care if he is a judge or what he is, legislative, ministerial or executive, or what kind of a term he has — ought to be removed for any of these causes read in your hearing. At the same time I say to you that when a man is elected or appointed to an office he has a property right in that office and he has a right to discharge the duties of that office and receive the emoluments until his term expires. He ought not to be removed by any public clamor and I think the only right way is to have a judicial tribunal. Let the charges be made against him, let the courts have a preliminary hearing and let the examining court say whether those charges are serious. If the examining court is satisfied on the preliminary hearing, just as a grand jury considering the question as to whether a crime has been committed, let the charges be heard and let the state take the matter up. Let the officer resign if he doesn't want to face the charges, but if he thinks he is not guilty and wants to face them, let the state take charge. I am opposed to the recall as presented. It creates a new tribunal, a tribunal which does not act judicially, and it is contrary to representative government and contrary to the spirit of our institutions. But I say the recall or removal that is embraced in this provision of mine is strictly in harmony with the principles of the organic laws of our state and of every other state, and it is a proper way to get rid of an officer if he is derelict in his duty or inefficient.

Removal of Officials—Reports of Committees.

Mr. PECK: Do you bear in mind the provision of section 17 of article IV, which provides a simpler mode for removing a judge than any you have mentioned?

Mr. EVANS: Yes; I know about that.

Mr. PECK: I have not heard you refer to it.

Mr. EVANS: That has never been done. That remedy is impracticable.

Mr. PECK: Why any more so than yours?

Mr. EVANS: That takes him before the legislature, away from his home. Let us have a remedy right where the wrong is committed. That remedy is impracticable. Nobody resorts to it. I would wipe it all out of the constitution—everything that is said on the subject of impeachment.

Mr. PECK: That is not impeachment. It is simply by resolution.

Mr. EVANS: This matter has been adopted in Oregon. All matters that ordinarily are subject to impeachment have to be brought in the ordinary court. I think the people have good cause to demand the remedy in their organic law to remove a derelict officer. It is a crying demand. It is not by a public vote but by a judicial hearing, and I am in favor of that heartily.

Mr. THOMAS: Will you please state what your amendment contains? I think there are only a few of the members who understand.

Mr. PECK: Let us have it read.

The SECRETARY: It is Proposal No. 83 in your proposal book.

Mr. WATSON: Evidently the gentleman from Scioto [Mr. EVANS] is chasing this matter as far as he can: He chased it up to the supreme court, but he stopped there. Suppose we are going to try a member in the supreme court. In what court would you try that member? Would he have a new court? If the member of the new court were guilty of malfeasance or corruption where would you try him? Where is there any better body before which to try it than the people. There is no power greater than the people who have made those agencies of government. Speaking about it being contrary to the spirit of our institutions, the people are the bosses of all government. The people elect these officers for servants and the officers hold no property rights in their office except that which the people give them, and if they are chosen for services with the idea and understanding that for misfeasance or malfeasance or corruption the people can recall them, they would knowingly enter upon the sacred duties of the service with the feeling that that service must be justly rendered to their constituents or the recall would be effective. There is no power you could set up, real or imaginary, that supercedes the power of the people to govern themselves.

A vote being taken, the amendment offered by the delegate from Scioto was not agreed to.

Mr. NYE: I see in the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER] a provision that a judge may be removed if he is sick or unable to perform the duties of his office extending over the period of six months. It is a well-known fact that men can't be disqualified for that long and not be disqualified for good, and I therefore offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out of the amendment offered by Mr. Fackler the following, beginning with line 5: "such judge is unable to perform the duties of his office by reason of physical or mental infirmity extending over a period of more than six months or that".

Mr. WATSON: I offer as a substitute for Proposal No. 241 the majority report of the committee on Proposal No. 291.

Mr. PECK: I rise to a point of order. There are two amendments pending and it is not proper to offer the third one.

The PRESIDENT: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: The recall being set for next Tuesday and this being of the same nature, I move that this proposal be continued until 11:40 next Tuesday.

The motion was carried.

Mr. PECK: I ask unanimous consent to present some reports from the Judiciary committee. I want to present them to get them on the calendar.

By unanimous consent Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 304—Mr. Halfhill, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8.

In line 9, strike out "section 2" and in lieu thereof insert "section 1."

In line 30 change the period to a semi-colon and add thereafter the following:

"and any existing court heretofore created by the general assembly shall continue its existence until otherwise provided by law. The judges of the courts of common pleas in office, or elected thereto prior to January first, 1913, shall continue to hold their offices for the term for which they were elected."

Between lines 20 and 21 insert the following:

SECTION 2. That section 7 of article IV be amended to read as follows: There shall be established in each county, a probate court, which shall be a court of record, open at all times, and holden by one judge, elected by the voters of the county, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and shall receive such compensation, payable out of the county treasury, as shall be provided by law. But the general assembly may provide by law to submit to the electors of any county the question of combining the court of common pleas and probate court in such county and provide that such courts shall be combined in any county where a majority of the electors at such election shall so vote. And provision may also be made for similar submission to the electors of the question of the separation of such courts in each county where the same may have been combined and for such separation when a majority of such electors shall so vote."

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 325—Mr. Anderson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 120—Mr. Rockel, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 240—Mr. Anderson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all of said proposal after line 3 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall not be abrogated and such damages shall not be subject to any statutory limitation as to amount, but the recovery must be for the full amount of all damages so sustained."

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck, the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 326—Mr. Anderson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 166—Mr. Stilwell, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 and in lieu thereof insert:

"SECTION 33. Laws may be passed to secure to mechanics, artisans, laborers and material men, their just dues by direct lien upon the property, upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material. No other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power."

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck, the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

Mr. PECK: I move that the rules be suspended and Resolution No. 106 that I introduced the other day be considered now.

The motion was carried.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I ask unanimous consent to introduce a report from the committee on Municipal Government.

Consent was given and the report was read as follows:

The standing committee on Municipal Government, to which was referred Proposal No. 272—Mr. FitzSimons, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Reports of Standing Committees.

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

To submit an amendment to the constitution. — Relative to the government of municipalities.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE XVIII.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

SECTION 1. Municipal corporations are hereby classified into cities and villages. All such corporations having a population of 5,000 or over shall be cities; all others shall be villages. The method of transition from one class to the other shall be regulated by law.

SECTION 2. The general assembly shall, by general laws, provide for the incorporation and government of cities and villages; and it may also enact special laws for the government of municipalities adopting the same; but no such special law shall become operative in any municipality until it shall have been submitted to the electors thereof, and affirmed by a majority of those voting thereon, under regulations to be established by law.

SECTION 3. Municipalities shall have power to enact and enforce within their limits such local police, sanitary and other similar regulations, as are not in conflict with general laws, affecting the welfare of the state, as a whole, and no such regulations shall by reason of requirements therein, in addition to those fixed by law, be deemed in conflict therewith unless the general assembly, by general law, affecting the welfare of the state as a whole, shall specifically deny all municipalities the right to act thereon.

SECTION 4. Any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is supplied to the municipality or its inhabitants, and may contract with others for any such product or service. The acquisition of any such public utility may be by condemnation or otherwise, and a municipality may acquire thereby the use of or full title to the property and franchise of any company or person supplying to the municipality or its inhabitants the service or product of any such utility.

SECTION 5. Any municipality proceeding to acquire, construct, own, lease or operate a public utility or to contract with any person or company therefor shall act by ordinance and no such ordinance shall take effect until after thirty days from its passage. If within said thirty days a petition signed by ten per centum of the electors of the municipality shall be filed with the executive authority thereof demanding a referendum on such ordinance it shall not take effect until submitted to the electors and approved by a majority of those voting thereon. The submission of any such question shall be governed by all the provisions of section 8 of this article as to the submission of the question of choosing a charter commission.

SECTION 6. Any municipality, owning or operating a public utility for the purpose of supplying the service or product thereof to the municipality or its inhabitants, may also sell and deliver to others any transportation service of such utility and the surplus product of any other utility in an amount not exceeding in either case fifty per centum of the total service or product supplied by such utility within the municipality.

SECTION 7. Any city or village may frame, adopt or amend a charter for its government, and may exercise thereunder all powers of local self-government; but all such charters and powers shall be subject to general laws affecting the welfare of the state, as a whole.

SECTION 8. The legislative authority of any city or village may by a two-thirds vote of its members, and upon petition of ten per centum of the electors shall forthwith, provide by ordinance for the submission to the electors of the question "Shall a commission be chosen to frame a charter?" The ordinance providing for the submission of such question shall require that it be submitted to the electors at the next regular municipal election if one shall occur not less than sixty nor more than one hundred and twenty days after its passage; otherwise it shall provide for the submission of the question at a special election to be called and held within the time aforesaid. The ballot containing such question shall bear no party designation and provision shall be made thereon for the election from the municipality at large of fifteen electors thereof who shall constitute a commission to frame a charter; provided that a majority of the electors voting on such question shall have voted in the affirmative. Any charter so framed shall be submitted to the electors of the municipality at an election to be held at a time fixed by the charter commission and within one year from the date of its election, provisions for which shall be made by the legislative authority of the municipality in so far as not prescribed by general law. Not less than thirty days prior to such election the clerk of the municipality shall mail a copy of the proposed charter to each elector whose name appears upon the poll or registration books of the last regular or general election held therein. If such proposed charter is approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon it shall become the charter of such municipality at the time fixed therein.

SECTION 9. Amendments to any charter framed and adopted as herein provided may be submitted to the electors of a municipality by a two-thirds vote of the legislative authority thereof, and shall be submitted by such legislative authority when a petition setting forth any such proposed amendment and signed by ten per centum of the electors of the municipality is filed therewith. The submission of proposed amendments to the electors shall be governed by the requirements of section

Reports of Standing Committees.

8 as to the submission of the question of choosing a charter commission; and copies of proposed amendments shall be mailed to the electors as hereinbefore provided for copies of a proposed charter. If any amendment so submitted is approved by a majority of the electors voting thereon, it shall become a part of the charter of the municipality. A copy of said charter or any amendment thereto, within thirty days after adoption by a referendum vote, shall be certified to the secretary of state.

SECTION 10. A municipality appropriating or otherwise acquiring property for public use may in furtherance of such public use appropriate or acquire an excess over that actually to be occupied by the improvement and may sell such excess with such restrictions as shall be appropriate to preserve the improvement made. Bonds may be issued to supply the funds in whole or in part to pay for the excess property so appropriated or otherwise acquired but said bonds shall be a lien only against the property so acquired for the improvement and excess, and they shall not be a liability of the municipality nor be included in any limitation of the bonded indebtedness of such municipality prescribed by law. Any municipality appropriating private property for a public improvement may provide money therefor in part or in whole by assessments upon the abutting property not in excess of the special benefits conferred upon such abutting property by the improvement.

SECTION 11. Any municipality which acquires, constructs or extends any public utility and desires to raise money for such purposes may issue mortgage bonds therefor beyond the general limit of bonded indebtedness prescribed by law; provided, that such mortgage bonds issued beyond the general limit of bonded indebtedness prescribed by law shall not impose any liability upon such municipality but shall be secured only upon the property and revenues of such public utility, including a franchise stating the terms upon which, in case of foreclosure, the purchaser may operate the same, which franchise shall in no case extend for a longer period than twenty years from the date of the sale of such utility and franchise on foreclosure.

SECTION 12. The general assembly shall have authority to limit the power of municipalities to levy taxes and incur debts for local purposes and may require reports from municipalities as to their financial condition and transactions, in such form as may be provided by law, and may provide for the examination of the vouchers, books and accounts of all municipal authorities, or of public undertakings conducted by such authorities.

SECTION 13. All elections and submissions of questions provided for in this article shall be conducted by the election authorities prescribed by general law. The percentage of electors signing any petition provided for herein shall be based upon the total vote cast at the last preceding general municipal election.

SECTION 14. The adoption of this article by the electors of the state shall repeal article XIII, section 6, of the constitution.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, two thousand copies of the proposal, as amended, were ordered printed.

Mr. KNIGHT: It was the understanding between the committee on Education and the committee on Municipal Government that after the report of the committee on Municipal Government the committee on Education would file its report. That report from the committee on Education is ready. It is signed, but the vice president has it in his desk and it can not now be filed. I make this explanation so that when the report is made Monday night it may be, without objection, placed immediately following the report of the committee on Municipal Government.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the secretary be instructed to place the report of the committee on Education when it is made so that it will come right after the report of the committee on Municipal Government.

The motion was carried.

Mr. READ: I move that the Legislative and Executive committee be relieved from further consideration of Proposal No. 310 and that the same, according to Rule No. 82, be reported back to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The proposal is before the Convention and the question is on its adoption.

Mr. DOTY: No; the question is on its engrossment. What is the proposal?

The proposal was here read.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The secretary of the committee has the committee's report to submit and he also has other reports from the committee. That they are not submitted is an inadvertence.

Mr. McCLELLAND: Is it in order to move to recommit this proposal to that committee?

The PRESIDENT: It is.

Mr. McCLELLAND: Then I make that motion.

The motion was carried.

Mr. FARRELL: I move that we now adjourn.

The motion was seconded.

Mr. PECK: I have a few more reports to offer.

Mr. FARRELL: I withdraw then.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred proposal No. 322—Mr. Bowdle, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

In line 4 strike out the words "the legislature shall have power to provide by law" and in lieu thereof insert the words "laws may be passed".

In line 5 strike out the word "medical".

Strike out all of lines 7 and 8.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

Physical Training in Public Schools.

Mr. PECK: I now move that the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights be discharged from further consideration of Proposal No. 301, and that that proposal be referred to the committee on Education.

Mr. KNIGHT: On the 7th of March that proposal was taken from the committee on Education. The committee on Education objects to having this proposal foot-balled back and forth to it after the Convention has ordered it out of that committee's hands once. It is a proposal to amend the bill of rights, belongs in the hands of the Judiciary and Bill of Rights committee, does not belong to the committee on Education and the motion should not be agreed to.

Mr. PECK: It is a proposal to amend the bill of rights with reference to education and therefore we thought it belonged properly to the committee on Education. There is a very learned lady who wants to make a long speech to someone and we want the committee on Education to hear it. We heard several sections of it last evening. We think we heard enough and we would like to have the committee on Education take the last of it.

Mr. KNIGHT: The committee on Education has had all the light it needs on this subject and the Bill of Rights committee needs more light.

Mr. PECK: Nobody was in favor of it. I move that proposal be indefinitely postponed. I move that the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights be relieved from further consideration of that proposal and that the proposal be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT: All of those in favor of the motion.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT: Do you want recognition?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Mahoning.

Mr. ANDERSON: I believe delegates ought to have some little glimmering of intelligence before they vote on the question. For the benefit of those who want to know what they are voting about, the proposal seeks to put into the constitution a recognition of physical training in the schools. It is admitted by everybody that so far as the law is concerned it is not needed, but as the lady explained last night for the influence it would have it ought to be put in as are a good many other things, because physical training is so much needed in the schools; and I think it ought to be in the constitution. There are a good many other things going into the constitution not nearly so meritorious as this.

Mr. PECK: It was admitted by the advocate of this resolution that there was no lack in the power of the general assembly to pass any law necessary for physical education, and all she wanted was that it should go into the constitution for the moral effect it would have, but it seemed to me and also to other members of the committee that it would be an injurious addition, so far as the sound and appearance is concerned, to that clause of the constitution. I think it is section 5 or 7 of the bill of rights to which it is proposed to attach it, which provides for the encouragement of moral and religious education. She wanted to attach to that physical education. I think the word "education" is broad enough to cover it all, and it has been construed so. The general assembly has passed numerous laws in aid of education, and the people seeking to have this incorporated in the constitution do not deny that.

Mr. KRAMER: This is the only proposal that I have introduced. I was sorry that I had to introduce one. Just a word in reference to what Mr. Knight said. This thing has been thrown backward and forward between those two committees long enough. We placed it in the hands of the committee on Education and immediately the committee on the Bill of Rights began to kick and said the thing belonged to them. On account of the objections raised by the committee on the Bill of Rights the proposal was referred to that committee. It was not the fault of the proponent or the Convention that it was so referred. It was referred to the committee of the Bill of Rights on their own demand. I am not saying what ought to be done with the proposal, but I will say this committee on the Bill of Rights has not given it any consideration. I say that for the benefit of the Convention. I was there last night when the lady was seeking to be heard, and she was not heard to any great extent. I want to make myself plain before the Convention. I think the proposal has considerable merit. I know it is as Judge Peck says, that we can do without it, but so could we have done without that proposal with reference to primary elections or the one with reference to capital punishment or about fifty other things we have done here. We could have done without putting any of those in the constitution. There is not one member in twenty of this Convention who has so much as read this proposal. If you want to vote for its indefinite postponement without reading it that is your privilege, but I don't think it is treating fairly the persons who are advocating it. I just want to read it and I want to show you it takes everything in the section to make a man. Then you can do as the Convention sees best. The conclusion of section 7, article I now reads, "Religion, morality and knowledge, however, being essential to good government, it shall be the duty of the general assembly to pass suitable laws," etc. Now I simply want to put in after the word "knowledge" the words "and physical efficiency", so it would read "Religion, morality, knowledge and physical efficiency, however, being essential to good government, it shall be the duty of the general assembly to pass suitable laws," etc.

Mr. DOTY: I think the italicized words in line 13 indicate that something else has been added.

Mr. KRAMER: I will get down to that. The thought I want to express is that we ought not to vote it down simply because it can be taken care of without constitutional provisions. Everything here can be taken care of by the legislature without constitutional requirements, but it is the idea of those back of the proposal that it takes all of these things to complete and round out a man, and without physical efficiency, religion and knowledge are crippled. I don't care so much about it as the persons who are back of it do, and if you will give it a minute's consideration I think you will say it ought not to be simply voted down just because it could be done by the legislature without the provision.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is there anything in that that could harm any person if you would adopt it?

Physical Training in Public Schools.

Mr. KRAMER: No.

Mr. PECK: Then can you not put in the ten commandments? Is there anything in the ten commandments that will hurt anybody? That is a comment on Mr. Anderson's question.

Mr. ANDERSON: It might be well to let the Judiciary committee read them and get some knowledge of them.

Mr. KRAMER: It looks to me as if there could be no objection to recognizing this in the constitution just exactly as the constitution recognizes morality, knowledge and religion. It seems to me it is a proposition with considerable merit. Now there is another thing added to it. "Those being essential to good government and the success of government."

Mr. ELSON: Could not that be worded better?

Mr. KRAMER: Maybe it could be. I want to call the attention of the Convention to the action of the Judiciary committee. Just the minute the lady began discussing this proposition last night some member of the committee suggested it ought to go before the committee on Education, that it belonged there and he consented and so did I.

The PRESIDENT: The matter is not properly before the Convention and the chair will now put the question on the motion that the Judiciary committee be relieved from further consideration of the proposal. Then we will proceed with the discussion.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Richland [Mr. KRAMER] still has the floor.

Mr. KRAMER: I am sorry that point of order wasn't suggested sooner. I don't care to discuss it further. If the Judiciary committee wants to get rid of it and the committee on Education doesn't want to take it up, do with it whatever you want. I would like to say it is a proposition that ought not to be simply passed up for consideration just as we did with Captain Evans' proposal this afternoon. You treated that proposition worse than you would treat a yellow dog. There were not nine men that voted on either side, and yet the proposal had a great deal of merit in it. That puts us in a bad light with our constituents. What can I go back and tell these people interested in the proposition? I can't tell them anything except that the Convention gave absolutely no consideration to it. Simply because one or two men thought it had no merit in it the rest jumped at the conclusion and voted to indefinitely postpone it. That is not the way I would like to go back to Mansfield and tell the people who are back of it. I want this thing considered and as the gentleman from Mahoning [Mr. ANDERSON] has said, if you would study it for a minute or two and arrive at the conclusion that there was nothing in it, I could tell the people at Mansfield that the Convention after most thorough consideration decided it was not worthy of adoption. What can I tell the lady interested in this proposal when I go back now? That is what I want to know. Simply because the ladies can't vote don't say they are not citizens. Now, what did we do with that Miller proposition that was presented by the ladies—

Mr. PECK: The gentleman should confine himself to the proposal under discussion.

Mr. KRAMER: I think that point is well taken.

Mr. BIGELOW: Mr. President: There seems to be no disagreement that there is nothing in this proposal that could not be accomplished by the legislature. I have today's issue of the Ohio State Journal and I am going to read a part of an editorial. I do not want to be understood as committing myself to all that has been published in the past or may be published in the future in that paper, but this is the editorial, entitled "Province of a constitution."

What is a constitution anyhow? It is an instrument defining inherent human rights and prescribing methods for their protection. When this is overdone, and it is sought to establish in that constitution custom, habit, convenience, or forms of opinion, then the object is defeated, and the will of the people, which is one form of human rights, is hampered or suppressed.

The province of a constitution is exceedingly limited. When one goes beyond it, he interferes with the freedom of the people, he crushes their will, and denies to them the exercise of their own wisdom. It is a most absurd and unjust thing for a convention to legislate for the people of Ohio, as they will be ten or fifteen years from now—to anticipate their desires and necessities and give these form and expression now. We cannot understand how reasonable men will insist upon such a course.

It has been stated that not only is the legislature competent to do all this measure proposes, but that we are asked to pass this proposal merely for its moral effect. I have not asked this Constitutional Convention to do a thing that the legislature of Ohio could possibly do. Personally I am in favor of considering every proposal that really requires a change in the constitution, considering it fully and carefully, even if we have to stay here from now until next Christmas, and there should be no curtailment of debate and no haste, no neglect of our work, but with important proposals pending it does seem to me an abuse of our privileges and the misuse of our time for us to spend time here discussing things we all agree the legislature can do, and I think the time has come for us to draw a line and confine ourselves to questions that are truly constitutional questions. There are great big questions before us. Let us turn our attention from these things to those big matters that are still before us. You know what we did yesterday. A motion was made by the member from Cuyahoga to adjourn in the middle of Thursday afternoon and what will be the result? We shall dawdle along until the warm weather and then the big questions that ought to receive the best thought and attention will not receive the consideration they deserve. I think the time has come to call a halt in this matter, to devote our attention to the business before us and do the things that ought to be done. I hope this motion to indefinitely postpone will prevail and the proposal will go on the table where it ought to be.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I sympathize with the member from Richland over the buffeting around that this proposal has been receiving. Anybody who introduces a proposal is entitled to a hearing before some committee. Therefore, I move that this proposal be committed to a select committee of one composed of the delegate from Richland [Mr. KRAMER] for such consideration and recommendation as he sees fit.

Mr. KRAMER: If you desire to do this thing don't do it for sympathy.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the proposal be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 232—Mr. Doty, having had the same under consideration, reports it back without recommendation.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 252—Mr. Weybrecht, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

In line 4 strike out the word "cases" and in lieu thereof insert the word "manner".

Strike out all of line 5 and in lieu thereof insert the words "as may be directed by law."

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck, the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The next business on the calendar is amended Proposal No. 242, submitting an amendment to article IV, section 2, of the constitution, relative to the elective franchise. The secretary will read the proposal.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. ROEHM: Mr. President and Members of the Convention: I trust that this Convention will indulge me a little time to present the arguments in favor of Proposal No. 242, first, for the reason that though, like many of you, naturally of a talkative disposition—in fact dearly loving to talk—I have not felt the necessities of the various occasions impelling me to indulge in that favorite and, with some of us, popular, pastime very often and long, upon the floor of the Convention, and, secondly, for the reason that notwithstanding I am not a candidate for either president of the United States, governor of the state of Ohio, congress or any other office (at present) I believe nevertheless that I have something to say which should go into the record, even though it might be said when I have finished, by the gentleman from Highland, that I have said nothing to the point on the matter in issue.

Yesterday a member of the Convention asked me whether I had any stock or interest in any voting machine or company, and suggested that if I had none I had better make that fact known to the Convention. I hesitated to bring this up for the reason that protestation of no material interest often comes from those very much directly or indirectly interested; but nevertheless, gentlemen, I hasten to announce that, fortunately or not, I have no such interest. I had not heard of any opposition to this measure until day before yesterday. It might be opposed on the grounds that this proposal is not of such importance as to deserve the consideration of the Convention, in its endeavor to put a short program up to the people. It certainly cannot be argued that the method of registering and counting the ballots in use at present is up to the times, or within even twenty years of the times, in these days of registering devices and complicated machinery. All know the present system of the ballot can be improved upon, and if it may be improved by the use of machines to a possible elimination of all fraud connected with the registering and counting of votes of the electorate, no one is here who will not consider that this proposal is of such importance that it should be adopted. I will therefore first explain why voting by machines cannot be had under our present constitution.

April 28, 1898, the legislature of this state passed a law (93 Ohio Laws, p. 277), entitled "An act to authorize the use and purchase of voting machines for any and all elections to be held within any city, town or village of the state, and for the appointment of commissioners," which legalized the use of the voting machines at elections. As is usual in all such matters, the city of Cleveland, in its progressive or ultra-radical spirit (take your choice); purchased such machines.

One Karlinger, as an elector and taxpayer of the county of Cuyahoga, city of Cleveland, brought suit in the common pleas court to enjoin the alleged unlawful expenditure of public money and the interference with the free and lawful exercise of the elective franchise by payment out of the public treasury for voting machines, about seventy-six in number, already purchased by the defendants and by the purchase of additional machines and of the requiring their use at elections to be held in said county. (Karlinger vs. The Board, 480.)

This case, Karlinger vs. The Board, through the regular channels, reached the supreme court of the state of Ohio, 80 O. S. 489. There (pp. 489-490) the court spoke as follows:

It would be interesting to apply this general view (Monroe v. Collins, referred to herein later) of the subject to the legislation in question, but it is quite unnecessary, in view of the definite requirements of the second section of the fifth article of the constitution that all elections shall be by ballot."

The court further says:

This provision is taken literally from the former constitution of the state, adopted in 1802. In a school for the study of English it might be both interesting and useful to consider the meaning of the word "ballot" in primitive times, and the process by which its present meaning has been derived. But when the word was originally used as a part of the organic law of the state the process of derivation had been completed and its meaning in this connection had become plain and understood. It was not doubted then, nor has it ever really been doubted since, that it is a printed or written expression of the voter's choice upon some material capable of receiving or reasonably retaining it, prepared or adopted by each individual voter, and passed by the act of the voting from his exclusive control into that of the election officers, to be by them accepted as the expression of his choice. When the phrase was readopted in our present constitution, this meaning of the provision has been illustrated and made absolutely certain by repeated acts of legislation.

After this decision of the supreme court voting machines could no longer be used at elections in the state of Ohio for the reason that the law giving such power had been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of our state. Hence, if we are to progress in matters relating to the casting and counting of our ballots by machinery it is necessary that there be some constitutional provision which will permit this.

It is needless for me to state that I am entirely in accord with the amendments made in committee as they eliminate some of the objectionable features to the original proposal.

Without referring to the original proposal I will read from amended Proposal No. 242, line 4: "All elections shall be either by ballot or mechanical device or both preserving the secrecy of the ballot."

This language is, perhaps, so plain that it may require no explanation, but should a member desire to ask me any questions upon this sentence, I will try to answer them. It will be observed that voting by machines is not herein made mandatory, but possible only.

The next sentence, "The general assembly may regulate the preparation of the ballot and determine the application of such mechanical device," may possibly require some explanation.

In Monroe vs. Collins, 17 Ohio State, 665, the supreme court had under discussion article V, section 1, of the constitution, which is as follows:

Every white male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the state one year next preceding the election, and of the county, township, or ward, in which he resides, such time as may be provided by law, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections.

The court there said:

The legislatures have no power, directly or indirectly, to deny or abridge the constitutional right of citizens to vote, or unnecessarily to impede its exercise; and laws passed professedly to regulate its exercise or prevent its abuse, must be reasonable, uniform and impartial.

This same query was made by our supreme court as to the use of the voting machine in Karlinger vs. The Board in language heretofore quoted as follows:

It would be interesting to apply this general view (Monroe vs. Collins) of the subject to the legislation in question.

In discussing this matter in committee it was thought that in a case, for instance, of the non-partisan ballot for judiciary or of the ballot upon which we were elected to this Convention, which required a rotation in position upon the ticket, or, if by machine, that a question be raised as to whether such provisions were not an abridgement of the constitutional right to vote, and it was thought by the committee that such ballots and voting by machine should be made legal beyond question; and to give the broadest possible scope consistent with the secrecy and protection of the ballot this language was used.

I do not know that it would be necessary in this Convention to discuss the advisability of installing voting machines as an argument for the adoption of this proposal, but it seems to me that the reason why voting machines should eventually be adopted should be discussed at this time, in order that we may bring out the advisability of passing this proposal.

The voting machine can be and should be made available in registering votes, and can be and should be so constructed as to guard, under proper laws, against fraudulent manipulation either by the voter or the election officers, for after the polls are closed the counting and operating mechanism could be automatically locked against further manipulation. There would be no counting of ballots after the polls are closed, as votes for the candidate or upon propositions would be totaled upon a metal counter. They could be made to be economical in that they would avoid large expenditures of money for the printing of the ballots, both for elections and primary elections, and if properly constructed would save the expense of four election officers to each precinct and there would be fewer precincts to keep a machine busy.

We need not here discuss the question as to whether there are any such machines now in existence, but as to their probable or possible existence in the future. It does not require much imagination, and I am sure would not require the invention of any new principle of mechanics, to conceive of the time when voting will be done by machinery, and the vote of the individual be cast secretly and recorded correctly within a short time of the closing of the polls by means of electric appliances, honestly added and totaled in some central locality, so that the result in our larger cities and subdivisions and even in the state and nation could be learned within a few hours.

However, the fact that the adoption of this proposal would make possible an honest ballot and an uncorrupted suffrage is, after all, the big reason for its adoption.

We have been pleased in the United States to boast of our political freedom and the right of the individual in his ambition to be elected to any office in the land, even to the presidency, if he is born an American citizen. Any of us who has had any active part in politics, not only in recent years, but in years gone by, if we have been well informed, knows that it has not always been true in our political scheme that there is equal right of candidates who desire election to various offices. I remember when I was a law student and began to take an active part in political matters—the old days of the mass convention—when the political boss, who was able to name the temporary presiding officer of the convention, had absolute control of the doings of the convention, no matter whether the opponents to him in that convention outnumbered his force three to one, and thus perpetuated himself in power, often against the will of the people. I remember when they used to haul to primary elections large picnic wagonloads of men from one voting booth to another, each casting his vote according to the dictates of the bosses at each voting booth, thus insuring the election of the candidates whom the bosses desired, for the reason that others would not attempt the same kind of frauds. And if this was not found sufficient the ballot box was stuffed; entirely disabusing the mind of the illusion that the will of the people ruled in such matters.

These frauds in election matters seemed doomed to an end upon the adoption of the so-called Australian ballot and of a system of electing candidates at primaries under the provision of the state law, but in this we were again mistaken, for the reason that fraud and manipulation, while a little more difficult and not quite so wholesale, became even more effective and less likely to be detected. Even on election day the Australian ballot is not proof against corrupt voting. One of the methods is to obtain a ballot, which can be easily done if you know how, mark it in the manner you desire to be voted, instruct the person whose vote is being purchased or supervised to receive the blank ballot from the election officers and retire to his booth, exchange the blank ballot for a marked one in his pocket, vote the marked ballot and return the blank ballot to the person in charge on the outside and receive his reward. A blank ballot is sometimes obtained by perpetrating a fraud upon the election officers. A clever person is procured to vote a sample ballot instead of the official ballot and in this manner obtains a regular blank ballot.

By another method, the person whose vote is influenced is made to exhibit (upon the ground that he is unable to properly fold the ballot) to some one in the election booth his ballot after he has marked it in a certain specified manner. If it is seen that he has marked his ballot in the agreed-upon manner the signal is given to the person on the outside and the voter goes out and receives his reward. But fraud at party primaries has been even more bold—such as stuffing the boxes with ballots marked in a particular manner and extracting in their stead other ballots, and such as election officers under the corrupt influence of election boards placing in a ballot box a number of ballots marked in a particular manner and registering the names of a number of the voters of that precinct who did not happen to go to the polls on that day.

A common method of working for certain candidates is for the clerk who is recording the votes to place the marks in the wrong column as the ballot is being called. I have known one case where one candidate had received a hundred and fifty votes while his opponent had received about fifteen or eighteen, and the names on the ballots had been called off properly, but when the results were announced after the ballots were destroyed it was found that the opponent had been credited with one hundred and forty-nine votes and he had received but eighteen. In that instance the judge who called off the ballots raised a kick, but it did not avail for the reason that the ballots had been destroyed.

Another favorite method of working for a particular candidate at regular elections is by the use of a small lead pencil palmed in the hand or hidden in the fingers by one assisting in counting the ballots. By means of the use of this pencil such person can deftly place a mark in front of the name of the candidate he is boosting though the person voting this ballot had intended to vote a straight party ticket of other political faith than this candidate. In this manner I have heard of twenty-five or thirty votes being changed in one precinct,

These are not all the methods of fraud by any means that have been used. A bunch of ballots can be in counting dropped on the floor and another bunch substituted.

All these frauds have been committed hundreds of times since 1892, when the so-called Australian ballot was put into operation in the state of Ohio, to the certain knowledge of all persons who have been cognizant with our political methods. After the counting of the ballots, of course, under our law they are destroyed and the traces of fraud destroyed therewith.

There is still another and by far the most evil method of defrauding the will of the voter, both at elections and primaries, by holding back certain election precincts in which election officers are known and understood to be ready to stand committed to any fraud. In these precincts sufficient changes are made in the tally sheets thereof up to a certain number to decide the election or nomination of the candidate. This method is frequently used in the state of Ohio. Many a man who has really had a plurality of the votes of the electors did not, when the tally sheets were changed and footed up, have sufficient to make him the nominee or the duly elected official.

Thus it will be seen that I do not believe that a certain county in this state stands alone by any means in the matter of election frauds, and I do not believe that the fraud committed in that county, bad though it may have been, is as demoralizing as the fraud committed upon a candidate who was really nominated or elected but counted out, for the latter is a blow at the very foundation of our institutions.

I have enumerated a few methods of fraud under our present system. There may be many others, with which I am not familiar. If you ask me for proof I will tell you that the only proof I need is that it is a matter of common knowledge to the politicians generally in the state of Ohio that these methods of fraud have been used and are being used in elections to this day.

I am quite sure that the people of Montgomery county have heard something of frauds of this kind, and I am equally sure that Montgomery county is no worse in this respect than the average county in the state of Ohio, and for that reason I believe that these frauds have been committed everywhere in the state of Ohio, particularly in the larger cities.

I have sufficient patriotism as an Ohio-born citizen to believe that the state of Ohio is no worse than the average state in the Union in this respect, and for that reason am forced to the conclusion that the elections throughout the United States have not always been the reflection of the will of the people. I know that since the beginning of our government the people have never been sure that their ballots would be counted as they have been voted.

By means of those frauds it is far easier to defeat the will of the people when they are voting upon propositions submitted to them, such as bond referendums. I have heard that by far the biggest majority of the bond referendums that have been declared carried in various localities in the state of Ohio had really been defeated by the votes of the people.

Further, in all referendum votes, as well as in voting nonpartisan and separate ballots, the blanks actually voted, if counted for or against a certain proposition or candidate (and unless strictly watched it could be easily done), would, in most instances, be sufficient to decide the referendum or the election.

We have just passed a proposal to submit to the people the question whether they want the initiative and referendum. Upon the floor of this Convention during the debates upon that proposal it was said that the people had been deprived of their power by the corruption of the legislature and that the purpose of the proposal was to give back to the people the power they had delegated to their representatives and of which they had been deprived by corruption. There was much said in this debate about the big interests corrupting the legislature and thus thwarting the will of the people. If this be true, and if the initiative and referendum should be adopted, then if the people be not given the power to prevent corrupt suffrage you have merely taken this corrupt influence from the legislature and directed its work on the election machinery of the state. What good can come of this attempt to deprive a corrupt set of men of their power with the legislature by means of any proposal when you have no assurance that the referendum will be properly recorded?

I ask you to take away, not only from the politician, but from the thousands of men who act as election officers throughout the state, the temptation that you have tried to take away from the legislators. Everything that was so ably and eloquently said on the floor of this Convention as to the temptations to which legislators have been subjected could be equally said as to the temptation to which election officers and politicians would be subjected.

I believe I have given sufficient reason to show that this proposal is deserving of the consideration of this Convention and should not be defeated merely to put up a short program to the people.

All I ask of you is to pass this proposal in some form so that the people may say whether or not they desire to make it possible that they may sometime, be it ever so distant in the future, have honest elections.

Mr. HARBARGER: Has there been a decision of the courts against the use of machines?

Mr. ROEHM: If the member from Franklin [Mr. HARBARGER] had listened to the early part of my argument he would have seen that the supreme court in Karlinger vs. The Board had decided that the voting machine could not be used in our elections, that the act legalizing them was null and void.

Mr. HARBARGER: Where are the machines made? Mr. ROEHM: I do not know. I suppose there are a dozen of them.

Mr. HARBARGER: Are any of them made in Dayton?

Mr. ROEHM: I knew there was one being worked on down there. I did not know there was a machine made in Dayton until after I had introduced this proposal and it was on the calendar. I don't know whether that is made in Dayton, but a Dayton man is interested in it.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: During the progress of the voting what is the danger that the machine may get out of order and refuse to work at all or work badly?

Mr. ROEHM: I do not know and I do not think that is a question that the Convention need concern itself about, because there is a possibility of making a machine that will not get out of order easily. Take almost any recording machine, it may get out of order once in a while, but it is almost a perfect piece of mechanism. It is not for the purpose of permitting any of the present machines to be used, but simply to make it possible that a perfectly secret and correct counting of ballots can be had.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: That is the pertinency of my question, to know whether that machine will produce perfectly accurate results.

Mr. ROEHM: It has been done. Other states have satisfactory machines, but not perfect machines in my opinion.

Mr. PECK: I heard it worked to the great satisfaction of the people of New York.

Mr. ULMER: There is no great principle involved in this proposal. It simply will permit any community that desires and that can find a perfect voting machine to buy it and install it. It is optional with the people. There is no reason why we should lose much time over it. People don't have to use it if they don't want to, and they can investigate it before they buy it. Therefore, as a few of the gentlemen here are compelled to leave soon to catch their trains and we expect to vote, I move the previous question.

Mr. ROEHM: I demand a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The call of the Convention is demanded. The sergeant at arms will close the door and the secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Beyer,	Farnsworth,	Mauck,
Brown, Highland,	Farrell,	Miller, Ottawa,
Cassidy,	Fess,	Norris,
Cody,	Harris, Ashtabula,	Nye,

Evans,	Matthews,

The president announced that seventy-five members had answered to their names.

Mr. ROEHM: I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is, "Shall the proposal pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 69, nays 10, as follows:

Collett,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 242—Mr. Roehm. To submit an amendment to article V, section 2, of the constitution.—Relative to elective franchise.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

All elections shall be either by ballot or mechanical device or both preserving the secrecy of the ballot. The general assembly may regulate the preparation of the ballot and determine the application of such mechanical device.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. RILEY: On the seventeenth day of January Proposal No. 15 was presented by myself to the Convention and two days later was referred to the Judiciary committee, which has made no report. Under the rule, I call for the return of that proposal to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: Proposal No. 15 is called up under the rule.

Mr. PECK: I want to say in justification of the Judiciary committee that it is not due to want of consideration that the proposal has not been reported. There was a good deal of discussion in the committee on the proposal, but we never were able to agree upon a report.

Mr. RILEY: I have not called this up this afternoon with the idea of compelling the grips to stay in the cloak room. I have an amendment to offer to this proposal myself which is intended to modify it somewhat and I think I can have the amendment ready in proper shape by the time we meet again.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The gentleman moves that the proposal be engrossed and placed on the calendar in its regular order.

The motion was carried.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Dunn and Mr. Marriott.

Leave of absence for next week was granted to Mr. Tallman and Mr. Nye.

Leave of absence for Monday and Tuesday was granted to Mr. Keller.

Leave of absence for Monday was granted to Mr. Kramer, Mr. Stamm and Mr. Johnson, of Madison.

Leave of absence for the remainder of the week was granted to Mr. DeFrees.

Mr. FARRELL: I move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was carried.

SIXTIETH DAY

MORNING SESSION.

MONDAY, April 22, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the president and opened with prayer by the Rev. Geo. W. Burns, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. Crosser here took the chair as president pro tem.

Mr. HARBARGER: I wish to correct the minutes. I am not recorded as voting on the Roehm proposal.

The SECRETARY: It is correct in the record. The printing is wrong.

Mr. LUDEY: I notice that I am marked as voting in the affirmative and also in the negative on the Roehm proposal. I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. FARRELL: On April 8 I am marked as having failed to answer to my name on the roll call. I was present when the roll was called and I answered to my name.

The SECRETARY: It is not so recorded.

Mr. FARRELL: I was present and it was a call of the Convention by Mr. Roehm.

The SECRETARY: The record does not show you as having answered.

Mr. FARRELL: Well, I did.

Mr. HARBARGER: My name is not recorded on that either and I answered.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The secretary will make the corrections as indicated, and the journal will stand approved.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. Matthews and Mr. Shaffer.

Leave of absence for the remainder of the week was granted to Mr. Marriott.

Leave of absence for Monday and Tuesday was granted to Mr. Anderson.

Leave of absence for Monday was granted to Mr. Miller, of Fairfield.

MOTIONS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CASSIDY: I desire to offer a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 107:

WHEREAS, On the first day of April, 1912, the president of the Convention and the chairman of the committee on Claims Against the Convention were authorized and directed to enter into a contract with the F. J. Heer Printing Company for the printing and publication of the debates of this Convention, but no provision was made therein for printing the index to the volumes of such debates; therefore,

Be it resolved, That the president and chairman of said committee are hereby authorized and directed to make a contract for the printing of said index at a price of not to exceed $3.50 per page.

Mr. CASSIDY: I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution be considered at once.

Mr. STILWELL: I would like to make an inquiry as to the price at which the index is to be printed. Is that the price at which the rest of the debates is to be printed?

Mr. CASSIDY: No, sir; the rest of the debates is a lump figure based on the rate of $2.50 per page. The index has to be printed in different type and Mr. Heer charges $1 per page additional for the index.

Mr. STILWELL: Well, I object to the suspension of the rules. In my judgment it is not worth $1 per page extra, simply to set the type up and I know it is not worth $1 extra for the whole thing.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The delegate from Logan moves to suspend the rules and consider the resolution at once.

Mr. DOTY: This is the contract for the index and tabular type setting?

Mr. CASSIDY: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Printing tabular work always costs more.

Mr. STILWELL: I said it is not worth $1 per page, because it is not worth $1 to set up by hand.

Mr. DOTY: You are mistaken about that. I have set type by hand myself. I do happen to know it is worth more than $1 per page to set by hand and the pages of these debates are larger than the pages I have in mind.

Mr. STILWELL: A very little bit larger.

Mr. DOTY: It is not worth $1 per page to set it by hand, I understood you to say?

Mr. STILWELL: Not a dollar more.

Mr. DOTY: Your first proposition was that it was not worth $1 per page. I do not pretend to say what it is worth, but it strikes me if the ordinary page we are getting is $2.50 the extra tabular work is more.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is not the usual rule for tabular work fifty per cent more?

Mr. DOTY: From fifty to one hundred per cent, according to how many columns or justifications there are, and where there are two justifications on a page it is a price and a half or two prices. That is the union labor rate in Cleveland, if you want to know it.

Mr. CASSIDY: The committee that had this matter in charge overlooked any provision whatever for printing the index.

Mr. STALTER: I would ask the gentleman from Logan [Mr. CASSIDY] if he has examined the record which was kept by the committee on Printing and Publication?

Mr. CASSIDY: I have only got before me the proposition of Mr. Heer and the resolution of this Convention. I am not governed by any record of the committee on Printing and Publication.

Mr. LAMPSON: This is the price per page for twenty-five hundred copies?

Mr. CASSIDY: yes.

Mr. STALTER: Is the gentleman aware that the Printing committee received bids and kept a record of the bids they received, and does he know what the bids were?

Motions and Resolutions.

Mr. CASSIDY: Yes; I have the bid in my possession and I have examined it. It does not include any price for printing the index. If you want the index to those volumes, some provision must be made for printing it.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. LAMPSON: Have you made any estimate as to how many pages of index there will be?

Mr. CASSIDY: No; that will depend considerably on the work we do.

The yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 75, nays 20, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Hahn,	Norris,
Baum,	Halenkamp,	Nye,
Beatty, Morrow,	Halfhill,	Okey,
Beyer,	Harris, Ashtabula,	Peck,
Bowdle,	Harter, Huron,	Peters,

Crites,	Kunkel,	Tetlow,
Donahay,	Malin,	Watson,
Dunn,	Pettit,	Weybrecht,
Evans,	Rorick,	Wise.
Harbarger,	Stalter,

So the motion to suspend the rules was carried.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIO: I would like to move to refer that motion to the Printing committee.

Mr. LAMPSON: The Convention has just ordered consideration of this resolution under the suspension of the rules.

Mr. DAVIO: I think the motion to refer is in order.

Mr. DOTY: There is no question but that the motion to refer is in order, but I hope it will not be carried.

Mr. CASSIDY: As chairman of the Claims committee I have no further interest than to write the contract according to the resolution passed by this Convention, but this contract has been held up for two weeks waiting for opportunity to get authority given us to sign the contract, and a postponement of this matter means further delay in the printing. If you want it, all right. It is only delaying the matter out of all reason.

Mr. DAVIO: Some of the committee and I also understood that this contract included everything, and I voted thinking that way. I don't think it would have been acted on if the Printing committee hadn't had that idea.

Mr. DOTY: I think it is evident from the address of my colleague that his motion ought not to prevail. He indicates, after we voted 75 to 25, that he doesn't want the Convention to consider the resolution, but wants to get it into the Printing committee and keep it there.

Mr. DAVIO: That is not so.

Mr. ANTRIM: I am not a very good guesser, but I don't think the number of pages will exceed fifty and the additional expense will not be over $50. The Convention is costing $200,000, and every hour we spend is costing the state of Ohio two or three hundred dollars. Is it right that we should stand here debating this when this matter we are discussing only means an outlay of $50? I think we should pass the resolution and go on to something more important.

The motion to refer was lost.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the delegate from Logan, and the yeas and nays being regularly demanded the secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 71, nays 23, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

The resolution was adopted.

The president here resumed the chair.

The PRESIDENT: Motions and resolutions are in order.

Mr. DOTY: I move that the secretary be instructed in making up the calendar tomorrow to place Proposal No. 304 by Mr. Halfhill, No. 272 by Mr. FitzSimons and Motions and Resolutions.

No. 170 by Judge Worthington, when reported, upon tomorrow's calendar right after Proposal 261.

Mr. STILWELL: Proposal No. 170?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, when reported. I will report it tonight.

Mr. STILWELL: I object.

Mr. DOTY: I will withdraw the motion then—no, I won't. I will make it anyhow, but make it a little differently. This is the situation. There are three or four labor proposals that are at the head of the calendar. I desire to place next after the consideration of the labor program the proposal by Mr. Halfhill, No. 304, which, provides for at least one judge of the common pleas court in each county, and after that Proposal No. 272 by Mr. FitzSimons, the home rule for municipalities, and then Proposal No. 170 by Judge Worthington, which will be reported tonight, and I desire to place them upon the calendar in such place that they will come as soon as the labor program is out of the way.

Mr. WOODS: What is the object of doing this?

Mr. DOTY: I have stated it, but I will state it again. The calendar as it stands has the labor program at the top. Next in importance is the Proposal No. 304, by Mr. Halfhill, and then the so-called home rule proposal by Mr. FitzSimons, No. 272, and then No. 170, by Judge Worthington. My desire is to bring the attention of the Convention to the matter so the important things may be placed as near the head of our work as is possible. It is a matter of the utmost indifference to me.

Mr. WOODS: Is it not intended that everything on this calendar is to be acted upon?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WOODS: Then what is to be gained by changing the order?

Mr. DOTY: This is to be gained: It is very much wiser to use more time in the discussion of home rule for cities and taxation than some of these proposals here. I am only talking about the time of debate, not the relative importance. Therefore, if we use the time we have—one, two, or five weeks—upon the important matters and leave the remainder of the time to consider the less important matters, it will be much wiser than to use up the time in endless discussion on the small matters, leaving the big ones to the end.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Don't you consider Proposal No. 309, which deals with the method of amending the constitution, as one of the most important matters we have before us?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, but that comes right close after these.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: You gentlemen have no objections to putting these matters just after that, have you?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, I would; but I wouldn't have any objection to having that moved up after these.

Mr. STOKES: Since these other proposals on the calendar will take such a short time, why not consider them and get them out of the way?

Mr. DOTY: They won't take a short time. They will take a short time if you put the bulk of the time on the important work. That is the way we do in our ordinary business, put the big jobs first and let the little ones come after.

Mr. STOKES: That may be the way you do—

Mr. DOTY: And that is the way you do.

Mr. WOODS: I desire to call the yeas and nays on this proposition.

Mr. TAGGART: Proposal No. 309, which the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH] has charge of provides for the method of amending the constitution. It ought to have precedence over almost any other matter before the Convention. It ought not to be sidetracked. It ought not to be put back on the calendar for any other questions. For myself, I am opposed to giving precedence to any other of these matters that have been mentioned. These matters are on the calendar before them and they should stay before them.

Mr. DOTY: I want to change my motion and move to place Nos. 309, 304, 272 and 170 right after No. 261.

Mr. KNIGHT: I want to call attention to the fact that by motion last Thursday No. 309 was ordered to be placed on the calendar immediately after No. 272. Wherever the latter is placed the former goes along with it.

Mr. HARBARGER: I do not think there is any justification for a change in the calendar. It will take just as long at one time to discuss a little question as at another time and there is nothing saved. There must be some ulterior motive behind it. Why should not the calendar go as it is?

Mr. PIERCE: I am opposed to placing the proposals Mr. Doty speaks of ahead of the other proposals. I think every proposal should take its turn and be discussed and disposed of. There was an attempt made some weeks ago to do this same thing and the Convention overwhelmingly voted it down, and I hope they will vote this down. It is not a question of whether these are the most important questions or not. Every proposal should receive attention, and the people who have proposed them should have them discussed as they are reached. I hope the Convention will overwhelmingly vote this proposition down.

Mr. HALFHILL: There is certainly no ulterior purpose and I am satisfied the motion ought to prevail. One reason why it ought to prevail is that Proposal No. 304, which is a proposal relating to the judiciary, is supplemental to Proposal No. 184, which has been acted upon by the Convention. It ought to be gotten out of the way at an early time so that we shall be sure to have those two ready for their proper place. I think there will be scarcely any objection to No. 304. I believe it will take only a very brief time of the Convention to dispose of it.

Mr. WOODS: Will it take any longer to act on No. 304 at the end of the calendar than if you push it up ahead?

Mr. HALFHILL: I presume that is a fair question. It would not take any more time provided you were sure a reasonable amount of time would be given to a proposal of that kind, which affects every county in the state of Ohio and every individual in the state of Ohio. Some proposals possibly do not affect every county and every individual in the state of Ohio to such a full extent, but the proposals relative to municipal government and taxation certainly require consideration and a full extent of fair and free discussion. I believe they require more consideration than some of the other proposals.

Motions and Resolutions—Introduction of Proposals.

We are drawing near the end and we ought not to have some of these very great propositions at the very last; but we should dispose of them first, so that if we have to limit the time of debate we will not do it upon some three or four of the very most important questions that the Convention has yet to consider, and I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. READ: The members who have spoken in favor of this motion seem to assume that toward the end of the Convention the proposals are not to receive much attention. If that is the case, I am very much opposed to it, and if it is not the case I do not see any necessity for the change. I think we should go according to the calendar. Every man who brings up a proposal of this kind has a right to have that proposal given due attention in this Convention, no matter when it comes up, whether now, today, tomorrow or four weeks from now. Why should we not go according to the calendar, and why make any change or give any preference to one over another?

Mr. STOKES: We may as well look this matter right in the face and right in the eye. Here is an evident undertaking and an evident desire to dispose of two or three or four important matters, as they consider them, and shove all the rest aside by shoving these ahead. There are amendments on this calendar just as important as those they have named that others are undertaking to put at the foot of the calendar. I have an amendment in relation to investment companies that is of equal importance. Why, it has been estimated that the people of Ohio are sold worthless stocks amounting to $5,000,000 annually, and my proposal will prevent that, should it receive favorable action, and they are wanting to throw it down to the foot of the calendar. Every one who has observed the course of legislation knows that there is always a rush toward the end of every legislative session. It is so in congress, it is so in all legislatures, and I have no doubt it will be more or less so in this Convention, that there will be a great rush and an attempt to do a great amount of work in a very short space of time as the Convention draws near the end, and it would be a shame to have a proposition as important as the one I have referred to be crowded into a discussion of fifteen or twenty minutes or defeated for want of time.

Mr. PETTIT: When I was a boy I went to the mill a number of times. That was before the day of bartering your grist for flour or meal, and when we got there we were numbered in the order in which we arrived and our grist was ground the same way. If I had only two bushels and some man came with twenty or thirty, he didn't get his before mine if I got there first. I think the same rule ought to obtain here. I am opposed to this motion. If I had my way I would want Proposal No. 17 considered before anything else. That affects county officers all over the state. It is just as important as the other matters we have talked about. It is a mere assumption to say that an important matter will be given only half an hour. I say, take them up in regular order and give them proper consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I presume the attention of the Convention is sufficiently called to the intention of this motion. It is clear it is an attempt to discriminate in favor of some proposals against others. That is, it has been suggested that some of the reports are to come in and they are to be provided for before they come in. If that is just and fair I don't understand justice and fairness.

Mr. ROEHM: I believe the very fact that these are important proposals is the one reason why we should keep them until the last in order to keep the members here.

A ye and nay vote was regularly demanded on the passage of the motion.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 36, nays 57, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	FitzSimons,	Marshall,
Baum,	Fox,	Mauck,
Beatty, Wood,	Hahn,	Moore,
Bowdle,	Halfhill,	Okey,
Brown, Pike,	Harris, Hamilton,	Peck,

Those who voted in the negative are:

Harbarger,	Peters,	Walker,
Harris, Ashtabula,	Pettit,	Watson,
Henderson,	Pierce,	Wise,
Hoffman,	Read,	Woods.

So the motion was lost.

Mr. WATSON: Proposal No. 291 is on the calendar as a special order for 10:30 tomorrow morning. We have amended Proposal No. 17, relating to the terms of county officials and as there seems to be considerable sentiment in the Convention to limit the term of county officials it seems to me Proposal No. 17 should be acted upon before Proposal No. 291. I move that Proposal No. 17 be made a special order for 10:00 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

Mr. DOTY: I want to call attention to the fact that Proposal No. 291 has not been engrossed. In fact, it is very far from engrossment and it is altogether likely, if you will let the calendar alone, we will get to Proposal No. 17 before we engross No. 291. I hope you will follow the rule.

The motion of the delegate from Guernsey was lost.

Mr. LAMPSON: I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The next business in order is introduction of proposals. Unless there is objection we will omit the call of the counties and if anyone has a proposal to introduce he can introduce it.

Introduction of Proposals—Reference of Proposals—Reports of Standing Committees.

INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposals were introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 332.—Mr. Dunlap. To submit an amendment to article IX, section 1, of the constitution.—Relative to who shall perform military duty.

Mr. MAUCK: The proposal is to strike from the clause in the constitution relating to the militia the word "white." We may save time, therefore, by passing it now. I move that the rules be suspended and the proposal be submitted to its second reading.

The motion was lost.

Proposal No. 333.—Mr. Peck. To submit an amendment to article XV, section 10, of the constitution.—Relative to the use of property for display advertising.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The next order of business is reference to committees of proposals introduced on the preceding day.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEES OF PROPOSALS.

The following proposal was read by its title and referred as follows:

Proposal No. 331.—Mr. Walker. To the committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is reports from standing committees in their order.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. PECK: I submit the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 134—Mr. Halenkamp, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all after line 3 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Laws may be passed prescribing rules and regulations, for the conduct of cases and business in the supreme court and other courts of the state, and for the regulations of proceedings in contempt, and the limitation of the power to punish persons adjudged guilty of contempt, and any person charged with contempt, not committed in the presence of the court, shall, upon demand, be granted a trial by jury. Orders of injunction or other orders of a like character or similar effect shall not be made or issued in any case involving the employment of labor or in any controversy between employer and employee."

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck, the proposal as amended, was ordered printed.

Mr. COLTON: I submit the following report.

The standing committee on Education, to which was referred Proposal No. 329—Mr. Knight, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends its passage.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

The report was received.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I wish to offer an amendment to that and then I move that it be recommitted with the amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 7, after the word "of" strike out all down to the word "the" in line 9 and insert "March, 1913, also during the month of March, 1921, and each decennial period thereafter."

In line 11, after the word "electors" insert "not members of the general assembly."

In line 21, strike out the words "or in such manner as the general assembly shall direct."

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I move that the proposal be printed as amended.

The PRESIDENT: If there is no objection the proposal will be engrossed and placed on the calendar for second reading.

The motion to engross was carried.

Mr. DOTY: I desire to make a report.

Mr. COLTON: I desire to offer a minority report. The report was read as follows:

The undersigned members of the Taxation committee present the following minority report:

"SECTION 1. The general assembly shall never levy a poll tax.

SECTION 2. Property shall never be so classified as to permit taxes to be levied at different rates for different classes, but all real and personal property, tangible and intangible, shall be taxed by a uniform rule according to its true value in money; but burying grounds, public school-houses, houses used exclusively for public worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, personal property to an amount not exceeding two hundred dollars for each individual, and deductions of bona fide debts from credits, may, by general laws, be exempted from taxation; but all laws providing for such exemptions shall be subject to alteration or repeal.

SECTION 3. All property employed in banking, shall always bear a burden of taxation equal to that imposed on the property of individuals.

SECTION 4. The general assembly shall provide for raising revenue, sufficient to defray the expenses of the state, for each year, and also a sufficient sum to pay the interest on the state debt.

SECTION 5. No tax shall be levied, except in pursuance of law; and every law imposing a tax, shall state, distinctly, the object of same, to which only, it shall be applied.

SECTION 6. Except as otherwise provided in this constitution the state shall never contract any debt for purpose of internal improvement.

SECTION 7. The maximum rate of taxes that may be levied for all purposes shall not in any year exceed ten mills on each dollar of the total value of all property, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district. Additional levies, not exceeding in any year a maximum of five mills, for all purposes, on each dollar of the total value of all the property therein, as listed and assessed for taxation, in any taxing district, may be levied when such additional levies are authorized by a majority vote of the electors voting thereon at an election held for such purpose; but in no case shall the combined maximum rate of taxes for all purposes, levied in any year in any township, city, village, school district, or other taxing district exceed fifteen mills on each dollar of the total value of all the property, as listed and assessed for taxation in such district. No county, city, village, school district, township, or other taxing district shall ever create or incur a net indebtedness in excess of one per cent. for county purposes, four per cent. for city or village purposes, one per cent. for school purposes and one per cent. for township or other taxing district purposes, of the total value of all the property, as listed and assessed for taxation in such county, city, village, school district, township, or other taxing district. No indebtedness not payable out of current receipts shall hereafter be created, incurred, refunded, renewed, or extended without at the same time a co-incidental tax being levied, which shall be maintained sufficient to pay principal and interest at maturity.

SECTION 8. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of the right to receive or succeed to estates, and such tax may be uniform or it may be so graduated as to tax at a higher rate the right to receive or to succeed to estates of larger value than to estates of smaller value. A portion of each estate not exceeding twenty thousand dollars in value may be exempted from such tax.

SECTION 9. Laws may be enacted providing for the taxation of incomes, which tax may be either uniform or graduated, and either general or confined to incomes derived from investments not directly taxed in this state, but a part of each income not exceeding three thousand dollars in any one year may be exempt from such tax.

SECTION 10. Taxes may be imposed upon the production of coal, oil, gas and other minerals.

SECTION 11. Revenues for the payment of the expenses of the state may be provided by assessment upon the counties, but every such assessment shall be apportioned among all the counties ratably in proportion to the aggregate amount expended during the preceding year in each county by the county and all political subdivisions thereof."

RESOLUTIONS LAID OVER.

Resolution 103—Mr. Colton:

Resolved, That the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology be authorized to print such of its reports on the various proposals as it may deem necessary before presenting them to the Convention.

Mr. COLTON: That resolution was presented as the result of a motion passed by the members of the committee. It seems to me the Convention can readily see the necessity for doing this thing. Of course none of the proposals can be changed until it is reported to the Convention and the Convention agrees to it, but to facilitate the action of the Convention when the reports are made we thought best that the reports of the committee should be printed and in the hands of the Convention so the Convention could see the changes proposed.

The resolution was adopted.

The SECRETARY: The next thing in order is Resolution No. 105.

Mr. DOTY: Mr. Tallman is not here—

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that that resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was carried.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question now before the Convention is the adoption of Proposal No. 122—Mr. Farrell, which the secretary will read.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. FARRELL. Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: Having read several interpretations of "ideal government," the one which made the lasting impression upon me was one which read thus: "An injury done to the meanest subject, is an insult upon the whole constitution."

Evidently the committee having this proposal under consideration was imbued with the spirit of that interpretation. Since this proposal has been on the calendar I have heard some little objection to it, especially with reference to the clause which would permit the legislature to pass minimum wage legislation, and to that clause I intend to direct my remarks exclusively.

Of course we are not here to pass minimum wage laws, but we should so write our constitution that minimum wage legislation will be permissible under it. But no matter how we may try, we cannot avoid discussing the merits or demerits of the principle involved.

I am not in a position today to tell you just how badly such legislation is needed in this commonwealth. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I am convinced in my own mind that if an investigation were had it would reveal conditions in some of the industries, particularly those where women and children are employed within the borders of this state, which would demand legislation of this character. But whether my statement is founded upon fact or not, we are building this constitution for the future as well as for the present, and the great industrial state of Ohio should have some provision in its constitution providing for such legislation. We are all compelled to admit that there is something radically wrong with our present wage system, and there ought to be some regulation by the state of the evils existing.

I have not always been an advocate of a statutory minimum wage. On the contrary, I have been an ardent advocate of the minimum wage established by the trade union and an advocate of the trade union methods of securing the same, viz., through the system of trade agreements, the principle of collective bargaining and the voluntary arbitration of all questions of dispute.

But, gentlemen of the Convention, I have been compelled to change my position on this question in the last few years. When one considers the relentless war that has been waged against the trade union movement in this country, and the war of extermination that is now going on, and, in some instances, meeting with success, in putting some unions out of business, and the general application of "black list", all for no other reason than the piling up of capitalistic profits without any regard for justice in the premises, when we see the attempts making to build up industries on a foundation of wages too low to admit of decent standards of family life, and hours of labor too long to admit of sufficient rest and relaxation for even moderate health, we are driven to the knowledge that it is time that a decent humane effort should be made to remedy this un-American condition.

The appalling state of affairs disclosed by the investigation of the labor conditions in the steel industry of this country seems to me to be sufficiently repulsive to the average man to make him see the necessity of such a provision in our constitution. The recent revolt of the textile workers of Massachusetts against the wage-slave conditions prevalent in that industry when 25,000 men, women and children, without a semblance of an organization, went out on strike against a reduction in their wages, already so low that their condition was next to starvation, must give all thinking men pause.

Gentlemen, in the light of these events and many others too numerous to mention or to encumber the record with, can you vote against this measure of justice? No. You must believe with such writers as Sidney and Beatrice Webb that the state ought to enforce a national minimum of wages which will provide the laborer with "the food, clothing and shelter physiologically necessary, according to national habit and custom, to prevent bodily deterioration." By this means the community would rid itself of the industrial evil called "parasitism," that is, the existence of trades or business in which the wages paid are too low to maintain the workers in industrial efficiency, and to enable them to reproduce and rear a sufficient number to take their places. These industries take from the nation's capital stock of character, intelligence and energy more than they give back, and, therefore, steadily degrade the character and industrial efficiency of the whole people. Hence, as a matter of simple protection to the national life, both present and future, this practice ought to be prohibited and all workers ought to be given, through appropriate legal measures, sufficient remuneration to maintain their productive power.

I don't mean to say, nor do I want you to understand me as saying, that if this clause should be inserted in our constitution there should be any wild and rampant era of minimum wage legislation. The greatest thing to my mind to keep wage conditions near a living standard is the light of publicity. To date we have no official method of publicity. Under such a provision the legislative authorities of our state would have ample jurisdiction in the premises. In other words, wouldn't the "shotgun over the door" theory apply here, as was well said in the initiative and referendum debate?

Such a system of legislation has been in operation in the state of Victoria, Australia, since 1896, and in Great Britain since January, 1910. Some form of fixing legal minimum wages is also in operation in the other Australian states and in New Zealand. In Victoria and England the minimum wages are determined by wage boards created for considering the special requirements of the respective industries or trades. No accurate statement can be made as to the effect of this legislation upon wages, and the difference in social and economic conditions renders comparisons of less value. Their experiences, while interesting and important, are not conclusive.

In Victoria, at the instance of either employers or employes or of the minister of labor, the legislature may authorize the creation of a special board, which is empowered to fix a minimum wage for a given trade. Employers and employes are equally represented upon such a board, and a non-partisan chairman is selected by the two parties at interest, or, if they fail to agree, is appointed by the minister of labor. The chairman has a casting vote. "Determinations," as the decisions of the special boards are called, if accepted by the minister of labor, are published in the Government Gazette and become law for that trade; but if the minister of labor considers that a determination may cause injury to the trade, he may suspend it for a period of six months and then send it back to the board for reconsideration. There is also the court of industrial appeals, to which determinations may be referred, and this court has the power to amend or annul a determination. The decision of the court is final, but it may review its own decisions. Moreover, the court of appeals is specifically instructed to consider whether a determination has been or may be injurious to a trade or may limit employment, "and of opinion that it has had or may have such effect, the court shall make such alterations as in its opinion may be necessary to remove such or prevent such effect, and at the same time secure a living wage to employes" (Factory and Shop Act, 1905, No. 1975). The law ignores the possibility of cases in which the maintenance of the trade and the payment of a living wage to the employes may be incompatible. These special boards, although authorized to secure a "living wage," in practice have served rather to formulate common rules for a trade, to bring employes and employers into readjustment of wages and other matters to changing economic conditions. Their flexibility in dealing with complex situations is obvious. Few appeals have been made from their decisions to the court of industrial appeals. The claim that the system is not considered antagonistic by propertied interests is borne out by a great weight of testimony. On this point Victor Clark, who visited Victoria in 1903 and 1904 as a representative of the United States department of labor, states:

Propertied interests were not opposed to a statutory minimum wage. The better employers rather courted some provision that freed them from the competition of the less scrupulous men of their own class.

He further states that all of the three special boards then in operation were established upon application of employers.

In England the industries in which the system may be applied are named by parliament, but the board of trade may provisionally extend the application of the act to other industries, subject to subsequent continuation of parliament. The wage boards, known as trade boards, are composed of representatives of employers and of workers in equal numbers, elected by their respective organizations, and of other members, including the chairman, appointed by the board of trade. The determinations of these trade boards are made obligatory by an order of the board of trade, but the board of trade may suspend the operation of the order. If the order is suspended the trade board may, after six months, again renew its recommendation, and the board of trade may then issue an obligatory order or further suspend it. Minimum wage orders determined in this manner apply to both men and women, and they may apply universally to the trades, or apply to any special process in the work of the trade, or to any special class of workers in the trade or to any special case.

The act (9 Edward VII, chapter 22) went into effect January 1, 1910, and applied immediately to the trades of wholesale tailoring, box making, lace making and chain making. The act has not been in operation long enough to judge of its ultimate success, but it was adopted after mature consideration by a select committee whose laborious investigations included a field study by Ernest Aves, commissioner of the home office, into the workings of minimum wage regulations both in Australia and New Zealand. In the passage of the bill through parliament it was not made a party or a class measure, and it does not seem to have met any particular opposition from any quarter. In one industry at least it has been gladly accepted by employers, who even contributed money to enable their employes to organize for the purpose of taking advantage of the act.

So much for the old country. Now let us see what is happening right here in our own country. Under the auspices of the National Consumers' League a bill drawn up by Prof. Jno. R. Commons, of the University of Wisconsin, was presented to the legislature of that state last year. It authorized the state industrial commission to fix living wages for all persons in industrial employment. While it did not pass, it had many warm and urgent defenders in each house.

In March, 1911, a bill embodying the wage-board principle and applying only to women and children was introduced in the Minnesota legislature, and at once reported favorably by the committee having the same in charge, but never came up for final passage. Why, right down here in old conservative Massachusetts, a state where I had the good fortune at one time to reside, the legislature passed a resolution creating a commission to report on the advisability of establishing minimum wage boards with the power to fix the wages of women and minors. That commission reported to the legislature last January favorably a bill authorizing minimum wage boards with power to fix the rate of wages, and in speaking of its necessity, the Massachusetts commission had this to say:

The need of it is great, and the possibilities of its successful administration in the compact population and well-established industrial and mercantile employments are promising. The fact that there is a large number of women who must maintain themselves, many of whom are called upon to contribute also to the support of others, and that there is a large army of women upon whose assistance the welfare of their family groups depend in part, presents a social question of great importance. The need of work is so great and the workers so numerous that the employers may dictate their own terms, limited only by their sense of social responsibility and by the restricted competition of other employment opportunities. The constant and ever increasing tide of immigration is an important element in the situation. The wage value of most of the labor of women is not fixed by any other economic law than that of supply and demand. Even with women who have no other assistance the wages may be forced below the minimum cost of living, without provisions for the assurance of health, for unemployment or for old age, and this deficit must inevitably come ultimately as a charge on society.

The proposed legislation is, therefore, recommended for the following reasons:

1. It would promote the general welfare of the state, because it would tend to protect the women workers, and particularly the younger women workers from the economic distress that leads to impaired health and inefficiency.

2. It would bring employers to a realization of their public responsibilities and would result in the best adjustment of the interests of the employment and of the women employees.

3. It would furnish to the women employes a means of obtaining the best minimum wages that are consistent with the ongoing of the industry without recourse to strikes or industrial disturbances. It would be the best means of insuring industrial peace so far as this class of employes is concerned.

4. It would tend to prevent exploitation of helpless women, and, so far as they are concerned, to do away with "sweating" in our industries.

5. It would diminish the parasitic character of some industries and lessen the burden now resting on other employments.

6. It would enable the employers in any occupation to prevent the undercutting of wages by less humane and considerate competitors.

7. It would stimulate employers to develop the capacity and efficiency of the less competent workers in order that the wages might not be incommensurate with the services rendered.

8. It would accordingly tend to induce employers to keep together their trained workers and to avoid so far as possible seasonal fluctuations.

9. It would tend to heal the sense of grievance in employes, who would become in this manner better informed as to the exigencies of their trade, and it would enable them to interpret more intelligently the meaning of the payroll.

10. It would give the public assurance that these industrial abuses have an effective and available remedy.

Bear with me, gentlemen, for a few moments until I read to you from an address on this subject delivered by Rev. Jno. A. Ryan, professor of ethics and economies in the St. Paul Seminary, a Catholic institution in St. Paul, Minnesota. This address was delivered at the annual conference of the National Consumers League held in Milwaukee, in 1910, of which I read in part:

Why should we hesitate to prevent by legislation the hardship, injustice and social waste due to freedom of contract in the matter of wages? Instead of opposing, historical precedent favors the method. Down to the latter part of the eighteenth century wages in commercial and industrial employment has been in most cases fixed either by formal statutes and edicts, by the ordinances of quasi-legal corporations, such as mediaeval guild, or by custom, which was as effective as law, and as little subject to the influences of free contract. Speaking generally we may say that it is the present system and not the method of regulating wages by law that is an innovation. Nor does the legal determination of wages differ in principle from the other industrial legislation that we have already enacted. Every argument for the latter can be urged with at least equal force in favor of the former. In both instances the law is designed to protect one section of the community against exploitation by another section. A wage that will enable the worker to live decently is as important and as necessary as protection to life, limb and vitality in the factory or the safeguarding of his income from the extortion of monopoly. All legislation is ultimately for the benefit of concrete human beings and every law is justified which, without doing injustice to any class, brings a wider measure of justice to some class or classes of the community.

Experience has shown that the injurious results predicted by the opponents of labor legislation and labor organizations have not taken place. There has been no general increase in prices, nor any increase in any case that equaled the increase in wages or the expected increase in other items of the cost of production. In the majority of instances the greater part of the cost has been met by an increased efficiency in the productive process, that is, in labor, in machinery, and in the combination of these two factors.

Welfare of Employees.

Concerning the constitutionality of this legislation the American Economic Review has an article by Prof. A. N. Holcombe, in the March number, which very ably points out the basic legality of the same. From this I read in part:

The doctrines of the judicial review of the exercise of legislative authority owes its present importance in the United States to two circumstances. One is the interpretation placed upon a certain clause of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution by the federal supreme court. The other is the manning of our courts with a set of judges whose economic training was received mainly from the so-called classical school of political economists. Since 1868 no person may be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, as interpreted by the federal courts. There has been much controversy over the meaning of the terms "deprived of liberty" and "property," and this controversy directly concerns the status of the proposal to regulate wages in private employment by law. Is constitutional liberty simply freedom from physical restraint, or does the term mean freedom from control in any manner except in so far as may be necessary to assure a like freedom to others? If the former, a statute regulating wages in private employments will not work a deprivation of liberty since it carries with it no restraint of the body, but merely of the legal capacity to enter into a contract. If the latter, such a statute will work a deprivation of liberty since it will restrict the freedom of the individual employer to buy labor in the cheapest market, and of the individual wage-earner to sell his labor for what it will fetch. Again, is constitutional property simply things of value the possession of which is recognized by law, or does the term include also things of value which may be acquired, provided the individual's legal privileges at the moment are preserved unaltered. If the former, a statute regulating wages will not work a deprivation of property since it will not of itself diminish the quantity of a person's possessions. If the latter, such a statute, by imposing a new limitation upon the privilege of making lawful contracts, may deprive a person of an opportunity to enter into a supposedly advantageous agreement to buy or sell labor. The federal supreme court has interpreted the fundamental law in each of the pair of alternatives in the latter sense. The effect of such judicial interpretation has been to read into the constitution a doctrine that is nowhere expressed therein, namely, the doctrine of freedom of contract. The constitutionality of such legislation depends, therefore, upon the possession by some legislative body of authority to accomplish its enactment. Such authority may be found in the ordinary police power of the state to provide for the common defense and general welfare of its citizens. This power is restricted only by expressed limitations in the state constitutions, by the delegation of certain powers to the federal government and by the requirement that the legislature in its exercise of the police power shall be guided by reason. The prevalent uncertainty concerning the constitutionality of the legal regulations of wages in private employment arises, not from the boldness and vigor of reviewing the reasonableness of legislation under the police power, but from their general acceptance of an economic theory now being discarded by the mass of the people.

The construction of the fourteenth amendment that threatens the capacity of the state legislation to regulate wages in private employment, if they deem it necessary and proper for the protection of the public, is not the work of the American people in 1869, but of the courts in subsequent years. Like all acts of government, constituting government by men and not by law, this novel interpretation of the fundamental law can be undone by a change in the men who interpret it. The principles of laissez faire, having been read into the constitution, can be read out again. There is no essential difference so far as constitutional status is concerned, between the legal regulation of the hours of labor and the legal regulation of wages. The constitutionality of both alike is solely a matter of producing a sufficient evidence showing the necessity and appropriateness of the proposed legislation.

Mr. Bryan in speaking to this Convention recently, if you remember, had this to say:

In the matter of hours of labor, the legislature should be authorized to prescribe what should be regarded as a working day, and the conditions under which longer hours may be compelled.

I submit, a statement emanating from such a student of social conditions, and to my mind embodying the very principle of the minimum wage, is worthy of the serious reflection and consideration of the Convention.

In conclusion, I want to say this as expressing my own convictions on this subject: The right of the worker to be guaranteed a living wage by his state or his government will soon take rank with such axioms as the right of trial by jury, the right to bear arms, the right of petition and the right of speech, and though you may not see the necessity of the adoption of this governmental right to establish a minimum wage, yet such a crisis may arise at any moment. It is my hope and the hope of the workers of Ohio that this principle may receive the sanction of this Convention.

Mr. CRITES: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: If you will consider Proposal No. 122 very carefully, I am quite sure you will plainly see that no such wording should ever go into our organic law. First, you will note that this proposal is for the sole purpose of limiting the number of hours of labor; second, to establish a minimum wage for the wageworker. Now without any question these two demands in our new constitution would soon be more detrimental to our commonwealth than any article we would have in our organic law. Should we pass this proposal and include the same in our constitution, at any time our legislature would be made up of members that would be controlled by labor unions, drastic laws would be passed at once, limiting the number of hours of work for each man, woman and child, and a compulsory law compelling every employer to pay a certain price per hour to every one of his employes. This kind of law would be very unjust to the employer as well as the employe. The employer of our manufacturing plants would be compelled to pay the man that would earn half the wages the same per day that he would for men that would earn full pay. This kind of law would also work a hardship on many of the employes for the reason that employers would only employ men that could earn the employer the most money. All afflicted employes would be idle on the streets, or have to be sent to the county alms house. It would also prohibit piece-work, which is very essential in many of our large industries. A law that would establish a wage scale would be inclined to lower or decrease the earning power of man and to regulate the number of hours would be depriving a man of his liberty, as well as putting a stop to the progressive welfare of our nation.

First, taking the employer's side, he would be compelled to advance the price on his manufactured goods, and all our manufacturing plants that are manufacturing perishable goods would be compelled to close out their business or move to a state which would not have any such arbitrary regulating laws. Short hours would increase the cost of living far beyond what it is today.

Take the employe's side. All good progressive people would be placed in a position where they could not work extra time to add to their present holdings. For instance, a laborer who has a mortgage on his property would be placed in a position where he could not work extra time and be able to pay off his mortgage in the given time as he could if he were to have his liberty.

We are asked the question, Why is the cost of living so high? I will answer, unless we can induce people to stay on the farms and produce the foods, our cost of living will gradually increase from year to year.

Now if we are going to offer any better inducement to labor in factories and city employment than we are paying today, how do you expect laboring people to stay on our farms and grow the necessary foods we must have? I do not think that it is the desire of the members of the Convention to put anything in our constitution that will injure our manufacturing interests in this state as well as benefit a few and work a hardship to others. Let us have a constitution that gives liberty to one and all. I thank you.

Mr. LAMPSON: This is a very important matter and a very interesting one. I do not think we ought to vote on it just yet, but I do not understand that the theory of this proposal is to authorize the legislature to pass laws by which arbitrary minimum wages can be determined upon by a board. I think some board will be authorized by general legislation to investigate each case and determine what is a just, fair and minimum wage in that particular factory or that particular sweatshop, if you please. I think one of the greatest evils in the industrial situation in this country today is what is known as sweatshop work. Women perforce of necessity and of their situation and environment are compelled to labor for wages far below what is necessary to give them a decent living, and in many instances far below what the trades can well afford to pay. This is a pretty large question and reaches in a good many directions, but I can see, if there were some authority to investigate these cases such as I have suggested—and there are many others like them—and fix a minimum wage, it might work greatly to the advantage of all of the people, laborers as well as the public generally. It will have a tendency to prevent strikes, it will have a tendency to improve the morals of the community.

I don't think we should reach a conclusion hastily without discussion of this important matter, a somewhat new question, perhaps to us in Ohio, without giving it more consideration. I don't think the farmer needs to fear that this is intended to reach out to him. He is dealing with a few individuals. I don't think a proposition of this kind is intended to reach him at all, but there is a class of laborers, where some sort of intervention would be a good thing, not only for the laborers, but for the public generally. So far as I am concerned, I am inclined to favor this proposal.

Mr. DWYER: In the arts and sciences, in intellectual growth, in material wealth, in a knowledge of everything that should lead to individual and national happiness, this is the greatest age in the world's history. The prejudices of the past, in religion, in race, in nationality, are fast passing away. The comingling of all people, of all races and creeds, is bringing us closer together, as members of one great human family.

To me who have lived over eighty years through sunshine and storm, and who have observed its attendant growth and progress up to the present time, there is great cause to rejoice to see this day. The public schools of the United States are silent but potent factors in producing results that will bring us all to a common level. I do not mean by this that all will be equal physically or intellectually, for nature has not so ordained, but you cannot enslave intelligence; you may guide it in a moral way and along the lines of equal justice by appealing to its conscience, but to bend it down by fetters of class cannot be done. I therefore appeal to the men of wealth and power to remember the age in which they are living. You are needed, your ability, energy and wealth are needed, for great enterprises, but keep your ears to the ground to know what is going on around you. We want no Reign of Terror, no French Revolution. We want peace and progress to reign, and you to be potent factors in producing it. We want you to join with us in forcing down the willful waste and voluptuous extravagance of the idle rich, the miscellaneous marriages and the monkey dinners of the parvenues of Newport and other resorts of foolish fashion, which should be looked upon as no better than the underworld of the fallen race. We want no Belshazzar feasts. The handwriting is on the wall, the masses will rule the land, and you will be weighed in the balance. Let it be hoped you will not be found wanting.

Of those to whom much is given much is required. In other words, if the Lord has given physical strength, energy, vigorous intellect, and all the qualities for success in life, he wants you to use them, not bury them in the ground; and out of their use and results not to forget your less favored brother. Therefore, give your employes fair living wages, good sanitary surroundings during hours of labor, protection as far as possible against danger, a fair working day. Make his life as pleasant for him as you can consistent with his employment. We want no paupers among those willing to work. Their wages should be sufficient for them to live in reasonable comfort, to raise their children on nourishing food to build up their bodies, to procure sufficiently comfortable clothing for them in attending school, and to make provision for times of sickness and old age.

Perhaps some will say that the subject of employment is a matter of contract between employer and the employee with which the government has nothing to do. This is not so. Under its police powers, its sanitary authority, and the right to see that justice is done, it may regulate employment. The usurer who would like to loan money at exorbitant rates of interest may say that the rates of interest on money should be a matter of private contract with which the government has nothing to do. But government says not so. In the loaning of money the parties are not on an equality. One party needs it and must have it; the other party has it, but is not compelled to part with it. If then there were no law to regulate interest the party who needs the money urgently would be compelled in most cases to pay the usurer's price. Hence, in the interest of the borrower, and to save him from the greed of the loan shark, the law fixes the maximum rate of interest that can be charged.

On this question of private contract let me call attention to a step taken by the English government in reference to Irish landlords some twenty-five years ago. Up to that time the tenant class in Ireland were entirely at the mercy of the landlords. Some landlords would not grant any leases, but would treat their tenants as tenants at will, while perhaps they had occupied the same land for an indefinite period of time; others would grant short leases, but in either case the rents were excessive, and if the tenant improved the land, he not only got nothing for it, but his rent would be raised as a consequence. The conditions became intolerable, but there it was a question of private contract. The government took the bit in its teeth, and passed an act of parliament dealing with the subject by which a commission was appointed to fix the rents between the landlord and the tenants. There was much howling on the part of the landlords about the government's interference with the right of private contract, but the government went on all the same. The commission fixed the rents, in most cases cutting them in two, and the landlords had to submit. The government went still further, and allowed a tenant on leaving land the value of his improvements. And this was not all. It provided that tenants could purchase the lands they occupied by payment for same on the basis of a certain number of years' rental, the money for which the government furnished at a low rate of interest, taking the land as security. The consequence is that today Ireland is enjoying a degree of prosperity greater than it has ever before enjoyed.

England has also an employers' liability law, and is preparing an old-age pension. Germany is working along the same lines.

I say if the government can fix the maximum rate for the use of money, why could it not fix a minimum rate for the hours of labor? Is there any reason or principle why they should not? One is because a man who is borrowing the money is not on an equality with the man who is lending. He is at a disadvantage. He needs some money and must have it. And if the government didn't fix the rate of interest he would be compelled to pay whatever rate the man who has the money demanded that he should pay, and that would be against the interest of society and against the struggling man. Hence the government says, "No, sir; you can't charge any rates of interest you please. It is not a matter of contract because you are not on an equality." I say the same as to laborers. The working man is not on an equality with the employer. The working man has to labor and he must keep his family from starvation. He must have labor. The other man can say, "I can find plenty of labor; I can get along without you." Then why should not this man who sells his labor be entitled to fair compensation and why should not the government have a right to fix a minimum to be paid him? On the railroads, engineers and conductors and the brakemen, because of their number and because of their organization, fix the rate of wages. They are able to command it. Today there is a strike of engineers threatened all over the country east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio, because they can not get the wages they think they are entitled to, and the railroads will have to concede. If that is true of organized labor, why should it not be true of the other fellows who have not organized? When you go out you see these poor fellows working at all sorts of labor four and five miles apart; they have no organization. They are out working on their railroad for $1.25 a day and some for less money than that. Is that fair in this country of ours, with our civilization and with our desire to build up good citizenship, that men should be compelled to work for $1.25 a day, raise a family and pay house rent? I say it is not just and it is not fair, and if these men were able to have an organization they could have better pay, but they are not able to organize. They are helpless, and the railroad corporations have not the magnanimity to appreciate the helplessness of those men to give them enough to raise their families as American families should be raised. Talk about not being able to fix a minimum rate! Look at England and Ireland. For centuries the people who lived on the land were at the mercy of the landlords. Sometimes they would give them a lease, but generally they were tenants at will, notwithstanding their ancestors had lived on the land before them. If they planted a tree or a shrub they wouldn't dare to cut it down. They were perfectly helpless. What did the English government do? They passed an act of parliament fixing the rent between the landlord and the tenant, and they said to the landlord, "It is not a matter of private contract. These people are not on an equality with you in fixing the rent. You have the land and you can put them off, but we will fix the rent." And the government did. Parliament created a commission to fix the rent and took that matter out of the domain of private contract and in most cases cut the rent down one-half. Not only that, but up to that time if a man made any improvement on the land he couldn't touch it and if he left the land he couldn't take a penny's worth of his improvement with him. The government went forward and fixed the value of improvements that the tenant made, so when he left the land he got paid for his improvements. Not only that, but it has gone further, and has fixed the valuation on the land. When the tenant desires to buy the land he has lived on he is allowed to buy it and the government has issued bonds and lends the money to the people for this purpose. Now if in monarchical England that can be done and private contract can be set aside and the government step in, why can we not in this country? You may say we are bound down by a written constitution. You may have a written constitution now, but you won't be able to enforce it. You will not be able to control the conduct of the people. It is all moonshine and the sooner the capitalists and manufacturers realize this fact the sooner it will be improved for the benefit of posterity. It is coming some way. It will come peacefully or by revolution. You can not go much farther the way we have been going. If this man who is working on the railroad at $1.25 a day could appeal to a tribunal appointed by the state to fix these wages that tribunal would say, "You are working ten hours a day, you ought to have $2." They would not give the same wages to the common laborer as to the skilled mechanics, but they would fix the wages and then let every man, according to the ability and the intelligence God has given him, get more. Some men are worth a good deal more than others. Let the minimum wage be measured by the average man's ability. If we do not do something of that kind we are bound to have trouble. I think any of you can observe how things are going around us. I want to avoid trouble. I want to avoid things coming in the future that will upset the government, and therefore I am in favor of placing the people of this country on a basis that will enable them to live as American citizens should live. I have been for many years an advocate of a minimum rate of wages. For that reason I want to cut out the sweatshops, and this minimum wage will cut them out. They can not get children and girls to work in their sweatshops. Some of you, when you wear a suit of fine broadcloth don't know that it was made in a sweatshop where there were microbes of all kinds and character. You wear it as a fine suit of clothes given to you by your merchant tailor and it may have been made in a microbe-breeding sweatshop.

Welfare of Employes.

This does not apply to labor on a farm. You can not do that. It will not apply to domestic service. You cannot regulate that, but it will apply to a class of men I speak of working by the day.

Mr. CRITES: Do you think this wage scale should apply to farmers?

Mr. DWYER: No.

Mr. CRITES: Why not?

Mr. DWYER: I will explain it to you. In farming some days in the week the men on the farm don't do any work. When the weather is bad or when it is raining there is no work. Sometimes they have to work extra hours in cases of emergency. Suppose the wheat is ripe. A great many farmers even work on Sunday when the wheat is ripe and has to be cut. Then a great many of the farmers give their help a half day on Saturday. They get all their pay whether they are working or not, so that this would not apply to farming.

Mr. CRITES: If we passed this proposal what would keep it from applying to farmers as well as to railroads?

Mr. DWYER: The principle is different. On a farm you can not regulate it in that way.

Mr. LAMPSON: Are not the environment and surroundings of farm labor entirely different from the surroundings of the sweatshop and the railroad or any class of labor for large companies?

Mr. DWYER: Yes.

Mr. LAMPSON: And are not the farm laborers independent to hire out as they please?

Mr. RORICK: Isn't every other class too?

Mr. DWYER: I pay farm hands $25 a month and board and washing. Some days they don't work and their pay goes on. Why should this apply the same to men of that kind as men working on the railroad?

Mr. HOSKINS: You are on this committee that reported this proposal?

Mr. DWYER: Yes.

Mr. HOSKINS: I wish you would tell this Convention, and I want to know for information, why is this necessary, and can not all of these things provided for in this proposal be done under the present constitution? If not, why not? What is there to prevent it? Where is the prohibition from doing these things in the present constitution?

Mr. DWYER: The question may be raised by the courts. It has been raised by the court. We want under the constitution to give power to the legislature to pass such a law.

Mr. HOSKINS: Has not the legislature passed such a law?

Mr. DWYER: No, sir.

Mr. HOSKINS: They regulate the hours of labor?

Mr. DWYER: They do as to public labor.

Mr. HOSKINS: Haven't they regulated the hours of labor in private enterprises?

Mr. DWYER: No, sir; they have fixed ten hours as a day's work. That is considered a day in all kinds of labor, but supposing they would fix a minimum wage, it is a question whether the legislature has the power, and to surely give them that power we want it put in the constitution that they can fix that minimum wage.

Mr. HOSKINS: What provision of the present constitution forbids them doing it?

Mr. DWYER: The power is not granted.

Mr. HOSKINS: No, but is not our constitution a constitution of prohibitions and can not the legislature do whatever it is not prohibited from doing in the constitution?

Mr. DWYER: I want the power given expressly so there will not be any question. You all recognize the necessity.

Mr. HOSKINS: I am agreeing with your speech on the labor question, but we are adopting a constitution and we don't want to adopt more than is necessary. I will ask you if, under this provision you have reported, the legislature would not pass a law fixing the wages upon farm labor and domestic labor about the house and all forms of labor?

Mr. DWYER: There is no way in which you can fix a minimum wage for farm labor. You know enough about farm labor to know it is spasmodic, done by fits and starts. In the shops and railroad yards it is a uniform thing all day and all the year round.

Welfare of Employees.

Mr. HOSKINS: Could not the legislature under this provision fix a wage scale for all forms of labor?

Mr. DWYER: No; we except some forms of labor.

DELEGATES: No, you don't.

Mr. DWYER: That could be done then.

Mr. HOSKINS: There are no exceptions in this.

Mr. DWYER: I think farm labor and domestic labor should be excepted. I am in favor of that myself. You can not enforce either of these.

Mr. HOSKINS: I wish to ask: Did your committee in its discussion find or conclude that there was anything in the constitution that would forbid the doing of everything provided for in this proposal?

Mr. DWYER: We were of the opinion that possibly the power is now in the legislature to do that, but we wanted to have the power expressly conferred, and my understanding was that we excepted farm labor and domestic labor.

Mr. LAMPSON: Did you investigate the question as to whether that provision in the constitution relating to the passage of laws violating the obligation of contract has any bearing on this proposal?

Mr. DWYER: The courts have been deciding cases. Take that bake-shop case in New York. The supreme court there decided it was a question of private contract about the hours of labor. Our courts are becoming more progressive. They are catching the spirit of the time and they are changing very much to be in accord with public sentiment, and we should enable them to do that and we should put a clause in the constitution that will give the courts an opportunity to more liberally construe these matters than they have done in the past.

A few weeks ago England was shaken from one side to another by the coal miners' strike. That coal strike could have done more than Germany could to cripple England. These strikes are coming, and the only way to control them is to give the government a chance to pass such laws as this.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I understand you to speak of railroad labor, meaning, I suppose, the labor of the section men on the railroad, as being a matter which might be adjusted by a commission.

Mr. DWYER: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If a commission should undertake to fix a minimum wage for section men on a railroad, what would be the effect on farm help in all that region?

Mr. DWYER: That would have to take care of itself.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think it would.

Mr. DWYER: Do you believe that a railroad section man, because he is unable to take care of himself and unable to demand better wages, should be compelled to work for $1.25 a day and try to rear his family as American citizens?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: There is no law compelling him to work for the railroad company.

Mr. DWYER: No law except necessity. Necessity is the only law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Suppose you raise his wages to $2 a day. What would be the effect on all the other labor?

Mr. DWYER: The same effect as if you would raise wages of other people.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Then that would raise the price of farm labor and you would raise the price of farm produce, and that would have an additional effect on the high cost of living.

Mr. DWYER: Would you rather have that man rear his children not fit to be American citizens, unable to send them to school and be unable to properly care for them or give them nourishing food?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think the people should have enough to eat, but if you make the price of living so high that he can't buy it, how is he going to get enough to eat?

Mr. DWYER: Why is it the English government was compelled to disregard private contracts in fixing the rent in Ireland between the landlord and tenant?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: There were probably peculiar conditions there.

Mr. DWYER: And there are here, and unless you take time by the forelock to prevent these things we are going to have trouble.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Is there anything in this proposal that discriminates between one line of business and another?

Mr. DWYER: No, sir. I believe labor should be classified. Take skilled labor, the average labor and unskilled labor. Carpenters, say their average wage is $2.50, and now you could fix that as the minimum wage of that class of labor and then they could get more than that according to their ability.

Mr. LAMPSON: I want to ask the gentleman if the legislature two years ago did not pass a law making a minimum wage for common school teachers $40 per month and was not that law held unconstitutional?

Mr. DWYER: I can not answer that.

Mr. LAMPSON: I am speaking for information. A law was passed fixing a minimum wage for school teachers in the common schools that was $40 per month.

Mr. DWYER: I regret that I can not answer that question. Now, Mr. President and gentlemen, I regret that I have been compelled to occupy the floor so long, but this is a very important matter. It is a matter to which I have given a good deal of attention through all my life. I have worked in shops, I have worked on the farm and worked at almost everything, and I know about this. I want to say one thing further. When I was a young man working in a shop there were no labor organizations. Every young man and every old man had to make the best of the labor he could find to do. In the town where I worked there were three different concerns of the same character of manufacturing. One of these was operated by a man, a close, narrowminded fellow who was all the time putting down prices so he could undersell his neighbors, and every time he cut down the prices he would cut down the men's wages. The man I worked for could not meet the competition. He would liked to have upheld prices. He was liberal, but he was compelled to cut and meet that other fellow who would cut. So it was that the miserable whelp was cutting down and the liberal man had to come down with him to keep in the market. It is not the liberal man who fixes wages; it is the man who desires to cut down all the time.

Now I say this is an important matter for the consideration of every delegate on this floor. If England were compelled to do what she did to prevent revolution, look out here, gentlemen; that is all I have to say. I present the proposal. It is for you to consider, and I say it is fair and just that a minimum wage should be fixed. It injures nobody. It will not be fixed at an extravagant figure, but only at a fair figure, so that a man can live and rear a family as American citizens should be reared.

Mr. STALTER: I move that we recess until 9:30 tomorrow morning.

Mr. LAMPSON: I think it is the desire to adjourn. I don't think the Convention should adjourn yet, though. The motion to recess was lost.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I am not very well prepared to say what I desire to say on this subject, but the subject is up and I will have to venture a few remarks. It is absolutely foolish to talk about fixing a minimum wage and say it will not apply to all classes of work. As a farmer in this Convention I want it to apply to farmers as well as to anyone else. The farmers do not ask any favors of the Convention. All we want is justice. I know that in countries where they have a minimum wage, it does apply to all industries, and from the best information I can get it is a detriment to the laboring men. I have in mind now a case in which the wages of the day laborer or the laborer working by the week or month were fixed and the capitalists owned all the houses. The wages of the men were raised and the capitalists owning the houses raised the rent to the full extent of the increase of the men's wages, and the government had to build houses for the laboring men. That occurred in South Australia. I know that a majority—if not a majority, a very large minority—of the laboring men in Australia claimed that after that was done they were in worse condition than they were twenty-five years ago. I know that they have an arbitration court in one of the states of Australia and I know a gentleman by the name of Peter Bowling—I know of him, at least—who would not stand by their own arbitration court and who raised a riot and was put into jail. Some of the laboring men's children had to eat bread and drink water for days. I know finally they had to let him out of prison to satisfy the labor party. I have talked with Attorney General Halman, and he said it was right to punish Bowling, but he had let him out of prison as he had been punished enough. There is a great reaction in Australia because of this. Don't think I am opposed to the laboring man. I have been a laboring man all my life. But the way to settle your labor question is to establish socialism or at least co-operation in the different industries. You have to get unselfish first, and then it will work all right. I want to say you will make a mistake if you adopt this proposal. I had some instructions to vote for the original and I see nothing in the original that I am opposed to, but I do not like this amended proposal. I do not like it because I don't think it will do any good. I do not suppose there is any occupation in Ohio or any trade in Ohio where the laboring men receive any more wages than they do on the farm, but we can not get them there. They won't go on the farm. Give them high wages and yet they are not satisfied. The first thing you know we will have to form a combination of farmers, but I am opposed to all combinations for the purpose of raising prices.

Mr. NORRIS: You speak about having to form a combination of farmers. Don't you find it profitable in hiring farm labor to hire the best men you can find and pay them the best wages—give them a little more than they ask and not cut them down—doesn't it pay to so treat them that when your property is in danger of destruction they will go out and look after it? Don't you find by treating men right you are doing best for yourself?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I have always said "Go somewhere else and get better wages than I can afford to pay you if you can. If you can get better wages, go and get them." I had a gentleman I could trust, just as you say, and he went off and stayed two months and he was mighty glad to get back.

The theory is that any fool can be a farmer, but I don't subscribe to that. I thought once that I might be a merchant, a lawyer, a doctor or a minister, because I knew it took more brains to run a farm than be either of those.

Mr. NORRIS: Do you think you could have made a preacher of yourself?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I might have. I was not prepared to talk on this, but I thought I might throw out a few ideas as to why this proposal should not be adopted.

Mr. STAMM: Don't the dumbest farmers sometimes raise the biggest potatoes?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: Not often. I am not opposed to the poor girls in the factories and stores and the poor laboring class getting more wages, and I don't want any farmer to vote against this because he thinks it will hit the farmer. There is no class of men in the world who has been robbed more often and who can stand it better than the American farmer, but he is not opposed to fair wages that the laboring man may enjoy the comforts of life.

Mr. ELSON: It seems to me that the kernel of this proposal is a minimum wage. Whenever I read of or hear contentions between capital and labor, other things being equal, my sympathies are on the side of labor. I think I am willing to vote for this proposal, but I wish to say that I question very much whether it will be effective. The wages of labor have always, as far as I have examined the subject, been regulated by the law of supply and demand. I think that is the general rule with very few exceptions indeed. I am aware that labor unions have a great deal to do with wages. I have been through the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania and have studied that question to some extent, and I am aware that the miners' union has had much to do with fixing the wages, and that the wages of the miners would be very much less than they are now if it had not been for the union, but the union must take into account supply and demand.

Mr. STILWELL: Do you realize that this is an effort upon the part of organized workers of the state to assist those who are not able to organize because of the poor conditions under which they labor?

Mr. ELSON: Yes, I think I do, but I question whether they can possibly be effective. Now our friend from Williams [Mr. JOHNSON] says he would welcome the application of this to the farmers, but I suppose he knows he can not possibly apply it to the farmers. That has been mentioned by Judge Dwyer, and I think we can all agree it can not be applied to the farmers because conditions on the farm are so different from conditions in the factories and mines. Now I have said that wages depend on supply and demand, but there is one strange thing in the case of labor that you find nowhere else, and that is that the supplies seem ordinarily to exceed the demand. It is nearly always so. Just why it is, I never could figure out. It is a sociological question and I believe it shows our system is wrong somewhere, and we should try and find out how to right that wrong, but as I have said, I am willing to vote for the proposal although I have not much hope of its efficacy. The reason I want to vote for it is that it leaves the matter almost entirely in the hands of the legislature. The legislature will experiment in the matter and the legislature will be regulated by public opinion. If the legislature makes a mistake public opinion will cause the succeeding legislature to correct the mistake. I do not see where the proposal can do any harm and therefore I am going to vote for it.

Mr. LAMPSON: When I was on the floor before I made some statement about the law fixing a forty-dollars-per-month minimum wage for common school teachers. I am informed that the supreme court held that the teachers could contract for less than $40.

Mr. STILWELL: That is public employment.

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. STILWELL: But the supreme court recognized the principle of fixing a minimum wage.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I regret to say that I cannot support the proposal in its present form. To my mind any attempt to fix a minimum wage for labor is nothing more nor less than a form of economical insanity. To establish by statute a minimum wage means, logically, that you can also establish by statute, in some degree at least, a minimum price for the products of labor, whether those products be food or anything else.

Where neither monopoly nor a combination in restraint of trade is involved, the determining factor in the price of labor, as well as in the products of labor, is "supply and demand"; therefore, to contend that you can establish a minimum wage by statute is to argue that you can lift yourself up by your boot-straps, the latter of which we know to be a physical impossibility. If you were to go to the trouble of investigating the insufficient wage question you would probably find that it is due to the fact that there is no "protective tariff" on labor, whilst there is a "protective tariff" on the products of labor. If you could diminish the supply of labor by cutting off immigration you would solve, to a very large extent, the question of insufficient wages. If the labor unions in their collective capacity are unable to raise the price of labor it is due to the fact that the number of workmen outside of the labor unions is sufficiently large to maintain labor at a lower level than that established by the unions. Nothing you do here, or can do here, would raise the purchasing value of any "minimum wage" that is proposed to be established by arbitrary statutory laws; because labor enters so largely into the cost of the finished product; therefore, wages, no matter how established, whether by the illogical method of statute or by natural competition, would largely determine the cost of the finished product, excluding, of course, the artificial factor of a protective tariff. The cost of the finished product, whether it be food or anything else produced by labor, would in turn determine the purchasing power of the wage, minimum or otherwise. It is for these reasons that I cannot accept, in any form, the principle of establishing wages by statute. The remainder of the proposal is sound, and although it has been well said by the member from Auglaize, [Mr. HOSKINS] that there is nothing in the present constitution which prevents the other matters in the proposal from being established by the legislature, yet it is possibly wise to show, by a constitutional provision, that these other subjects in the proposal represent the wishes of the majority of the people of Ohio, and by incorporating them as part of our fundamental law we give notice to the legislature that we are in harmony with the sociological principles involved therein. I am very anxious to support the remainder of the proposal, and if the authors will strike out the words "minimum wage," the proposal will receive not merely the united support of this Convention but of the people of Ohio, and the authors will then have accomplished something practical and substantial, whereas, on the other hand, in merely giving the legislature the power to establish a minimum wage we are playing to the galleries and offering to labor a stone where we should give bread, not as charity, but as justice.

Mr. HAHN: Mr. President and Members of the Convention: We live in a civilization that is greater and grander than any other civilization on record. No matter what is said to the contrary, the civilization of ancient Rome and of Babylon did not come near ours. Modern civilization has not only eliminated a great many evils which ancient culture fostered, such as slavery and other forms of immorality, but it has in view entirely different plans and ideals. The great question is, Will our modern civilization continue on the road of progress, will it rise higher and higher or will it go backwards? Will it end in wreck and ruin?

We need not fear Huns and Vandals from Asia to destroy it, nor need we be afraid of wars to lay it waste, nor need we apprehend that political schemes will cause a relapse, but there is one thing of which we must be afraid and that is a revolution that might be brought about by a terrible conflict between capital and labor.

Gentlemen, I am no anarchist; I have never had any sympathy for anarchy. I am no socialist, and I am no propagator of any such ideas. I am merely a student of universal history and of every-day life. First of all I notice that one-half of the human race does not know how the other half lives. Those people that live in quiet rural districts have no idea of the deep agitation that is going on in the large cities. They have no idea of what sentiments there are expressed in the meetings of the laboring classes. They have no idea what a bitterness there is prevalent among the laboring classes when a strike in a large city takes place. Do not deceive yourself in thinking that all this is merely something on the surface of modern society and momentary. There is no doubt that if we do not take preventive measures we are drifting toward a revolution that will be greater and bloodier than any revolution mankind has ever seen. I am no alarmist. I express in a calm way my sentiment and my observation, but I think it is not too late to avert disaster. It is still within our power to prevent such a revolution. The day when the workmen should despair, the day when the working classes should give up hope, will be the darkest day in the history of our great country, and that must be prevented at all events and indeed it can be prevented. It is within our power to prevent it. The first step toward the prevention of such a great and fatal conflict between labor and capital was taken in this august assembly a few days ago by the adoption of the initiative and referendum to be submitted to the people of Ohio. It is often said "Our forefathers when they made the constitution of the United States built better than they knew," and I have not the slightest doubt that the time will come when the same judgment will be passed on the members of the Fourth Constitutional Convention in the state of Ohio. The initiative and referendum provision is to prevent unrest and revolutions. The next step for us to take is to give the laboring classes justice. Justice is what they want. They do not want charity nor "welfare work," but they demand justice. By justice to both the employe and capitalist everything can be settled.

Quite a number of proposals embodying demands of the working elements were introduced here. We must not be too hasty. We must examine them and give them full attention. We live in a time different from that of sixty years ago when our constitution was made. Take the constitution of 1851, look it through from beginning to end and you will not find the word "labor" or any provision for labor there. Now, would you, my friends, be willing to let the constitution of Ohio go out into the world without giving proper recognition to free labor, the brightest jewel in civilization? That would be wrong. We must not allow that. Whether it partakes of the legislative character or not, we must have certain regulations relative to labor inserted in our new constitution. Let us treat the labor class as friends, let us show them that we really are their friends and a great deal of the bitterness that is at the present time prevalent among them will vanish at once. The brightest day in the history of the people in the United States will be the day when there will disappear from the hearts of the laboring class the bitterness, hatred, envy, jealousy and animosity that exists now to such a great extent. Let us consider well what we are doing and let us act in the right spirit and let us feel the great responsibility we have for the men who toil.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the Convention has had all the light we can get on this subject and I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal.

Crites,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 122 — Mr. Farrell. Relative to employment of women, children and persons engaged in hazardous employment.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws may be passed fixing and regulating the hours of labor, establishing a minimum wage and providing for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of all employes; and no other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. LAMPSON: I move that the Convention adjourn until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

The motion was carried.

SIXTY-FIRST DAY

MORNING SESSION.

TUESDAY, April 23, 1912.

The Convention was called to order by the president, and opened with prayer by the Rev. Homer Alexander, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. KILPATRICK: As a question of privilege I would like to be allowed to vote on Proposal No. 122.

The member's name was called and he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLTZ: I wish to vote on that same proposal.

The member's name was called and he voted in the negative.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I would like to have my vote recorded on the motion of Mr. Doty last night, as I voted, but apparently was not heard.

The member's name was called, and he voted in the negative.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 209 by Mr. Tetlow.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. TETLOW: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: In speaking upon this proposal, I desire to discuss to some extent the question of an eight-hour day as applied to public works.

This proposal provides for an eight-hour day on public works, and not to exceed forty-eight hours a week on the maintenance and operation of public works, applying to laborers, mechanics, etc. It is quite evident that we desire this proposition to become a constitutional provision to safeguard this right, and to circumvent the decisions rendered by courts of this state. Many of you will remember that in 1900 a state law was passed in this state providing for an eight-hour day on public works, and also an eight-hour day on all contracts and subcontracts for and in behalf of the state and its political subdivisions. That law was declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of this state in a case arising in Cleveland, the Clements Construction Company vs. The City of Cleveland. In that case the supreme court of Ohio decided as follows:

The act of April 16, 1900 (94 Ohio Laws, 357), entitled: "An act to provide for limiting the hours of daily service of laborers, workmen and mechanics employed upon public work, or of work done for the state of Ohio, or any political subdivision thereof, providing for the insertion of certain stipulations in contracts of public works; imposing penalties for violations of the provisions of this act, and providing for the enforcement thereof," is in conflict with sections 1 and 19 of article I of the constitution of Ohio; because it violates and abridges the right of parties to contract as to the number of hours of labor that shall constitute a day's work, and invades and violates the right, both of liberty and property, in that it denies to municipalities and to contractors and subcontractors the right to agree with their employes upon the terms and conditions of their contracts. Said act is therefore unconstitutional and void.

The action of our supreme court in declaring this law null and void is not in conformity with the decisions rendered on the same subject in other states and by the federal court. We have at the present time an eight-hour law in Arizona, Oklahoma, New Mexico, California, Idaho, Wyoming, New York and Massachusetts. All of those states have enacted laws or constitutional provisions for an eight-hour law on all public works and contracts and subcontracts for such public works. A case arising in Kansas, where the subcontractor was not a resident of that state, allowed a case like the one we had in Ohio, the Clements Construction Company vs. The City of Cleveland, to go to the federal court, and the federal court held that the state had a right, under its police power, to regulate the hours of labor of workmen employed upon public works. The court held:

It is within the power of a state, as guardian and trustee for its people and having full control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on behalf of itself or its municipalities.

In the exercise of these powers it may by statute provide that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers employed by or on behalf of the state or any of its municipalities and making it unlawful for any one thereafter contracting to do any public work to require or permit any laborer to work longer than eight hours per day, except under certain specified conditions, and requiring such contractors to pay the current rate of daily wages.

This was a decision of the United States supreme court in a case arising in Kansas which embodied the same principles as those in the Clements Construction Company case, which was carried through our circuit court and to our supreme court and there declared unconstitutional.

It seems to me that we as a state certainly have a right to establish the hours of labor for men employed by the state and for the state. Certainly we have a right, as held by the federal court, and I do not see any reason why we as a state cannot incorporate this provision into our constitution, to protect this fundamental principle, which we as a people surely have a legal right and a lawful right to do.

Now let us consider the action of the national government on this question. This movement for an eight-hour day on public works began away back in 1868, when President Grant was in office. President Grant recommended in a message to congress the enactment of an eight-hour day for the protection of men employed on public works. That didn't become a law until 1892, but in 1892 a law was passed granting an eight-hour day on public works and upon contracts for such public work.

Eight-Hour Day on Public Work.

Recently congress has enacted a law making broader the application of the eight-hour day. It included in the original eight-hour day such amendments as provide that all fortification work, whether done in the United States or any of its territories, shall be done under the eight-hour day, and it seems to me that with the United States government recognizing this right, and with the great number of states recognizing the right, there is no reason why this great state of Ohio cannot fall in line with the other states and with the nation and adopt this principle.

I want to quote from President McKinley, before he was president of the United States, and while he was a member of congress, on this particular subject, when the matter was under consideration by congress. He said in part, and it is found in the Congressional Record of August 28, 1890:

And the government of the United States ought, finally and in good faith, to set this example of eight hours as constituting a day's work required of laboring men in the service of the United States. The tendency of the times the world over is for shorter hours in the interest of health, shorter hours in the interest of humanity, shorter hours in the interest of the home and the family; and the United States can do no better service to labor and to its own citizens than to set the example to states, to corporations and to individuals employing men than by declaring that, so far as the government is concerned, eight hours shall constitute a day's work and be all that is required of its laboring force.

Ex-President Roosevelt made favorable mention as to the enforcement of the eight-hour day in his annual message to the 57th congress, first session, when he said:

So far as practicable, under the conditions of government work, provisions should be made to render the enforcement of the eight-hour law easy and certain. In all industries carried on, directly or indirectly, for the United States government women and children should be protected from excessive hours of labor, from night work, and from work under insanitary conditions. The government should provide in its contracts that all work should be done under fair conditions, and in addition to setting a high standard, should uphold it by its proper inspection, extending if necessary to the subcontractors. The government should forbid all night work for women and children, as well as excessive overtime work.

During the last session of congress, President Taft in his message to congress recommended further amendment to the present eight-hour law to make it more mandatory, so that it could be enforced. This movement is recognized by all men who are students of economic questions.

I want to quote also some of the conditions existing in this country affecting some of our industries. In the industry with which I am familiar, and in which I have spent all my life, I have seen some changes. There has been an evolution that formerly was believed could not be brought about. I quote the following:

Prior to 1898 the miners in Ohio worked nine, ten and, in many instances, twelve hours a day, and I can well remember those long tedious working days, on many of which we never saw daylight, and I can remember the hope of more time for home, study and recreation that came with the shorter workday in 1898. When the change was made to an eight-hour day the pessimist was in evidence. Many of the mine owners claimed that they could not operate their mines and meet the competition of other states where the longer workday prevailed, many miners contended they could not live with the reduced earning power that must eventually follow, but what did happen? Why, the mines continued to operate, the men continued to live, and, according to statistics, the per capita production was greater under an eight-hour day than under the nine or ten; consequently all concerned with the industry were benefited.

These are facts in that particular industry. Men working an eight-hour day produced more tonnage and earned more money than under the nine, ten or twelve hours, and those facts and statistics can not be denied, because they are absolutely true, and borne out by the records submitted to the mining department by the operators themselves.

It has long been apparent to every student of our economic problems that an eight-hour workday for workmen in our industrial affairs is a necessity.

Modern inventions, wrought by the skilled hand of the mechanic or the trained mind of the scientist, have invaded every industry. We see the process of the machine either eliminating the workman or aiding him in his productive capacity, and with the productive power making more rapid strides than the consuming power we have indeed an economic problem of grave concern. Under our patent laws the patentee is protected. A patent affecting any industry naturally comes into the control of the employer, and the only logical solution of this problem for the workers lies in the reduction of the hours of labor.

I believe that intelligence will be the barometer that will measure our standard as a people. We should, I believe, give our working men time for study. In the interest of future generations we should not overtax his physical ability; in the interest of the home we should give him time to enjoy its blessings, and in the interest of a higher type of civilization this Convention should adopt this proposal and make this commonwealth a leader in a higher, broader, more humane system of government in this enlightened, progressive age.

Mr. HALFHILL: Will you permit me to ask a question, prefacing my question with a statement? Last evening at our session we passed a proposal which reads: "Laws may be passed fixing and regulating the hours of labor, establishing a minimum wage and providing for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of the employes; and no other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power." I voted for that. Why does not that provision which we have adopted here cover fully the proposal on which you have just addressed the Convention?

Eight-Hour Day on Public Work.

Mr. TETLOW: I think the proposal does not cover the question at issue. The fact that the proposal passed last night gives the legislature or the people certain power to enact laws regulating the hours of labor, establishing a minimum wage, etc., and the fact that the legislature passed a law regulating the hours of employment, do not guarantee that the courts may not declare that law unconstitutional because it is an invasion of certain fundamental rights reserved and which can not be destroyed. We had the power under our old constitution to pass a law providing for the eight-hour day on our public work, but our courts of last resort declared it unconstitutional. I claim that we ought to pass this provision and we ought not to leave it to the legislature. In this case the state and its political subdivisions are the employers and we are the employees. This is for ourselves and I think we ought not to evade the issue; we ought to say here in the interest of our own employers, who are the citizens of the state—which is the employer—that we recognize the right to an eight-hour day to men on public work, and we should not leave it to the legislature.

Mr. WATSON: I desire at this time to call attention to the special order for 10:30 o'clock a. m.

Mr. HALFHILL: Was it stated by you that a few years ago the legislature did pass a law fixing the eight-hour law for labor that was held to be unconstitutional as in conflict with section 1 and section 19 of the bill of rights?

Mr. TETLOW: Correct.

Mr. HALFHILL: Now the proposal we adopted last night expressly said at the end of it that no other provision of the constitution should impair or limit this power (referring to the power of the forepart of that proposal). Why haven't you got the best grant of power there that can be secured under a constitutional provision, and why is this necessary?

Mr. TETLOW: The question is this—we have a question here now. It is a question of constitutional provision, and the question before this Convention at this time is the recognition of the right to an eight-hour day for public work. So, I say, why leave the question with the general assembly, which may never pass the law?

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it fair to assume, if they have already passed such a law and it was held invalid as being unconstitutional, that they will not now pass the law again when we have given them the power to do so? Is it necessary to legislate on that point when they are expressly granted the power?

Mr. TETLOW: The only reason why we are putting in this organic law a statutory provision is because of the fear that we can not obtain the things we are entitled to by legislative enactment. If our courts were not setting aside the express wishes of the people in so many instances the need for specific statutory legislation in organic law would not be here.

Mr. HALFHILL: This power is granted to the legislature. Now if the legislature could not be trusted we would have the initiative and referendum, if it is adopted. Is it not a farfetched assumption to say that the legislature can not be trusted to enact an eight-hour law when it did that a number of years ago?

Mr. TETLOW: I contend the matter ought to be settled here now. Ought not Ohio keep pace with the eleven or twelve other states which have established this principle, and with the nation, which has established the principle? In New York they passed a law providing for a certain work day and that law was declared unconstitutional. The state of New York amended its constitution giving the state the right to enact an eight-hour day on public work. They went through the same thing we are going through here. I can not see why we can not deal with the matter the same way. Our legislature passed such a law and it was declared unconstitutional by the supreme court, and I do not see any reason why, if there is merit in the proposition, that we shall not decide the question now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I want to preface my question by saying that I am in thorough sympathy with your proposal, but do you not think it is belittling the cause of labor and the work of this Convention to duplicate our work as your proposal undoubtedly does? The resolution last evening absolutely gives you, as you well know, the same constitutional right as is here embodied in Proposal No. 209. Therefore the supreme court could not possibly declare a law passed under it void—assuming that the proposal of Mr. Farrell, which we passed yesterday, is adopted by the people—the supreme court could not possibly set aside on the ground of unconstitutionality any measure along these lines, limiting the hours of labor, adopted by the legislature. Your proposal gives no greater constitutional power than that proposed yesterday afternoon. It will be a stain on the work of this Convention if we go before the state of Ohio with two proposals practically the same. If your position is correct, then the proposal adopted last evening is embodied in yours, and you should embrace in your proposal as amendments all the legislative and statutory enactments you wish covered by the proposal of Mr. Farrell.

Mr. TETLOW: That is not a question and I can not answer it. You have really answered it yourself. I want to say that we must distinguish the difference between the action of the Convention last night and this question under consideration. The action of the Convention last night simply gave the legislature certain powers. We know the condition in the state at present. The people have not advanced to the stage where they are going to establish a minimum wage in all classes of industry, but we have granted power to the lawmaking body to do certain things. Here is a question that is before us. It has been up before the people and it has been passed by the legislature, and the question to decide now is, Do we recognize that principle as right at this time, or are we going to evade it and leave it to some one else to decide, when we know the substance of it is right?

Mr. HALFHILL: You concede that the proposal last night as a grant of power—

Mr. TETLOW: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL:—to do this thing?

Mr. TETLOW: No; I do not concede that.

Mr. HALFHILL: Do you not concede it was a grant of power and is it not your objection that the legislature will not act? Is not that your position exactly?

Eight-Hour Day on Public Work.

Mr. TETLOW: To a certain extent, yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: Would it not be more logical to combine this proposal you have here this morning with the one you had last evening and attach this to it as the expression of the Convention? Would not that be the proper way?

Mr. TETLOW: That could be done that way.

Mr. HALFHILL: Then would it not be a grant of power in certain instances and an elaboration by way of legislation on that power?

Mr. TETLOW: That is correct. It could have been done that way, but we didn't do it that way.

Mr. HALFHILL: They ought to be combined.

Mr. TETLOW: As far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing for the two proposals to be combined by the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: This proposal refers only to public works and I would support that as an amendment to the other, but I do object to two separate proposals on exactly the same principle.

Mr. ROEHM: Would not this question be largely settled by the manner in which we submit the constitution? If we change our present plan would not this be desirable. It would go into the body of the constitution, but if we are going to submit these matters separately, might not that one clause relating to the minimum wage endanger the entire proposition before the people?

Mr. TETLOW: It might.

Mr. ROEHM: Would not they have a right to vote upon both propositions?

Mr. TETLOW: I don't think so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I may be wrong on the parliamentary law — it seems I am generally — but could not the Convention now direct the committee on Phraseology to incorporate this as a part of the proposal adopted last night? That would overcome the objections, and I would be glad to support it if it could be incorporated in that form.

Mr. STILWELL: The Labor committee has had that very matter suggested by Mr. Harris under consideration. We have no objection to doing that when the Convention decides ultimately the manner in which our work is to be submitted, but on this proposal we do insist that the state ought to recognize the principle of an eight-hour day. The complaint is made, and perhaps justly so, that it is a matter purely within the function of the legislature, but many proposals already passed could have been taken care of by the legislature, and the mere fact that they have not done it is one of the reasons why this Convention has been called. There are perhaps two or three hundred thousand workmen in the state of Ohio who are watching three or four proposals. This is one of the matters the legislature has not taken care of in the past.

Mr. KNIGHT: Was it because they could not or because they didn't want to?

Mr. STILWELL: I have not been a member of the legislature and I could not really answer the question.

Mr. KNIGHT: Was it not because they did not have the constitutional power?

Mr. STILWELL: I think probably that is true in this particular instance.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I understood the gentleman from Columbiana to say that the legislature had passed the eight-hour law some years ago?

Mr. TETLOW: In 1900.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: And the supreme court declared that law unconstitutional?

Mr. STILWELL: That is true.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: If the proposal we passed last night says "nothing in the constitution shall limit the power" and if the legislature were to pass an eight-hour law, would not the supreme court hold that valid?

Mr. STILWELL: That is probably true. I am not a judge of the supreme court, but I presume that is so.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I wish the gentleman would make an explanation why, after establishing the broad constitutional provision, they deem it necessary to specify on this legislative matter?

Mr. STILWELL: I simply assume it is the right of the great mass of working people in this state to insist upon the recognition of this principle in the fundamental law of this state, and it is not necessary that this campaign should be made the second time before the legislature.

Mr. PECK: Did not that proposal last night recognize it?

Mr. STILWELL: Yes, but I do not see why in this particular matter there should be any unnecessary quibbling over the mere fact that there may be some legislative characteristics in this proposal, and I believe the Convention should approve it.

Mr. KING: It is true if Proposal No. 122, passed last night, is adopted by the people and becomes part of the constitution, it includes the legislative power intended to be conferred by this proposal but it is not true that the rule vice versa prevails. It is not true that this contains all of the legislative authority conferred by Proposal No. 122. There are some objections — I don't mean fancied objections, but real objections — to Proposal No. 122 adopted last night. It possibly might not carry in Ohio, and if it did not it would not become part of the constitution, nor would it in any wise affect the labor proposition intended to be covered either in the one way or the other by these two proposals. It does not seem to me there should be any conflict over it. If the proposition contained here is good, and I think it is, I think so far as the public is concerned, both the public and the laborer is entitled to a rule laid down here positively and actually. It ought to be satisfactory. In so far as this gives power that is conferred by the other, the whole matter should be adjusted in the submission by the simple statement in the schedule or at the end of the submitting clause that if Proposal No. 122 shall be adopted and become part of the constitution of the state of Ohio the adoption of this proposal shall be treated as of no avail — null and void; otherwise, if this is adopted, it shall be a part of the constitution. In the final outcome there is no actual conflict. If the other is defeated and this is carried, it becomes part of the constitution. If the other is carried and this too, or if it is not, either way, it does not become a part of the constitution, so there is not a double grant of power. That, of course, we ought to steer clear of if we can. We do not want to be granting these powers over and over again. They get tiresome. If we have one class of grant of power that is enough, but it may be that Proposal No. 122 is not popular.

Mr. PECK: This last clause, under consideration now, does not grant any power to the general assembly at all. It simply fixes the hours of labor. It is strictly operative.

Mr. KING: Still I would be opposed to this proposal if I knew the other would become a part of the constitution, because conferring legislative power is the duty and business of the constitution, and when they have covered it once I think once is enough. But they may not cover it even once, so I think this should be carried, and when submitted it can be taken care of in the form of submission.

Mr. McCLELLAND: As a working member of one of the largest classes of working people in the state—I am a farmer and member of a grange and so a member of one of the great labor unions of the state—and as a working man and a trade union man and as one who voted for the proposal last night, and a friend of the principle I assure you I am opposed to this proposal because it seems to me it imperils the other labor proposals, and if we go to loading up the constitution with a bunch of statutory provisions which are uncalled for, even according to the admission of their friends, we may endanger the proposal we adopted last night. The legislature has never shown an unwillingness to listen to the request of the working people. This would have passed at every session of the legislature in the last ten years if they had not been prevented from doing so by the constitution. It was thought futile for them to do it and they didn't do it, but the legislature will pass it at the next session of the general assembly if they have the chance. Don't load this constitution up. It will prejudice the whole thing in the eyes of the people of the state. It seems to me as friends of labor we ought to dispose of this proposal and as the author has asked an immediate disposition of it, I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DOTY: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

So the motion to indefinitely postpone was lost.

Mr. DOTY: I now move the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I hope you won't insist on that.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, no; if anybody wants to talk I will withdraw it.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I assume that the purpose of this proposal is to limit the number of hours during which one may lawfully be employed on the public work in the state of Ohio to eight hours out of twenty-four and the number of hours that one may work in a week to forty-eight. The question has been raised whether or not the grant under Proposal No. 122 is not sufficient. Clearly it is broad enough to justify the general assembly in passing any measure it sees fit regulating the hours of labor, but the bigger question involved is whether or not the state of Ohio shall declare in its fundamental law a definite policy in regard to the employment of labor on public works. That I think is the big question and I am in favor of declaring that policy in our constitution. I have, however, some misgiving as to whether the language employed in the proposal does it and I want to call attention to it particularly: "Not to exceed eight hours to constitute a day's work." That means, it seems to me, that if the laborer is employed by the day when he has worked eight hours he is entitled to his day's pay, if he was hired by the day. But I see nothing to prevent his being employed by the hour and working twenty-four hours. It seems to me that this does not prohibit a man from working more than eight hours a day or forty-eight hours a week, and I call the attention of the members to that.

Mr. FESS: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the objections owing to the duplication of this with the proposal of last night, and I believe if this Convention is in favor of the general principle of both we can obviate that seeming conflict by referring it to the committee ultimately with instructions to report it back and incorporate as a part of Proposal No. 122 the principle of the eight-hour law as defined here. I hope this Convention will put itself on record in giving its support to the eight-hour day proposition. If it meets the wishes of the members in interest, I would like to move that this proposal be referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology with instructions to report back this particular part and to attach it to Proposal No. 122.

Mr. STILWELL: What is the purport of the motion? In the first place we should like to have a roll call on the proposal so that the proposal can pass. My understanding is that you can not in effect pass a proposal without a roll call and getting at least sixty delegates. It strikes me that the mere passage of this by a viva voce vote referring it to the Phraseology committee and instructing them to incorporate in Proposal No. 122 the principle of this proposal would be of little effect. I am agreeable to the motion of Dr. Fess, provided this proposal is first passed as the rules of the Convention require.

Mr. KNIGHT: The Convention has already adopted Proposal No. 122 and the only thing to do is to adopt this and then give instructions to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology to combine the two.

Mr. FESS: My motion was not to include what Mr. Knight has said at all. The committee can bring back the two proposals as one without any instruction from the Convention, and then if the Convention will adopt their report all right, all well and good. Otherwise it will fail just as any other report. My motion was that this Convention perform its duty, its right, if it desires to instruct this particular committee what it wishes this committee to do. We can do that now if we want to do it. This Convention can instruct the Phraseology committee or the Labor committee to bring back a report in a certain order. I was trying to get rid of this conflict between the two proposals. This was an easy way to do it. It is favorable to both proposals, and if the Convention will adopt the motion and refer it to the Phraseology committee with these instructions that is perfectly legitimate and proper; but I would ask, as Mr. Stilwell did, that we take the yea and nay vote upon this proposal first.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I understood you to say that without instruction the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology might combine two proposals.

Mr. FESS: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I would like to know where the authority is derived from for the committee to combine two proposals that have been passed here separately?

Mr. FESS: Any matter referred to that committee can be reported back separately or reported back combined.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Pretty inclusive in its authority.

Mr. FESS: Yes; but it comes back to the Convention to be voted on by the Convention.

Mr. HALFHILL: The gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] mentioned a question that is in my mind. We passed the other proposal and I believe a majority of the Convention is favorable to this proposal. It seems to me we are not proceeding the best way either by adopting the motion of the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess] or taking care of it in the schedule as suggested by the gentleman from Erie. I move as an amendment to that motion of the gentleman from Greene [Mr. Fess] that we reconsider the vote by which Proposal No. 122 was adopted last evening, so we can combine this particular proposal with that.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order.

The PRESIDENT: State the point.

Mr. DOTY: There is a matter pending before the Convention and a motion to reconsider something else is entirely out of order.

Mr. HALFHILL: You admit my heart is in the right place though?

Mr. DOTY: Your heart is right. I want to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that Dr. Fess has yielded the principle I enunciated with some vigor two or three days ago, and against the opinion of some of the members, about the power of the Convention to instruct its committees. Of course, there can be no question about the power of the Convention to instruct its committees. My notion about the present situation is that the best way to proceed is not by the present motion of the member from Greene [Mr. FESS] but by first finding out if the Convention is in favor of this particular proposal, and that can be done by calling the roll. As soon as it is passed it is referred to the committee on Phraseology, and then at any time after that we can give instructions to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] that the committee on Phraseology has the same power and only the same power that other committees of the Convention have, and the member from Greene [Mr. FEES] did not claim the committee on Phraseology has any additional power.

Mr. KNIGHT: I hope the motion in its present form will not prevail. The gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] is right. Why should we not determine whether we desire to adopt this in the usual form and then we can direct the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology by definite instruction to combine the two?

Mr. WOODS: It seems to me the best way to get out of this is to take Proposal No. 122, that we adopted last night, inject it right into this proposal after line 3 and then adopt this proposal. That will take care of the whole proposition. Let it then go to the Phraseology committee, and I offer that amendment. Insert Proposal No. 122 after line 3 and change the word "not" in line 4 to "but", and then let it go to the Phraseology committee. If that motion is voted down I will offer an amendment.

The motion was lost.

Mr. WOODS: I offer an amendment.

Mr. DOTY: Let us find out whether we want this one first. We declared in favor of the other last night.

Mr. PECK: I rise to a question of order. What is before the Convention?

Mr. DOTY: The proposal—

Mr. PECK: Let the president tell me. I am not asking you.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Medina has offered an amendment to Proposal No. 209.

Mr. PECK: That is the matter before the Convention?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

Mr. PECK: There are so many things discussed before the Convention that it is hard to tell what is before it. You rule people get to going and there is no way of telling what is going on.

The amendment offered by the member from Medina was reduced to writing and was read as follows:

After line 3 insert the following:

"Laws may be passed fixing and regulating the hours of labor, establishing a minimum wage and providing for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of all employees; and no other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power."

Eight-Hour Day on Public Work—Recall of Public Officials.

Mr. WOODS: My own idea in submitting this amendment is that this matter may be put together. I can not understand why anybody should be opposed to the state of Ohio's adopting the principle of an eight-hour-day on public work. I do not think anybody has any objection to that proposition. The only argument that can be made against it is that it is a statutory matter, but this Convention has gone on record that that is not an argument against anything that is offered. I am for this proposition. In defense of labor, however, I think it is a mistake to tie the two together, but I have no objection to voting on that separately, though I think they should be in one proposition.

Mr. DOTY: There are three propositions involved now. The first one we decided last night. The second one is pending here. The third one may or may not arise, and that is whether we shall combine these two or not. Let us decide the second one before we decide the third one. Let us find out whether we want the second one or not. If we decide in favor of the second one, which is altogether likely, then the other question will come by itself. There are some persons who would like to vote on this as it is. Then that leaves the Convention to act on the consolidation matter. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The amendment of the delegate from Medina [Mr. Woods] was tabled.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 94, nays 10, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 209 — Mr. Tetlow. To submit an amendment to article VIII, of the constitution, relative to protection and welfare of persons employed at public work.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Not to exceed eight hours shall constitute a day's work and not to exceed forty-eight hours a week's work, on the construction, replacement, alteration, repair, maintenance and operation of all public works, buildings, plants, machinery at which laborers, workmen and mechanics are employed, carried on or aided by the state or any political subdivision thereof, whether done by contract or otherwise, except in cases of extraordinary emergency.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. DOTY: I now call attention at this particular time to Proposal No. 291 — Mr. Watson. There was a provision for an hour's debate. That made the debate end at 11:30. Therefore, I move that the debate on this question be limited to an hour from now.

The motion was carried.

Mr. KRAMER: As a matter of personal privilege I would like to have my vote recorded in favor of the proposal which passed last night.

The gentleman's name was called on the measure indicated (Proposal No. 122) and he answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Halfhill was here recognized.

The PRESIDENT: This is under the five-minute debate.

Mr. HALFHILL: I understood the matter was on the main argument of the report. I have not yet presented any argument on the report and I can not do it in anything like five minutes.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the house is the motion of the member from Erie [Mr. KING] to amend the minority report. The secretary will read it.

The secretary read the amendment as follows:

Resolved, That Proposal No. 291 and the report of the committee amending same be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

So the motion to indefinitely postpone was carried.

Mr. DOTY: In order to clear the way entirely I move that the proposal and the pending report be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is reading of Proposal No. 24—Mr. Cordes.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. TANNEHILL: What became of the special order for 11:40 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT: That time has not arrived yet. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. CORDES].

Mr. CORDES: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: Proposal No. 24 undertakes to write into the constitution of Ohio a constitutional provision making secure the workmen's compensation law passed by the last legislature, and declared constitutional by the Ohio supreme court by a vote of 4 to 2. Labor asks that this proposal be adopted, because we believe that by writing it into the constitution it will make it possible to continue this beneficial measure without any further fear of a constitutional question being raised again on this matter. It will also give an opportunity to still further improve the law to meet modern conditions of employment as they may arise.

Ten states have passed workmen's compensation laws similar to that adopted in Ohio, and the federal congress has now under consideration a bill recommended by the federal commission appointed last year on this subject to apply to interstate employees. In nearly every other state in the Union where the legislatures are in session this winter the legislators are considering similar measures of this kind and the general tendency of the time is to do away with the old, worn-out methods of compelling the worker to sue for damages, and the long incidental delays that make it impossible for the cripple, the widow and the orphans to secure justice or adequate compensation for the loss of life and limb, and to replace it with a direct compensation system, to the end that those who suffer as the result of industrial injuries may be immediately relieved from suffering, due to the want of the necessities of life. I am of the opinion there has not been a subject before this Convention that affects real humanity as this does, and I hardly think it necessary to discuss the question at length at all, as I am satisfied that most of the delegates are in accord with this proposal. If there are any doubts in the minds of any of the members as to the merits of the proposal as submitted, I would refer them to the unqualified indorsement given to workmen's compensation laws in nearly every address that has been made to this Convention by the distinguished visitors who have been invited to address you, and I call particular attention to the addresses of Judge Lindsey, ex-President Roosevelt and William Jennings Bryan. Workmen's compensation laws will go a long way to solve the differences now existing between labor and capital, as there is nothing that tends more to create a better fraternal feeling between man and man than the fact that those who are so unfortunate in industrial life as to meet with accidents, will in the future be properly taken care of; and there is certainly no time when assistance is more needed than when the head or support of the family is unable to provide for those who are near and dear to him.

Workmen's compensation laws also provide a definite and fixed liability on the employer, so that he knows that he will have to pay, and will prevent litigation on this subject which has proven detrimental to employer and employe and a matter of enormous and needless expense to both. The real object of all liability and compensation laws against industrial accidents, however, is not simply the matter of providing for the needs of the injured and the dependents of those killed, but to prevent accidents; hence the provision in the proposal that in case accidents are caused by the wilful act or violation of law by an employer an additional penalty is added by giving the worker the right to sue for additional damages. This provision has been made a part of every compensation law so far adopted in this country, as it is of every compensation law so far adopted by foreign countries, and is necessarily attached to compensation laws so that the employer may be compelled to provide every safeguard possible against accidents, and that he may be prevented from getting careless because of the fact that he has paid the premium into the state insurance fund that will provide for the needs of his employes in case they are injured or killed.

The statistics gathered by the United States government and the American association for labor legislation show that occupational diseases are killing off and incapacitating as many employes as are accidents. Nearly every foreign country that has adopted a compensation law applies it also to occupational diseases, and it is really essential that the industries that cause these diseases and loss of life should be made to bear the burden and cost of caring for the men afflicted by any of these dread diseases rather than make them and their families a burden on the community and objects of charity.

The federal congress, within this last week or two, in passing the Esch phosphorus bill has undertaken to remove one of the afflictions with which many Ohio workers have suffered during past years, that of "phossy jaw", and organized labor secured the passage of a law last winter providing for the investigation of this whole subject in Ohio, but the effectiveness of the law was nullified by the neglect of the legislature to provide an appropriation to do this work.

I believe that it is but just and humane in this age of progress and rapidity in industrial affairs that the industrial workers should be protected against accidents and occupational diseases, and that more attention should be given to human rights rather than, as we have done in the past, devote all our attention to property rights. As this measure, above every other, writes into our constitution the question of human rights and the protection of human life and limb, I am satisfied that if it is adopted it will meet with the hearty approval of the voters and prove of great benefit and relief to both employer and employe.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 102, nays none, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Antrim,	Harris, Ashtabula,	Partington,
Baum,	Harris, Hamilton,	Peck,

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 24 — Mr. Cordes. To submit an amendment to article II, section 33, of the constitution. — Relative to requiring the general assembly to pass laws relative to compensation of employes.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE II.

SECTION 33. For the purpose of providing compensation from a state fund, to workmen and their dependents, for death, injuries or occupational diseases, occasioned in the course of such workmen's employment, laws may be passed establishing a fund to be created and administered by the state and by compulsory contribution thereto by employers; determining the terms and conditions upon which payment shall be made therefrom and taking away any or all rights of action or defenses from employees and employers but no right of action shall be taken away from any employees when injury, disease or death arises from failure of the employer to comply with any lawful requirement for the protection of the lives, health and safety of employees. Laws may be passed establishing a board which may be empowered to classify all occupations, according to their degree of hazard; fix rates of contribution to such fund according to the general rule of classification and to collect, administer and distribute such fund and to determine all rights of claimants thereto.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. Roehm arose to a question of privilege and asked that his vote be recorded on the motion of Mr. King to amend the minority report to Proposal No. 291. His name being called, Mr. Roehm voted no.

Mr. DWYER: I desire to call attention to Proposal No. 241, the special order for 11:40 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDENT: The question before the Convention is Proposal No. 241 and the secretary will read the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY: The pending amendment is the Fackler amendment as it will appear if the amendment by Judge Nye is agreed to. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of Judge Nye which would amend the Fackler amendment. The amendment of Mr. Fackler reads as follows:

Strike out lines 11 to 16 inclusive and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Any judge of a court of record of this state, may be removed from office by the governor, whenever after due trial as may be provided by law, it shall be found that such judge is unable to perform the duties of his office by reason of physical or mental infirmity extending over a period of more than six months or that such judge has been guilty of misconduct in office involving moral turpitude, the persistent violation of a clear mandate of the constitution, intoxication while attending to the business of the court, gross inattention to the duties of the office or conduct tending to bring the court into disrepute. Laws shall be passed providing for the creation of commissions having authority to hear and determine the truth of any such charges and prescribing the methods of procedure with reference to the same."

The Nye amendment reads as follows:

Strike out of the amendment offered by Mr. Fackler the following beginning with line 5: "such judge is unable to perform the duties of his office by reason of physical or mental infirmity extending over a period of more than six months or that."

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the amendment of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. FACKLER].

Removal of Officials.

Mr. RILEY: How does that apply to the original proposal?

The SECRETARY: It strikes out lines 11 to 16. It takes out the last paragraph of the proposal.

Mr. PECK: It substitutes impeachment by commission instead of by the supreme court.

The amendment was agreed to, sixty members, on division, voting in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the proposal as amended.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I desire to inquire of the author of the amendment which now stands as a second paragraph of the proposal whether or not he intends the second paragraph to embrace the judges of the supreme court? In my opinion it does.

Mr. FACKLER: It does include all the judges of courts of record; therefore it would include the judges of the supreme court.

Mr. PECK: Then does it not conflict with section 1? I think section 1 does conflict with the amendment just adopted. One provides for one method and the other for another.

Mr. FACKLER: Both may exist.

Mr. PECK: There can not be two remedies.

Mr. FACKLER: Are there not two remedies provided in the present constitution, one by impeachment and one by a joint resolution of the general assembly?

Mr. PECK: Look at your amendment. The first says it takes two-thirds.

Mr. FACKLER: The second is removal procedure.

Mr. PECK: It is all the same. I submit that as you have it now this proposal ought to be rewritten and made to harmonize. It is not in condition to be passed. It would bring ridicule on the Convention to pass it in its present state.

Mr. DWYER: I suggest that the original proposal could be read in connection with the amendment. You have not read that.

The SECRETARY: That has been stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS: I desire to offer an amendment the necessity for which seems to be apparent. In the Fackler amendment it says "intoxication while attending to the business of the court." I move that we strike out "while attending to the business of the court".

Mr. DOTY: The rule provides that all amendments shall be submitted in writing.

The PRESIDENT: The secretary will reduce that amendment to writing.

Mr. WINN: I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The member from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS] has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think it is necessary to do more than state the proposition. The Convention certainly should not recognize the right of any judge to go out at night and get loaded up. I think a judge should be removed if he is intoxicated, even if he is not sitting on the bench.

Mr. STILWELL: I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENS: And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The amendment of the delegate from Tuscarawas was reduced to writing and read as follows:

Strike from the amendment "while attending to the business of the court."

The PRESIDENT: The motion was made to table that amendment and the yeas and nays were demanded. The question is on laying the amendment on the table.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. There is no such a thing as a Fackler amendment.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on laying the amendment on the table.

Upon which the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 15, nays 85, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

Brattain,	FitzSimons,	Malin,
Davio,	Hahn,	Marshall,

So the motion to table was lost.

The PRESIDENT: The question now is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELSON: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 11, after the word "state," strike out the word "may" and insert "shall."

Mr. HOSKINS: I have been sitting here trying to keep from exposing my ignorance, but I can not do it any longer.

VOICES: Agreed.

Mr. HOSKINS: And I think some of those crying "agreed" are just as ignorant as I am. I would like to know who is sponsor for this proposition and where do you find it? I do not know who is handling this thing.

The SECRETARY: This amendment you will find on page 2 of the journal of April 18, at the bottom of the page. The Crosser amendment has been put into the proposal and that refers to the first line of the proposal.

Mr. HOSKINS: Has this ever been printed any place other than on page 2 of the journal of April 18?

The SECRETARY: No.

Mr. HOSKINS: I hope before we get through some one who has had this bill in committee will get up and tell the Convention what they want to do and explain the purpose of it. Maybe others are smart enough to know what they are doing, but I do not. Some one ought to explain it. I have not gotten a sensible word out of the whole thing from start to finish.

Mr. STOKES: I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ELSON: Don't we get a vote on the last amendment?

The PRESIDENT: By consent of the member from Montgomery [Mr. STOKES] we will take a vote on the amendment of the delegate from Athens.

Mr. ELSON: This takes out of the hands of the governor all discretionary power. If a judge has been tried and convicted, according to this section, the governor will have no power to leave him in office. He must remove him. When a jury pronounces a man guilty the judge has no power to let him off.

Mr. FACKLER: As I originally drew a proposal which was to be introduced, but which I refrained from introducing on account of Judge Dwyer's proposal, the governor was given when charges were filed with him the right to appoint a commission whose duty it would be to try the judge and ascertain the truth or falsity of the accusations made against him. As I see it there should be some power reserved over such a commission which may be hereafter established by the legislature under the amendment now incorporated in the proposal. The legislature should provide some means of trying the truth or falsity of the charges filed according to law against any judge of a court of record. Now it is no harm to permit the governor to have a sort of supervisory discretion over the finding of that commission. The probabilities are, if the bill were drawn creating a commission with authority to try judges against whom charges have been made, there would be no review provided, and it would leave it discretionary with the governor whether he should be removed, but he would not remove a judge unless there would be good reasons for the finding of the commission.

Mr. ELSON: If a judge has been properly tried by such commission, is there any further doubt as to his guilt? Would it be the proper thing for the governor to have discretionary power to pronounce a man absolutely innocent? There is only one of two things to be done. He must be removed or not removed.

Mr. FACKLER: There might be extenuating circumstances. For instance, it might be found that the judge is incapacitated from performing his duties by mental or physical infirmity extending over six months and the commission would not have any discretion in their finding if that were true, but the governor would have discretion to say that the man is sick of a temporary disease and we will not remove him. You give the governor a chance to relax the rigor of the law.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: The question is, shall the word "may" be charged to "shall"? I call the attention to the next line of the amendment: "Whereas after due trial as may be provided by law." If the trial is in the hands of the general assembly we know it can provide for the granting of a new trial. Therefore there may be abundant safeguards, but when after due trial he has been found guilty it seems to me there is no doubt that he should be removed, and I think there should not be any discretion or any tribunal after that. But in framing the law it is possible to provide for every contingency referred to by the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] and I hope the change will be made and made mandatory.

Now, a word in answer to a suggestion to which someone ought to say a word in response. We have voted definitely to postpone any recall. That there is great criticism of the present method of removing judges there is no doubt. We are expected to do something. Our present constitution provides two ways for removing a judge, one by impeachment substantially as here, and the other is by joint resolution, two-thirds of the general assembly concurring. We know that the general assembly is in session not to exceed four months out of each twenty-four, so that both methods for the removal of judges not fit to hold office are of little value in practice. This proposal as it now stands, when it is made mandatory, will put within the power of the general assembly the task of providing summary means by due control to remove any judge of any court of record, from the supreme court of the state down to the probate court, by a quick proceeding and an impartial trial, not by other judges unless the general assembly sees fit to so provide, but by a commission to be provided by law, which will be in harmony with the prevailing opinion of the state. It seems to me when the amendment is adopted the proposal should pass.

Mr. WATSON: I move a recess until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. DOTY: Wait a minute.

Mr. WATSON: All right.

Mr. DWYER: I move that the proposal and pending amendment be referred to a select committee of five, to be appointed by the president, with leave to report at any time.

I move this because there is so much difference among the prominent lawyers as to the best plan. We want to agree on the plan and I make this suggestion.

The motion was carried.

Mr. WATSON: I move that we recess until 1:30 o'clock p. m.

The motion was carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by the president.

The PRESIDENT: The subcommittee to which will be referred Proposal No. 241 will be constituted as follows: Mr. Dwyer, Mr. Brown, of Lucas, Mr. Hoskins, Mr. Peck and Mr. Fackler.

The next business in order is Proposal No. 7, by Mr. Nye.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. ANDERSON: Before we proceed, by unanimous consent I would like to vote on the proposals that were adopted last evening and this morning.

Limiting Power of General Assembly in Extra Sessions.

The unanimous consent was given, the member's name was called, and on each of the Proposals Nos. 122, 209 and 24 he voted in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Lorain is recognized.

Mr. NYE: Gentlemen of the Convention: Section 8, article III, of the present constitution now provides for a special session of the legislature, to be called by the governor, and when the legislature is in session under such call there is no limit to the amount or kind of business it may transact during such special session. It has been my observation for a great many years that governors have hesitated about calling a special session of the legislature because of the fact that they might go into general legislation rather than perform the duties for which they were called together and then adjourn. The purpose of the amendment is to provide that the legislature, when called together in extraordinary session by the governor, shall transact only such business as the session is called for, unless as is provided in the proposal, the governor by special proclamation—a public proclamation—shall request some other work to be done. I read the proposal for the purpose of calling attention to the effect of these provisions:

The governor on extraordinary occasions may convene the general assembly by proclamation and shall state in such proclamation the purpose for which said special session is called and no other business shall be transacted at said special session except that named in said proclamation, or in a subsequent public proclamation issued by the governor during said special session.

Of course, it is well known that when the legislature gets together in its regular session it performs such duties as it is supposed the state desires to have performed or that any member of the legislature can think of that ought to be done at that regular session. Many times, or frequently during the course of a year, when the legislature is not in session, the governor has some special matter that he thinks the legislature should enact, and he calls together the legislature for the purpose of performing those duties. Experience with legislatures heretofore has been that when they are called together in extraordinary session to perform that particular duty for which they are called together, they go forward and perform other duties and pass general laws. The object of this is to prevent that, so that the governor will not feel embarrassed by calling a special session of the legislature. It will be observed that there is a provision in this proposal that if other work is desired to be done by the legislature, and if the governor shall request it by proclamation, that work can be done. Therefore, if the legislature is called together by the governor a proclamation is issued for that purpose. After they have come together if any member of the general assembly or any citizen of the state, during the time the general assembly is in session, shall be able to convince the governor that other business ought to be transacted then this proposal is broad enough to provide for that, because in the last clause of the proposal it is provided that they may do such work as is named in that proclamation or in a subsequent proclamation issued by the governor during that special session. It seems to me the governor should have the right to call the legislature together to perform a particular duty, and when they have done that duty they ought to adjourn unless the governor can be satisfied that there is something else for them to do. In other words, if a member of the legislature or a citizen of the state can satisfy the governor that other legislation ought to be done the governor can by a proclamation ask to have it done. That is the purpose of this amendment. I do not care to weary you with any further remarks. It seems to me this matter is one that should be passed and submitted to the people. It was submitted to the committee on Legislative and Executive Departments, and, as I understand, it was reported unanimously by the committee. I therefore ask your favorable consideration of that report.

Mr. PIERCE: I would like to inquire if the judgment of all the people of the state is not as good as the judgment of the governor?

Mr. NYE: Quite likely, but it is a question for the governor whether he will call a special session, and if the people of the state could convince the governor that a special session ought to be called he would call it for that purpose, but it ought to be left to the governor to say whether it should be called and to say what business should be done at that session.

Mr. THOMAS: As one of the members of the Legislative committee I opposed the proposal in the committee, and I am opposed to the proposal now that it has come before the Convention. It is simply another method of taking power away from the representatives of the people to legislate for their benefit and placing it in the hands of the executive department. It seems to me we need a check on the governor for calling special sessions just as much as we need a check on the legislature to prevent legislation when special sessions are called. There is not a member of the Convention here who will not admit that had it not been for the fact that the governor was afraid that by calling a special session to redistrict the congressional districts of Ohio during the last year that such a special session would have been called for that purpose. He was afraid some other legislation might be passed, and that check was a good one because it would have entailed a heavy expense on the citizens just to have a district for one more congressman from Ohio, and this can be taken care of later on. The legislature, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has never really abused the privilege of legislation when called together in special session. There has been only one time when their session extended to any great length, and that was when we adopted the new municipal code, when it was really necessary that a long session should be held. The last one held was held in 1909, and only a few bills, necessary for the welfare of the people, went through other than those which the governor called the special session to pass and I see no necessity for changing the constitution in that respect. I think the legislature should have authority in itself to determine what measures it should pass or not pass, when called together in special session, and it may be that the people through the initiative may petition for the passage of some needed legislation just at that time, and they have just as much reason and just as much right to ask for it as the governor has to call a special session for the things that he may want. I think this proposal ought to be defeated.

Mr. Hursh here took the chair as president pro tem.

Mr. WOODS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 11, after the word "proclamation" insert "or message to the general assembly."

Mr. WOODS: This proposal as it stands now provides that the governor may by proclamation call attention to something and ask the legislature to do it. The ordinary way of doing this is by message. It seems to me it would be foolish to issue a proclamation when a message would take the place of it.

Mr. ELSON: I think the amendment is all right, and I want to say a word upon the proposal as a whole. My friend from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] has made reference similar to references I have heard on various occasions to the effect that legislators are the representatives of the people, while the governor is referred to as if he were some higher power, entirely above the people and the legislature, and represented something else. I cannot quite imagine what he means. Does not the governor represent the people as well as the legislature represents the people? I think a little more so.

Mr. DOTY: Does the member undertake to say that the governor of the state was elected with any reference to his legislative power or ability, or was charged with any legislative function?

Mr. ELSON: I didn't say anything about that.

Mr. DOTY: That is what you were talking about.

Mr. ELSON: I am talking about his representing the people. Of course he has some legislative functions. The fact that he can make suggestions to the legislature in messages and proclamations and that he has the veto power shows that he has some legislative function.

Mr. DOTY: Outside of the veto power there is no such thing as legislative functions connected with the governor.

Mr. ELSON: He can suggest.

Mr. DOTY: If this proposal gave him legislative functions would it not be mixing the two departments?

Mr. ELSON: He can suggest—

Mr. DOTY: And that's all he can do. The legislature is not obliged to pass anything he suggests.

Mr. ELSON: But I want to refer for a moment to a subject I just mentioned, the representative feature as applied to the governor, or as applied to the legislature. Suppose the governor is elected by sixty per cent of the vote and his opponent gets forty per cent. The whole membership of the legislature may receive sixty per cent, while their defeated opponents receive forty per cent. Thus the governor represents the very same number of voters that the legislature represents. It is very seldom indeed that any measure in the legislature is passed by a unanimous vote in either house, and if a single member of either house votes against the measure, and the governor favors that measure, the governor represents more of the people than the members who voted for it. He represents the whole sixty per cent of the voters who voted for him. So you see the governor represents the people quite as fully as the legislature on the passage of any measure. Why should we speak of the legislature as being representative of the people, and not use the same term with reference to the governor? I would like to see Judge Nye's proposal passed without any change except the amendment offered by the delegate from Medina [Mr. WOODS].

Mr. KNIGHT: It seems to me that this provision is one which should be passed. It is found in many of the constitutions of the different states, and in some of the most progressive states in the Union. It is a well-known fact that extraordinary sessions of the general assembly are called for extraordinary reasons to take care of extraordinary matters. I think it is the general opinion of the people of the state that the regular sessions of the general assembly are adequate to transact all the ordinary business of the state, but emergencies have arisen in times past when it would have been desirable, and it was generally so regarded, to call the general assembly in special session. The question, however, at once arose, Is there any way of stopping the legislators from going on indefinitely upon any and all subjects when once they are called for the purpose of legislating on the emergency measure? It seems to me that the measure should pass. There is, however, one amendment that commends itself to me, and it is one that I have drafted from the constitution of California. This proposal does not make any provision by which the general assembly can provide for the running expenses of such extraordinary session, and my amendment simply takes care of that.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of line 11 change the period to a comma and add, "but the general assembly may provide for the expenses of the session and other matters incidental thereto."

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I trust the proposal of Judge Nye will pass. It seems to me that the argument of the member from Cuyahoga is very wide of the mark and has no relevancy to the proposal, in so far as he seems to forget that the general assembly called in special session is for an emergency and the governor is given the power to determine when the emergency exists.

It has nothing at all to do with the functions of the general assembly in regular session. It is only when something occurs that we feel is of sufficient moment for the governor to take the great responsibility of calling a general assembly together, and there is no other power to convene the general assembly that this proposal provides for; and as the governor assumes that responsibility, and is wisely given that responsibility by the people, he ought further to determine, since the general assembly, within its power, at the regular sessions enacts all the legislation which in its judgment is proper, that that body could not at this special session, called to meet a great emergency, transact business other than that for which it was called. It seems to me that the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] has confounded the functions of the general assembly when it is performing the routine work in regular session with the emergency session called by the governor.

Mr. THOMAS: Do you not think there should be just as great a check on the governor's calling a special session as there should be on the legislature when they are called into special session?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Absolutely not. If a man is elected governor and is worthy to be governor, Limiting Power of General Assembly in Extra Sessions.

he is not an automaton or a stick. He is elected because he represents something, and that something is the great people of the great state of Ohio.

Mr. THOMAS: Is not that true also of the legislature?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Yes, during their regular sessions.

Mr. DOTY: No, for the two years.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Only during their regular sessions.

Mr. ELSON: Will not public opinion regulate the action of the governor above all things?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is no question about that.

Mr. DOTY: All of the members who are in favor of annual sessions vote for this. That is its chief merit. No general assembly would lay down its authority with any idea that it was going to turn it over to the governor, certainly not any further than it has been turned over to him up to date, namely, the mere power to call them together. Who is the governor of Ohio that he knows more what the people want than the legislature? He never was elected to legislate as the legislature was.

Mr. LAMPSON: Harmon was.

Mr. DOTY: Yes, perhaps he was; but he didn't legislate much. The governor never was elected to legislate. The only power he has is his veto, and that should be taken from him, and that is legislative in a large sense. Now you are undertaking to set the governor up to be a man who knows more about what ought to be passed in the way of laws than all of the legislature.

Mr. STOKES: Suppose that a great calamity happened in the state of Ohio, and relief was needed right then and there. Should not the power rest some place so that we could call the legislature together?

Mr. DOTY: We have that now. I don't contend that we have not.

Mr. STOKES: And should you not have the right to limit the action of the legislature?

Mr. DOTY: Not unless you want to do some safeguarding of the legislature. We have been here safeguarding things all winter. Now we are going to safeguard the legislature. We are going to put a brick wall around it, and put the governor on top of a cupola with a gun to safeguard the legislature.

Mr. STOKES: Because the governor has to safeguard the legislature in an emergency, do you want the door open so that all kinds of legislation can be entered upon?

Mr. DOTY: We have had that rule for sixty years and I defy you or any other man to show that the legislature ever abused that power.

Mr. STOKES: Don't you think this Convention ought to shut that off?

Mr. DOTY: Oh, yes; you ought to safeguard everything. All we have been doing here is to "safeguard."

Mr. LAMPSON: Please give us the definition of the word "safeguard."

Mr. DOTY: To safeguard is to let people think they are doing something, and not let them do it. Sometimes you put it in the shape of inhibitions on single tax, which doesn't amount to anything, and sometimes you limit the liquor—

Mr. LAMPSON: I thought it was an inhibition against the single tax.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, either way.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it not true that since 1851 the governor has been clothed with the power to recommend to the legislature at its regular sessions such measures as he deems expedient, and for the last sixty-one years, whenever special sessions were called under the constitution, was it not the governor's special privilege and his duty to notify the legislature as to the purpose for which they were convened? Now the question is whether we add anything to him in that regard or not.

Mr. DOTY: He has about as much function under the constitution on legislation as those other executive officers have in making reports. All he can do is to recommend, and when he gets through with that, he is through.

Mr. KNIGHT: Have you forgotten that since you were in the legislature the governor has been given the veto power?

Mr. DOTY: Yes, and to that extent he has a legislative function; but you want to go ahead of that and have him say what the legislators shall pass. You want to set up the governor as the beginning and the end, and if the legislature gets a shot in the middle, they are lucky.

Mr. KNIGHT: It is strange how things change. A lot of us who awhile ago thought the legislature was worthless are now defending it for all it is worth, while some of us are still thinking of "safeguarding."

Mr. DOTY: There it is, "safeguarding."

Mr. KNIGHT: I am using your word.

Mr. DOTY: No, sir; you are using the word that one hundred and nineteen of us have been using all winter long.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am trying to ask a question—

Mr. DOTY: You have made an awful stab at it. I thought it was a statement, not a question.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have heard something said about men who answered questions before they were asked.

Mr. DOTY: I think I can answer yours before I hear it.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is not this in line with what we have been doing in the way of safeguarding?

Mr. DOTY: That is just the trouble with the member. He voted for the initiative and referendum because he thought he was checking somebody from doing something. I was for the initiative and referendum for opposite reasons. The trouble is that the legislature is now prohibited—prevented—from doing what it wants to. I have seen houses sit here wanting to do something and not allowed to do it, and the power that prevented it was not in this room either.

Mr. KNIGHT: Haven't we had the same difficulty here that some people have wanted to do something and somebody else has kept them from it?

Mr. DOTY: The member from Franklin has done his share, but I forgive him.

The delegate from Lucas, Mr. Ulmer, here sought recognition.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. ULMER: No; I want the floor.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty] has the floor.

Limiting Power of General Assembly in Extra Sessions.

Mr. ULMER: But his time is up.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: No; he has seven minutes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Your whole argument, Mr. Doty, against this Proposal No. 7, is that it gives legislative power to the governor. Is not that it?

Mr. DOTY: Yes; in a limited way. I thank the gentleman for calling what I have said an argument. I didn't know I had gotten to any argument.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: As a matter of fact, is there any merit in your argument that the power of the governor is legislative?

Mr. DOTY: It is greater than that of the legislature.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is the power of the governor to legislate in a special session—

Mr. DOTY: I object to you embodying—

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Wait until I state my question. Is the power of the governor to legislate in a special session any greater than his power to legislate in a general session? Can he do more than recommend?

Mr. DOTY: Not a thing, but you want to make it that way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: How?

Mr. DOTY: You want to have the governor set up the pins as to what you can do and cannot do. It is not so much as to what you may do in the general assembly, but as to what you may not do. If you give the governor the power to say what you cannot do, you are giving him a tremendous power.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That has nothing to do with the main question. In a special session has the governor any greater power to legislate than in a general session?

Mr. DOTY: Yes.

Mr. WINN: We are debating under a five-minute rule, and the member from Cuyahoga has had the floor for twelve minutes:

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: I stand corrected. I thought the gentleman had twenty minutes.

Several delegates moved to extend the time of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty].

SEVERAL DELEGATES: No.

Mr. DOTY: I don't want it.

Mr. ULMER: Some one yesterday said that this Convention was costing $300 a day.

A DELEGATE: $600.

Mr. ULMER: That is still worse. If the general assembly is called together by the governor there is another set of gentlemen in the other room, and that makes expenses still higher, and I do not think after they have been called together by the governor, and have finished the work that they were called for, they should be given the privilege of fooling away their time as we have done, and spending the taxpayers' money.

Mr. THOMAS: Do you know the legislators get their salaries whether they meet or not?

Mr. ULMER: There are other expenses to be added.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the delegate from Franklin.

Mr. HALFHILL: I believe this proposal ought to prevail. It is exceedingly strange to me how some members take positions against proposals here under certain conditions, and then under certain other conditions occupy an entirely different position. It seems as if the matter depends on what branch of government is before the Convention; that determines the particular denunciation. For two or three weeks we heard the legislature denounced as being unfit to be trusted with any of the rights and privileges of a legislative body. For two or three weeks we heard the courts denounced as being unfit to pass upon the rights and privileges and liberties of the citizens. Then later the gentleman from Cuyahoga appears as the champion of the short ballot in state affairs in which he desires to invest the governor with all the powers of all the present executive departments of the great state of Ohio, and put the governor up in the spotlight so that we may hold him responsible for all that occurs. In other words, put him up where he has all the power that could be conceived as being conferred upon a governor. That was the argument made at that time. Today we have the governor denounced as though there should be some other restraint or restriction extra constitutional put upon him, so that by observing the particular branch of the state government, and the particular occasion when it is up for consideration, we can find out who it is that is ready to denounce that department and for what purpose. Now, as an aphorism, this constant faultfinding is like sand in the sugar, it not only destroys the sweetness of life, but puts your teeth on edge. That is the way with these denunciations of the different departments of government. If it is right at one time to clothe the governor with all power, is it not right to dignify him with the right and privilege and prerogative in case of emergency to call the legislative branch of government together, and prescribe the limitation of what it shall do? That is all there is in it, and we know from our own past experience that often there have been times when it would have been to the advantage of the people of the state of Ohio if the chief executive could have called the legislature together to perform a particular thing, but the executive was afraid that the legislature would undertake for its own reasons to do something that was not to the advantage of the people of Ohio at that particular time. I submit, this proposal ought to prevail; and the argument made against it by the gentleman from Cuyahoga does not accord with the position which he took upon the short ballot, which combines all the executive departments in this state into the office of governor, and virtually places that official in "the fierce light that beats around a throne."

Mr. WINN: I want to say just a word in favor of this proposal, and at the same time I want to be consistent. A few days ago I was in favor of the referendum, while my friend from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] was opposed to it. He was opposed to it because he had such unlimited confidence in the legislature. I was in favor of it because of my limited confidence in the legislature. I am still in favor of this proposition because of my limited confidence in the legislature. He is in favor of it because of his unlimited confidence in the legislature.

Mr. HALFHILL: I never was a member of that body.

Mr. WINN: Really, we are making "much ado about nothing."

Limiting Power of General Assembly in Extra Sessions.

Section 8 of article III of the constitution reads as follows:

He [the governor] may on extraordinary occasions convene the general assembly by proclamation, and shall state to both houses when assembled the purpose for which they have been convened.

That is very simple. When he calls the legislative branch of the government together, he says to them, "I have called you together to do thus and so." Presumably when they have concluded the work for which they were convened, they will, like wise legislators, adjourn and go home. But it sometimes happens that members of the general assembly get it into their heads that after being convened in extraordinary session they will do what the governor wishes them to do, and then go ahead and do what they want to do, and the consequence has been that in almost all cases the governor has hesitated, even when the demands were strong, to convene the general assembly in extraordinary session. This proposal does nothing except to say that when they have been convened, and the governor has laid before both houses the business for which they have been called together, and they have concluded their work, they shall adjourn and go home. Pick up any newspaper in the state after the general assembly has been in session a short time and you will see them praying for the day to come when the legislature will adjourn.

Mr. ANDERSON: Was not the change providing that the general assembly meet every two years made because they were making too much law?

Mr. WINN: There is no question about that, and Mr. Doty was in the legislature at that time and supported it.

Mr. ANDERSON: And is not this proposal entirely consistent with that idea?

Mr. WINN: Altogether consistent with all the things we have been doing here. It simply means to add to this section 8 of article III a provision that when the general assembly is called the work for which it was convened shall be stated to them and it can only do the work for which it was called.

Mr. ANDERSON: The theory is that they should not be called together for making any law except in case of an emergency?

Mr. WINN: Except in some cases of emergency when the public interest demands it, and the demand is strong. Then the governor will call the general assembly together and tell the general assembly what is wanted, and if the general assembly agrees, it will simply pass the law and adjourn; otherwise, adjourn without passing it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Do you not think that the proposal is wise also for the reason that with the knowledge on the part of the people that the legislature can consider, when called in extraordinary session, only the things that the governor has mentioned, and there would be no outside special interest to harass the legislature, that that temptation would be removed?

Mr. WINN: That probably is true.

Mr. PECK: I think we have been spending a good deal of time about nothing. I rise to state what I recall about special sessions, and that is all. I remember but one special session of the legislature. Ten or fifteen years ago—I think some of the gentlemen here were members—the general assembly was called in special session by proclamation of the governor to pass a law relating to the board of public works in the city of Cincinnati. They got together, and like good boys, they legislated the board of public works of the city of Cincinnati out and legislated another board in, which happened to be of different politics from the one they put out, and thereupon they adjourned; and thereupon the supreme court promptly decided that law to be unconstitutional. Mr. President I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

A further vote being taken, the amendment of the delegate from Franklin was carried.

A further vote being taken, the amendment of the delegate from Medina was carried.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: The question is on the passage of the proposal as amended.

Mr. PIERCE: On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEM: This is on the passage of a proposal and the roll would be called under rule.

The question being "Shall the proposal pass?"

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 7—Mr. Nye. To submit an amendment to article 3, section 8, of the constitution.—Relative to calling extra sessions of the general assembly.

Limiting Power of General Assembly in Extra Sessions—Regulating State Printing.

Resolved by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE III.

EXECUTIVE.

SECTION 8. The governor on extraordinary occasions may convene the general assembly by proclamation and shall state in said proclamation the purpose for which said special session is called and no other business shall be transacted at said special session except that named in said proclamation or in a subsequent public proclamation or message to the general assembly issued by the governor during said special session, but the general assembly may provide for the expenses of the session and other matters incidental thereto.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The president here resumed the chair.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 261, Mr. Halenkamp.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HALENKAMP: The purpose of this proposal is to correct a seeming mistake in the old constitution. Article XV, section 2, of the constitution, reads as follows:

The printing of the laws, journals, bills, legislative documents and paper for each branch of the general assembly, with the printing required for the executive and other departments of state, shall be let, on contract, to the lowest responsible bidder, by such executive officers, and in such manner, as shall be prescribed by law.

The intention of the first part of the proposal is to take out of the old constitution the word "executive officers." The reason for this is that another part of the constitution specifies that the executive officers of the state shall be the governor, secretary of state, treasurer of state, auditor of state and the attorney general. They are the executive officers. The legislature has created and established a department of public printing, and at the head of that department has put a supervisor of public printing. It is his duty to attend to all the printing of the state, to test the paper and attend to other details. After he gets the bid he is required by law to take it to the printing commission, which consists of the secretary of state, auditor of state and attorney general. Now it was necessary, in order to conform to the constitution, for the legislature to establish this printing commission of executive officers, and it did establish the printing commission consisting of the secretary of state, auditor and attorney general. When the supervisor of public printing, whose duty it is to take the bids, gets the bids, he takes them to the commission. The attorney general is always busy with his law, the secretary of state is busy with his duties, and the auditor of state has his work to do; not having had any connection with the bids before they were received from the supervisor of public printing, they don't know anything about the job at all, and they have to take his word. I have it from him and them that they usually say, "Well, we will accept your word for it." But there have been times when he has not been able to get a majority of them together. The work of the department has been crowding. Letters have been sent asking when this report and that could be had, and it was impossible to get the printing commission together.

The same has been true of bills for printing. They would all come in to the supervisor, and he must refer them to the printing commission. About two years ago the printing commission decided to hold sessions on the first and fifteenth of each month and they went on for a month or two, and then found it was impossible to hold those meetings, and the result is when the bills are received they are put in their desks, and sometimes they stay there until the end of the month, when the time for discount has gone by. The state has by reason of that, lost a thousand or so dollars every year in discounts.

Mr. WINN: Is the supervisor of printing a constitutional officer?

Mr. HALENKAMP: No, sir; I have an amendment to take care of that. I realize it is going too far to specify the duties for that officer in the constitution. The amendment is to strike out of line 4 the word "papers," and insert "supplies," and in line 7 to strike out the words "by the state supervisor of public printing," and in line 8 strike out the word "departments." Then it would read:

The printing of the laws, journals, bills, legislative documents and supplies for each branch of the general assembly, with the printing required for the executive and other departments of state, shall be let, on contract, to the lowest responsible bidder, or may be done by the state in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

The intention of the first part of the proposal was to get away from the red tape and facilitate the matter, and let the legislature say that the department of printing shall attend to this or adopt some other means. I do not believe the legislature should be required to enact laws requiring the executive officers to do this, because the executive officers have not the time to give it the attention it requires.

I do not think the second part of the proposal requires any explanation. The idea is, when the volume of printing reaches such proportions that the state thinks it should be in the business itself, it should be able to do so. Our national government does all of its own printing. It is done under its own supervision, and it owns the plants and the machinery. Big business houses that get out a big amount of printing have their own printing departments. All over the country big concerns that get out much printing establish their own printing departments. The idea is not to establish a printing department by the state now, but only to make it possible that when the time comes and the state wants to, it may be permitted to do so.

I now offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 7 strike out "by the state supervisor of public printing."

In line 8 strike out "through the department of public printing."

Regulating State Printing.

Mr. DOTY: Will the gentleman from Hamilton yield to a question?

Mr. HALENKAMP: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: What have you in mind in substituting the word "supplies" for "papers"? What supplies are there that can be printed?

Mr. HALENKAMP: Mr. Knight has just called my attention to that. The reason I inserted the word "supplies" was that I didn't think the word "papers" there included "other supplies." I have no objection to leaving the word "supplies" out, and I withdraw that much of it.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: In an investigation four years ago we found that the graft was all committed in the furnishing of supplies. Mark Slater is over in the penitentiary now on that very word. As Mr. Halenkamp well said the printing commission is supposed to O. K. all bills, but they don't know anything about them.

Mr. DOTY: And I want to call attention to the fact that if the gentleman put the word "supplies" in, as he said he would, he won't do what he wants to do.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I move to amend Mr. Halenkamp's amendment, as follows: After the word "papers," in line 4, add "and purchase of supplies." Strike out the word "and" in line 4, and insert a comma. This is a question of graft in the state house.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The last point referred to by Mr. Halenkamp had considerable weight with the committee, and that is the fact that probably the state would sooner or later, perhaps sooner, have its own printing outfit. It is possible to conceive that printers might combine and put up the price. It is not very likely that they will, but as there was no provision made for this, it was thought wise that this be inserted. It met with the full approval of the committee.

Mr. PETTIT: Are you the chairman of the committee?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I sit at the head of the table, yes.

Mr. PETTIT: Will you tell the Convention any reason why you chose Proposal No. 261 instead of Proposal No. 160?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I don't think we had Proposal No. 160 before us.

Mr. PETTIT: Oh, yes you did. What did you do with it?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I don't think we had it.

Mr. PETTIT: I appeared before you in reference to that proposal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If I am not mistaken I think we deferred action on it at your suggestion.

Mr. PETTIT: You were to report further to me about it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I have no recollection of considering a proposal of yours involving those points I have an indistinct recollection of your appearing before the committee with some proposal, and then finally asking that it be deferred, and it was deferred.

Mr. DOTY: Before I offer an amendment I would like to submit it informally to see if I have met the matter that the member from Wood [Mr. BEATTY] desires. In line 4 before the first "the" insert "the purchase of stationery and supplies and," and then it goes on this way "the purchase of stationery and supplies, and the printing of the laws, journals, bills," etc.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: That will cover it. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. DOTY] was read as follows:

In line 4 before the first "the" insert: "The purchase of stationery and supplies and."

Change the capital "T" to "t."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment offered by the delegate from Hamilton [Mr. HALENKAMP] was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS: I think in line 5, the words "and supplies" ought to be added, after the word "printing."

The amendment was reduced to writing and read as follows:

Add after the word "printing" in line 5 words "and supplies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal as amended.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 95, nays 2, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 261 — Mr. Halenkamp. To submit an amendment to article XV, section 11, of the constitution. — Relative to state printing.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Regulating State Printing—Limiting Terms of County Officials.

The purchase of stationery and the printing of the laws, journals, bills, legislative documents and papers for each branch of the general assembly, with the printing and supplies required for the executive and other departments of state, shall be let, on contract, to the lowest responsible bidder, or may be done direct by the state in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. DOTY: This proposal has been amended considerably and I move that it be reprinted as passed.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 17—Mr. Baum.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. BAUM: The purpose of Proposal No. 17 is so plain that it needs but little explanation. The principles involved are so simple and elementary that every delegate has probably already decided where he stands in regard to it. On this proposal, then, argument can do but little good and my remarks shall be correspondingly brief.

Let us take the first section: "No person shall be eligible for re-election for any county office to succeed himself. The term of such officer shall be four years." The language used is perhaps ill chosen, as it might be construed to mean that a county official could not hold the same office at any future time, while my intention and I think that of the committee, was that he should be ineligible only for the next succeeding four years. I shall therefore offer an amendment at the proper time to remedy that defect. What is really intended in this part of the proposal is the elimination of the second-term nuisance with its long train of evils. Long-established custom invested the second-term idea with a character and position almost sacred. Touch not the bosses annointed. He, the boss, always insists on a second term. It is regular, it is good politics, the official is entitled to a second term; but the simple reason is the party boss could scarcely get along without the second-term principle. A large part of his revenue is derived from this source, and while it is not claimed that the prohibition of a second term will take away the avocation of the boss, yet it will cripple him.

The whole theory of a second term is vicious, even though it is as wide as the nation and as old as the government. Public officials have used the power and patronage of their position to perpetuate themselves in office. In this way they have built up machines that were absolutely unbreakable and have hung on to public offices long after the second term, and long after they have ceased to be useful.

The present secretary of agriculture at Washington is a good example. His duty is to aid agriculture in every way possible. His business, as he sees it, is to build a machine that even the president of the United States dares not oppose. So Wilson has held on through three administrations and the end is not yet.

A former state dairy and food commissioner built a machine so strong that he nominated himself for a third term in opposition to public opinion and it was only by an overwhelming public sentiment that he was defeated for a fourth nomination. Under the present system the president of the United States must descend from his exalted position to make an unseemly scramble for renomination, and the machine he has constructed to accomplish this differs only in magnitude, not the least in principle, from that known as the "organization" in nearly every county in the state.

But I submit to you, gentlemen, that a custom or system that builds up organizations to thwart the will of the people, loot the county treasuries and debauch the electorate is vicious in the extreme.

What would the single term of four years accomplish? First of all, it would improve the administration of county offices. As it is now, the greater part of a county official's first term is used in trying to secure his renomination and re-election. He must be away from his office a large part of the time, actively engaged in the work of his campaign. When in his office a great part of his time is demanded by committees, ward politicians, grafters and deadbeats. His work must necessarily be attended to by others. He becomes a mere figurehead, and by the time he is re-elected, if he is so fortunate, he feels that his deputies are more competent to run the office than he is and he acts accordingly. I have in mind a certain county official who only visited his office once or twice a month. Of course, he had efficient help, and the public business did not materially suffer, but they were not responsible to the public, and besides the public are better satisfied when they see the official himself attending to business.

Then it would reduce misappropriation of public funds. Almost every county official is guilty of the misuse of public money, but perhaps the county commissioners offend oftenest in this respect. The county commissioner, candidate for a second term, is subjected to a pressure that is almost impossible for a mere man to withstand, because the demands come from persons he can hardly afford to ignore—party boss, contractors, prominent citizens. To protect his machine the party boss demands that jobs should be given to his followers and if there are no jobs they must be provided. In this way the superintendence of a small bridge or culvert sometimes costs as much as the labor and material. Contractors are all politicians; for contracts they deliver votes. I do not refer to contracts awarded after competitive bidding, although in this there has been much cause for scandal, but to the petty contracts awarded by favoritism and where they will do the most good. Sometimes, at least, another man might have been found who would have done the work for less money. In many instances contracts that should by law have been let by competitive bidding have been so divided as to make two or more contracts. You know why. And then the "prominent citizen" wants a bridge or a road, and he controls votes—perhaps a township. Thousands of dollars in many counties of the state have been appropriated ostensibly for public roads and bridges, but in reality to insure a second term. Remove the lure of the second term and the boss, the prominent citizen and the contractor will each have only his proper influence.

Again, this proposal furnishes the means of materially shortening the ballot. The schedule can be so arranged that only one-half of the county officials are elected at the same time, and instead of twelve county officers to be voted for there will be but six, and this in turn will improve the administration of some of the offices. The auditors' and treasurers' offices are intimately connected and these offices should never both be changed the same year. And one county commissioner should always be chosen at an election different from the other two; the reasons are obvious.

The elimination of a second term will also reduce the necessity for graft on the part of the county official. The candidate for county office is generally a young man with very little money to spare. The expenses incident to the first campaign are a severe drain on his financial resources. He naturally supposes that when he begins drawing his official salary he can soon pay his debts and accumulate a campaign fund for his second term. In this he is doomed to disappointment. Hardly has his first term begun, which in most cases is nearly a year after his election, when he is asked to contribute to the city campaign fund and he dares not refuse. The subscription list for every charity must contain the names of the county officials. He has to help build or repair the churches, make good the fire loss of the improvident, buy tickets for every kind of society, lodge or church entertainment, and look pleasant while he makes innumerable short loans to deadbeats.

Then comes the second campaign assessment. He thought, perhaps, the former assessment was outrageous, but he sees now that it was very reasonable. Like the railroads, the boss always puts on all the traffic will bear, and he never uses his conscience when he makes this second assessment. By the time the official's second campaign is ended he is hopelessly in debt and can see no way of breaking even except by converting to his own use every dollar he can draw from the public treasury upon any pretext whatever. The total amount of money thus illegally drawn by the county officials in this state for the nine years from 1903 to 1911, inclusive, was nearly two and one-quarter million dollars. Every county in the state contributed to this sum. Of this amount $833,000 was recovered during the same time. Of course, it cannot be justly claimed that all this graft should be charged directly to the account of the second term, but a large part of it should. Had it not been for the immense expenditure of money made necessary because he was a candidate for a second term, the official being absolutely held up, as I have tried to show, much of this money never would have been drawn from the treasury.

Very few county officials profit financially from the salary or income from these offices. Among my personal acquaintances perhaps nine out of ten have retired from office in a worse financial condition than they were in at the beginning. The very fact that these officials are practically bankrupt at the end of their terms proves that the graft has not gone to enrich them, and we do know that a very large sum is usually given out by them on demand because they fear defeat for re-election.

A single term of four years will reduce the corruption fund by half. There will be only half the number of candidates from whom to collect this fund. Then, as I have asserted previously, the boss always assesses the second term more heavily than he does the beginner. Why an official should get anxious and scared about re-election I do not know, but it is a fact, nevertheless. Perhaps the criticisms, the desertions of former friends and the activity of his opponent reach his ears oftener. Two things are always impressed on him by the organization (which means the boss): "Help provide a good big campaign fund and get to work." He is in office and can get hold of the money. Some of the other candidates cannot. These and other means, fair and unfair, are used to get his money and he "comes across." He has to. Were it not for the second-term campaign pickings would be rather meager. Just let the organization of a party with no representatives in the court house try to raise a campaign fund. It is discouraging work. We all condemn the political boss; we are looking for a club, any kind of club, to swat him. Reduce his power and revenue by eliminating the second term; that will, at least, furnish us with a pretty big stick.

There is one phase of this subject that may not affect us at all as taxpayers, but should concern us greatly as citizens. What effect does this effort to be re-elected have on the character of a candidate? His contributing money to buy votes? His loafing in saloons? Making and breaking promises? Associating with dead-beats and bums? Drawing money from the public treasury he is not entitled to? He generally goes into public office a clean and ambitious young fellow; is it not remarkable that so many retain a good character after being subjected to all these temptations?

Another thing, the ordeal to which a candidate for re-election is subjected is something to be dreaded by any man. Not only is the general conduct or policy of his office severely criticised, but every act of his is given the worst possible construction and his motives impugned. A few years ago I saw the auditor of our county die. As gentle, as refined, as honest a man as I ever knew. The criticism of his official acts and the demands made upon him because he was a candidate for re-election unbalanced his mind and he ended all by a bullet. Now, a certain amount of criticism of the right kind is wholesome and necessary, but if it were intended only for the benefit of the public and not for its effect on the official's chance for re-election, it would be better for all concerned.

One objection has been urged—four years is a long time to be cursed by a bad official. Let me say, in answer to that, the bad official in almost every case is re-elected under the present system; he looks out for that; the boss helps him and they are both unscrupulous. It is the conscientious official, who gets the ill will of a certain element, who is likely to suffer.

The second section is the proposal of the member from Erie county added to Proposal No. 17 as it originally was drawn. It certainly commends itself to every one; county officials should begin their terms as soon as possible after election, and with the exception of the county treasurer, on the same date. In that way it becomes a general housecleaning period for the county officers.

Several members have inquired as to the effect this proposal, if adopted, will have on officials who are now candidates for a second term. That can, and will, be taken care of in the schedule. Candidates will all have been nominated and it would be unjust to declare these nominations void; so, without doubt, the schedule will exempt all candidates nominated at the time this constitution is adopted.

I now offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9 strike out the first sentence and insert the following:

"No county officer shall be eligible for re-election for the next succeeding term."

Mr. FACKLER: Do you include the judge of probate?

Mr. BAUM: That was called to my attention, and I am willing to accept an amendment excepting the judge of probate.

Mr. FACKLER: Do you think when a county officer has proven his efficiency with the people that they should not be allowed to re-elect him?

Mr. BAUM: There can never be a rule to fit every case. Sometimes they ought to be continued, but nine times out of ten it is the other way, and it is our experience that not one official has been elected more than two terms. Several times they have been candidates for the third term, but they have been defeated uniformly.

Mr. DOTY: Did I understand you to say that nine times out of ten officers in Ross county are incompetent to hold public offices?

Mr. BAUM: No; I didn't say that. I said the people wouldn't return them for a third time.

Mr. DOTY: I understood you to say nine out of ten were not competent.

Mr. BAUM: You didn't understand me correctly.

Mr. OKEY: I am in favor of this proposal. I would say by way of preface that there will be an amendment offered by the gentleman from Richland [Mr. KRAMER] directly, which I approve of, taking care of county officers who are candidates the present year—nominated this spring, and those who are also in office now—and after that amendment has been offered I think this proposal will be fairly complete.

We all know that the test for electing a man to a public office should be efficiency. Under our present system a man has to make four campaigns in order to hold two terms. I believe if a man were permitted to hold for a term of four years, and only be required to make one campaign, after he got in he would only look after the public business. We all know, as a matter of fact, and no man can deny that, that when a man is in office for the first time his time is taken up to a large extent entrenching himself for a second term. I do not blame anybody for that. That is human nature. And during his first term his mind is distracted from the immediate duties of his office, while if he had a term of four years without chance of re-election, after he was elected he would only have one thing to look after, namely, the public business. If we had fewer campaigns in this country we would have better officers. The more campaigns we have the more the people are stirred up, and the more demoralizing the effect upon the people. If we had fewer campaigns and longer terms we would have better service.

It has been said that in some counties we have had men renominated time after time. I do not deny that, but that condition of affairs does not prevail all over the state of Ohio. Moreover, I am not in favor of perpetuating men in power forever, for I believe that men who are out of office are just as competent to perform the duties of the office as those in it. And, therefore, while this rule might in some instances affect some counties in a way not desired, as a whole it is the proper thing. And you cannot adopt a rule that will meet every condition or the desires of all persons. But in the long run we want to get the best thing for the people of the whole state, and we cannot let exceptions govern us in our actions here today. Therefore, I am in favor of the proposal.

Mr. ULMER: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I am not in favor of the proposal. It may be justified from the standpoint of politics, but it cannot be justified from the standpoint of business principles. There is no wrong in allowing a man who has performed his duty honestly and intelligently and fairly to be continued in office. It is a simple matter of business. You never see a great corporation changing their superintendents or managers as long as they know that the men they have are capable and honest and are doing their duty. The same thing should be true in public affairs, and the same principle should be applied there.

Mr. Baum spoke about graft and such things as that. If a man is elected for one term, even if for four years, is not that incentive to him to make all out of the office that he can during that four years? Will we make a man more honest or more efficient? Not for a moment.

You may have good laws and bad men in office, and you may have bad laws and good men in office. The bad men with the good laws will hurt you, but the bad laws with the good men won't. We have come to the conclusion, and the people of this country must come to it, that if we have a good government we must keep good men in office as long as they are willing to serve. We know the men who do their duty, and we respect them, and when we retain them in office we will have good government, and not until then.

Mr. KERR: Are you in favor of a political machine?

Mr. ULMER: No; it is the duty of the citizen to do away with the machine, and the citizen who follows a machine is not a good citizen. I never followed a machine in all my life. I followed principles.

Mr. PETTIT: Are you in favor of keeping a man as long as you can keep him there without regard to the rights of others?

Mr. ULMER: I am in favor of keeping a man in office just as long as he is efficient and honest and is willing to serve.

Mr. PETTIT: You would keep him in for life?

Mr. ULMER: I don't care. We all agree that the people of Switzerland today have the best government on earth. Why? Because they keep their good men in office. They have a man today in the executive department who is eighty-two years old, and who has been in that office twenty-eight years. We had a man in another branch of the executive department forty years.

Mr. PETTIT: If that is your idea about the Swiss government, why didn't you remain there?

Mr. ULMER: That is an insult. I respect your age, but that is an insult.

Limiting Terms of County Officials.

Mr. STAMM: May I ask a question? Don't you think that Proposal No. 169 by Judge Worthington will bring about better conditions and somewhat harmonize with your views —

Mr. ULMER: I think so.

Mr. STAMM: Civil service reform?

Mr. ULMER: That is true. We should have that.

Mr. STAMM: The appointment and promotion of officers in the state without reference to political conditions, but according to merit?

Mr. ULMER: I am in favor of that. Now, gentlemen, we have some counties with great populations. Look at Cuyahoga, Hamilton, Franklin and Lucas. There you have counties with an immense population, and if a man goes into office there as a commissioner, it takes him quite a while to get acquainted with the duties of his office and the details of his business, and then, after he knows all the ins and outs, along comes another election, and he steps out and another young fellow steps in — to learn. Do you think the people are benefited by such things as that? No. I say, if you have a good honest man, keep him in office, and protect him, and you will get good government. Don't constantly be changing. It is a foolish idea to talk of letting another man have a chance. No private corporation does that. They say, when they have a good man, "As long as it is to our benefit we will keep that good man." The people should apply the same principle. Therefore I am against the proposal. It is opposed to the principles of good government.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am very glad as a member of this Convention that we have with us two gentlemen from Switzerland who are able to come to us and tell us with some authority some of the good features of the Swiss government, and I am very glad that they didn't remain in Switzerland and allow us to get along here on the principle that rotation in office is a chance for the other fellow.

Mr. STAMM: Are you not glad that we didn't settle in Adams county?

Mr. KNIGHT: No; I am rather sorry, because I suspect if the gentlemen from Switzerland had gone down there, Adams county would be a little better than it now is.

On the matter of the pending proposal it seems to me we are in danger of depriving ourselves of that which makes in private business the best administration and has the best effect. The gentleman from Lucas [Mr. ULMER] has already delivered a large part of my speech. It seems to me that we are in danger, for fear that we shall occasionally get rascals in office, of taking steps to keep good men from retaining office when we get them there. The provision for direct primaries and the impetus which it is hoped this Convention will give to good citizenship in this state will tend to the election of good men to start with, and we will not re-elect men who do not make good officers.

But without reference to any danger of a political machine, I am strictly opposed to this proposal. It seems to me that we are running the risk of depriving ourselves of vast possibilities for improvement in the governmental life.

Mr. HURSH: I am in favor of this proposal. I am not sure that I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Ross [Mr. BAUM], but what I sought recognition for is that I would like to call the attention of the Convention to line 10, "except treasurer." If we are going to change the time for the public officials to take office, and if we are going to make their terms uniform, I am satisfied that the term of the treasurer, in connection with all the other officers, can be arranged to commence in December with the other county officers. I am not sure that the language in the latter part of line 10 "on the first Monday in January" is the happiest that we could get. It might be possible that they might commence at different times in January, but I think January would be definite enough for the change.

I have become somewhat familiar with the proposals along this line. There were two or three or four of them referred to the committee that has reported this proposal, and some were referred to the Legislative and Executive committee. For that reason I was appointed on a sub-committee of the Legislative and Executive committee to give this matter some investigation, and in this county and my own county, and from inquiries in other counties, we find that the idea of fixing a definite time for all county officers to begin their terms, and fixing it in January, pretty well satisfied the auditors and treasurers. Those of you who are familiar with county machinery know the auditor's and treasurer's offices are almost inseparable. The only objection that I can possibly see why the treasurer should not take office in January is that it comes during the collection of taxes. The collection of taxes ought to close on the 20th of December, but we know it does not. I do not see why the treasurer should not take office when the auditor does. I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 10 strike out "except treasurer" and the two commas in the same line.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I am very much in favor of this proposal, especially so with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Hardin. I see no reason why the treasurer should be excepted. As to continuing men in county offices year after year, we know as a matter of fact that is not done except in rare instances. With the possible exception of the office of probate judge, if a man has served two terms that is generally an end of him. A few years ago the law was changed as to length of terms, and I think that most of us agree that two years is rather too short a term. In most of these cases we re-elect them for a second term, and they serve four years, but it is a rare exception that they are re-elected for a third term. So under the proposal they serve as long as they do under our present system, and they are saved the expense of the second campaign. There is great complaint all over the state of Ohio, as to the misconduct in office of county officials — graft and other things — and when we look at what prevails in Ohio, you don't wonder that they do graft. You almost compel them to. Let us see what they are up against. In the state of Ohio within a few weeks we will have a primary, in May, and the man who is nominated in that primary will for six months long make a campaign. It means those men are out of business; they simply lay aside their business for six long months. They have to spend their time and money in this campaign. Then they are elected in November. The treasurer, auditor, commissioner, etc., have to wait almost a year before they get their offices. They have lost all of that time. They are out of business in nearly every case.

Limiting Terms of County Officials.

Do you wonder that men graft and try to get back some of that money? More than that, those men wait nearly a year, and get into office the next fall, and in six months they are in another campaign. I say to you it is not fair. It is not right to drive men to corruption. I have seen young men in my county come in from the country districts. We know young men and we know what happens to them. They hardly get into office until they see, six months ahead, the primary coming on, and they have to make themselves good fellows with the others around them, and in most counties of the state there are saloons in the county seat, and they have to take their friends into the saloons and treat them. The result is a great many of the young men who come in as officers are by this political system driven from the right path and are corrupted. They go out wrecks, and not one man in ten under the present system goes out of office one dollar ahead of what he had when he went into it. It is the short term and the second election that cost so much and cause the trouble.

What is the ideal system that we are working to in Ohio and that we will come to? Four-year terms without re-election in the counties, and four-year terms in the state without re-election, and we will then so adjust it that the election for state officers does not come the same year that the election of the county officers is held. It is wrong to inject a county election into a state election. It would be infinitely better if they were connected with the township and corporation elections rather than the state elections. We are gradually working to that. This is the first move in this direction. Let us make it.

The next move is the election of state officers for four years without re-election, and then the next is the recall. Possibly the Convention did wisely in not adopting the recall, so as not to injure the initiative and referendum. But, gentlemen, you will have the recall inside of four years. It is just as logical a conclusion as anything in the world, and if you make this arrangement of county officers and the other arrangement as to state officers and then get the recall, you will have an ideal system.

Mr. KRAMER: There are a few things connected with this proposal in which I am somewhat interested, but I would think that there were other members of the Convention just as much interested as I am. I notice that the proposal provides that no person shall be eligible for re-election for any county office to succeed himself. I believe that will prevent any officer this fall from being elected to succeed himself because if our constitution is adopted in September, and this provision is adopted, it would compel all the persons who are up for re-election to quit.

Mr. BAUM: Cannot that be taken care of in the schedule?

Mr. KRAMER: I will come to that later on. I think that is a matter that we should especially take care of. I do not like to do anything that will interfere with the men who will make their canvass for office this year. If we do, you will find that there will be from five to twenty people in every county of the state radically opposed to this constitution because of that fact. I would like to see inserted right after that the language "This provision, however, shall not apply to persons elected in November, 1912, to succeed themselves." In our county we have a sheriff, a treasurer, a probate judge and one county commissioner up for re-election. They are candidates to succeed themselves, and probably every other member of the Convention has more or less of these officers in his county who are trying to succeed themselves.

Mr. ELSON: If they are up for re-election this fall at the same time that this constitution is voted for, of course it won't apply to them.

Mr. KRAMER: No, but I don't have any idea from what I hear that this constitution will be up for ratification at the regular election. It won't be if my vote can prevent it. There would not be any question about it if the constitution is submitted for adoption at the same election, but the sentiment of the Convention is that the constitution should be submitted at a separate election, and possibly long before the regular election. Now, suppose we do submit it sometime before the regular election, and it is adopted by the people?

Mr. ELSON: It wouldn't go into effect the minute it is adopted.

Mr. KRAMER: I don't know about that. I know if there were no provisions made to make it become effective at some other time, it would be effective just as soon as approved by the people. That is the danger. For my part I am somewhat interested in this amendment, more so than I have been in almost any other amendment that has been offered, because I have been importuned by persons in Richland county to protect them, and I believe that every other member ought to feel it incumbent to protect his people back home.

Mr. ANDERSON: Does this include members of the general assembly?

Mr. KRAMER: I was going to make a suggestion in regard to that too. Now, if I have made myself plain on that, there is one other thing that I am interested in. If you make the officers elected this fall begin the coming January, it will take away from the term of office of at least three or four county officials from eight to nine months of their time.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If this proposal is adopted, is ratified at the election and becomes a part of the constitution, will it not be at variance with what will obtain when we raise the number of years to four, and would it not prohibit the re-election of common pleas judges? That is one question, and another question is, if a common pleas judge is as a man and an official trusted by the people is it not well to allow him to succeed himself?

Mr. KRAMER: I was not speaking of the merits of the proposal. I was just saying that if we adopted this proposal we should take care of those two sets of officers, those up for re-election this fall, and those whose terms of office will not expire for eight or nine months after January 1st.

Mr. HURSH: You are assuming that the man who would be running for the second term would be beaten out of six to nine months' time. If he is re-elected would not his term be extended two years?

Limiting Terms of County Officials.

Mr. KRAMER: I did not make myself plain on that last proposition. The last proposition is that there are a good many county officers already on their second term, and their term of office does not expire until nine months after the first of the coming January. Take the county auditor, the county commissioner and the probate judge; they would not be affected, but it would affect the county clerk and several other officers, and cut off eight or nine months of their term. I believe when a man is elected on the theory that he is to have a two-year term the Constitutional Convention should not do anything to interfere with his right to hold the full term for which he is elected. Hence, I would like to see both sets of officers protected.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Did I understand you to say this would affect the members of the legislature and give them four years?

Mr. KRAMER: I am coming to that.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: You stated that you have an amendment to offer so that the commissioners elected this fall can succeed themselves. Does that mean that in 1916 they can succeed themselves then?

Mr. KRAMER: That is not what I meant.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: Why not provide that this shall not take effect until 1914? That will fix everybody.

Mr. KRAMER: I would rather allow somebody else to do the amending. I am not much on offering amendments. I don't care how it is done so we can take care of the different situations. Here is the suggestion I made with reference to those who are now in office. "The several terms of such officers shall commence on the first Monday in January next following their election." That is the proposal that came in. Here is something to be added:

But county officers who are elected at the November election of 1912 shall assume the duties of the offices to which they have been elected, and on the expiration of the terms for which those persons are now holding office, their successors shall be elected and continue in office until the first Monday in January, 1917.

This will enable the men elected this fall to know that they are going to have a little taken off of their terms.

Now, a word on the merits of this proposition. I think this amendment ought to be adopted. I do not know whether it would be in order to state before the Convention that I am a Jacksonian democrat. It is more popular, I know, for people to say that they are Jeffersonian democrats, but I rather like Jackson. And I like his ideas applicable to the situation that we are now considering. I know it would work some hardships. There is only one exception to it, as I look at it, and that is Judge Smith, of Geauga. I have no objection to Judge Smith's holding the probate judgeship as long as he wants to, but outside of Judge Smith I am opposed to re-electing and re-electing the same men to office.

I offer a substitute.

The substitute was read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

"No person shall be eligible for re-election for any county office to succeed himself. This provision, however, shall not apply to those persons elected in November, 1912, to succeed themselves.

The term of such office shall be four years. The several terms of such officers, except treasurer, shall commence on the first Monday of January next following their election. But county officers who are elected at the November election, 1912, shall assume the duties of the office to which they have been elected on the expiration of the term for which those persons now holding office were elected and continue in office until the first Monday of January, 1917."

Mr. FOX: Why except the treasurer?

Mr. KRAMER: I am in favor of cutting that out, but it was in the original and I just put it in here.

Mr. BAUM: Just a word about the treasurer. The treasurer makes a settlement at the end of his term. He could not make a settlement in the meantime. The books could not be gotten in shape to do it.

Mr. LAMPSON: This proposal seems to me to proceed upon the theory that a county office is for the individual. It is a kind of sugarcoated plum to be handed around, and is not for the benefit of the county at all. Now, for a good many years there has been coming on this country a great reform which recognizes the idea that public office is a public trust, and that men who take office do it for the purpose of serving the public and not simply for feathering their own pockets. I do not see why, when all over this country, from one end to the other, what is known as civil service reform has been adopted and has taken such a hold upon the better class of the people, that this Constitutional Convention of Ohio should go deliberately in the opposite direction. This is retrogression gone mad. Why we should one day proceed to extend the powers of the people and the next day proceed to curtail them in this proposed manner is something I cannot understand. Because the people of one county have been unfortunate in the selection of their county officers and have elected through their own fault and negligence men to office who have not given the best service, why should the people of another county be deprived of electing efficient public servants to office for more than one term? Why, in my county I cannot remember the time when there were not men serving in the county offices in the court house who had been elected more than two terms, sometimes three, four, five and six terms, not because of any machine, but because they had rendered good public service, which the people of the county recognized; and in the adjoining county ever since I can remember the gentleman sitting in front of me (until the last two years) has been probate judge of that county of Geauga, having held office for a period of forty-two years, not because he was an adept politician, for he never was. He never had a political machine, but it was because of his honest, faithful, efficient service in the office of probate judge of that county of Geauga. In my own county we have re-elected time and time again auditors for two, three, four, five, six, and sometimes seven and eight terms.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Have you in your county ever elected any of the opposition party?

Mr. LAMPSON: We never have elected any of the opposition party, and we have never had any trouble because of inefficiency, and we don't want to be deprived of the right of electing efficient officers.

Limiting Terms of County Officials.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Is not that the reason why you have been electing people term after term, because the opposition is not strong enough to stop it, and you have built up a machine?

Mr. LAMPSON: We have no machine, and we have no inefficiency. We have clean, honest, upright public servants, who can go before the people and secure votes in the primary, but we have the hottest kind of opposition in the primaries among the republicans themselves. Why, we renominate for office for county commissioner two years ago a man for a third term, and he went into the primary and got the renomination. There were a lot of people who wanted him for a fourth term. There is a primary going on right now, and men are running for their third terms, one for county commissioner. There is a man running there now for his third term for probate judge. Whether he will get the nomination or not, I don't know, but there will be a full vote in that county at the primary, and if he gets it he will get it because the people want him, and because they think he will render more efficient service than his opponent.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Was not there an investigation in your county a short time ago?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes, and there have been investigations in all the counties.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Was not there some money paid back?

Mr. LAMPSON: I think some, but there were no prosecutions.

Mr. TANNEHILL: Your colleague says not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I did not want to be quoted. I don't know about that. I am not certain.

Mr. LAMPSON: The investigations where the money was paid back were of those offices whose terms were limited under the constitution, the offices of sheriff and county treasurer. I want to add right along that line, that the deficiencies grew out of a difference of construction of the statutes, especially the Dow law. There was no serious contention that there was real malfeasance in office, with possibly one exception.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not a fact that the salary attached to a county office is greater than the average wage-earning capacity of the people of that county?

Mr. LAMPSON: I don't think so; not the class of men we elect.

Mr. WATSON: Your county differs then from most of the other counties in the state.

Mr. LAMPSON: I have no doubt it does differ from some of the counties, and that is what I am insisting upon, and we don't want to be deprived of the right to re-elect men to offices if we want to do so.

Mr. WATSON: If the offices are a good thing, why not pass them around?

Mr. LAMPSON: They were not made for the purpose of being passed around. A public office is a public trust. We elect a common pleas judge, and it is proposed to reduce that to a county office. We elect a common pleas judge in our district so long as he wants to be re-elected, and as long as he stands for re-election, if he is an efficient common pleas judge.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Under this proposal there is nothing to prevent a county officer from holding four years, and then if he will build up a machine in that time is there anything to prevent him from simply running for some other office?

Mr. LAMPSON: Not at all. But take the office of probate judge. Why, as far back as I can remember in politics we have elected a probate judge at least three times — sometimes, more. That is an office that comes directly in contact with the people. Our probate judges have a habit of trying to serve the interests of the people; the widows and orphans and others go into the probate judge's office and consult with him and advise with him so far as he can legitimately advise them. I know also that that was the policy of Judge Smith, and it was the one thing that made him one of the most popular judges in all that part of the state, and one of the most efficient. I think also, if a man has made an especially efficient public servant, there should be some opportunity for recognition of that fact on the part of the public, and if you limit the service to a single term, then they are in the same class, the efficient and the inefficient; there is no opportunity for the voters to register a verdict of approval of a public servant.

Then I don't know what effect this will have upon representatives and senators in the general assembly. In our part of the state it has been the custom, if we get an efficient man and he is willing to continue representative for us, to elect him for more than two terms. That has been the habit of our people up in that congressional district. That is one reason why the nineteenth congressional district of Ohio achieved in years gone by a great reputation. One man, Joshua R. Giddings, represented us twenty-one years. James A. Garfield represented us sixteen or eighteen years — which was it, Judge Smith?

Mr. SMITH, of Geauga: Eighteen years.

Mr. LAMPSON: E. B. Taylor represented us thirty-two years. If these men had been cut off on the theory of this proposal they never would have achieved national reputation.

Mr. KRAMER: I was asked a question and I said I would come to it later, and I never did come to it. Would you consider a representative a county officer?

Mr. LAMPSON: That is a disputed question.

I have heard it a great many times. They are elected by the county, but I confess that I am not certain myself. Some people say that a representative is not a county officer, and perhaps in the sense that the auditor is a county officer he is not, and yet the representative is elected to represent a county. I don't think the people should be limited in their right to elect a representative to two or four years.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Were you not elected by a county?

Mr. LAMPSON: I was elected to the general assembly twenty-five years ago, and I was nominated a third time and I declined for reasons which transpired at the time.

Mr. OKEY: Is it not a fact that all the political machines that have ever existed were built up by continuation of men in office?

Mr. LAMPSON: We don't know anything about political machines in our county. We have men who give their attention to politics, but we have no corrupt political machine, as indicated on this floor. And we never have had. Simply because some counties have those machines. we don't want to be made to suffer because of it.

Mr. EVANS: This proposal assumes that the proper method of electing all county officers is by popular vote. I deny that. I say that is not the proper method in all cases. It is as to such officers as county commissioners. They ought to be elected, but when it comes to the administrative and executive officers, they should be appointed. If I were a democrat in this state of Ohio, which I do not ever expect to be, I would be in favor of Woodrow Wilson, because he is president of the short ballot organization.

Now the great mistake in the constitution of 1851 was the fact that the county officers were required to be elected for not more than three years. That has been the greatest curse that we have suffered from. The people complain of abuses and of corruption in office and with good cause, for we have been guilty of the most consummate folly in reducing some of the offices to two-year terms. The whole trouble is in the peremptory recall. You say any elector is fit for a county office, but only for two years, and in two years you make him get out even if he were an angel from heaven. I say that is all wrong. I do not wonder at the corruption in office in this country. The curse is perpetually with us, and I hope it will continue until the people of Ohio and of the other states will wake up and realize their situation. You take a corporation, and the stockholders are the voters. They elect a board of directors. What does the board of directors do? They select the employes of the corporation, and they keep them in office as long as they do their duty. I tell you until we get to that form of government in city and county affairs we will always have these troubles, and they will be greater and greater.

Look at my county! Forty men candidates for office for two-year terms! God made men to come to their efficiency, say, at about twenty-one years, and they remain efficient as long as they have their faculties, and then they go on the retired list. That is the way to do with county administrative offices — put a man into an executive or an administrative service and let him serve as long as he is efficient. What effect does that have? It crowds out all the chronic office-seekers and forces them to go into some other business where they can be useful to their communities.

Look at the various county seats! They are filled up with ex-county officers who want to get back into office. I would like to see those men go to work. I want them to be useful citizens, to go out and study expert farming and like subjects. I am in favor of some plan that will make the executive officers in a manner permanent and force these citizens who hang around the county seats and seek offices to go to work. I am tired of them. I am like that citizen of Athens when he came to mark his shell when the vote was on the expatriation of Aristides. When he came to mark his shell for or against Aristides he handed it to Aristides himself, and asked him to mark it. Aristides asked him how he wanted it marked. He said mark it for his banishment. Aristides asked him if he knew Aristides. He replied "No". Aristides then asked him why he so voted and he said, "Oh, I am just tired of hearing him called 'The Just'".

That is the way I feel; I am wearied with these office-seekers coming around soliciting men to vote for them.

I am tired of seeing citizens who have run the gamut of office in the county and want to get back by soliciting the people. If a man is fit for office let him stay in it and let the men who want his place go to work. If we are to elect county officers, which is supreme folly, except those who legislate, who make the tax levies and disburse the county money, I am in favor of the short ballot and I am opposed to the proposition to cut any one down to a single term. I say it is a falsehood to say if a man has served four years in office that that renders him unfit to serve any longer.

There are fifteen per cent of the people of the state who are interested directly and indirectly in office and the other eighty-five per cent are not, and I object to the eighty-five per cent having their lives ruined to help the fifteen per cent get office. I am like the citizen of Athens who wanted Aristides voted out. I am just tired of it. I have heard a lot of you talk in this body about the bosses and political corruption. How will we get rid of them and of the system? I have no sympathy for people who maintain the system and then complain of it. I shall vote against this proposal. I know that we cannot get a proposal such as I would like to have, but I can at least be consistent in voting against this proposal.

Mr. TANNEHILL: An amendment has been offered providing that the words "except treasurer" shall be stricken out. I have served as county auditor and I want to say to this Convention that in my opinion the words "except treasurer and auditor" should appear in the proposal. I can not see how in the world you can arrange the terms satisfactory unless you except those two officers.

Mr. MARSHALL: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: I believe I am in favor of the Baum proposal and I will support it if it is amended so it will take care of those officers now in the eighty-eight counties in the state of Ohio serving their first term. We have down in our county three commissioners, a probate judge, prosecuting attorney and clerk of courts who will be up this fall, and their names are now announced for a second term. I do not believe in having anything that will cut those men out of the second term, notwithstanding it would give them six years under the new proposition instead of four years under the old. I further presume there are between three and four hundred county officers in the state of Ohio that would come under this same provision and it is unfair and unjust to cut those men out of the two years. And if you do cut them out of their second term, there will be a power in the state of Ohio against us at the time we want everybody for us.

Mr. DOTY: Explain that power.

Mr. MARSHALL: Three or four hundred officials in the state of Ohio who will be working against us.

Mr. DOTY: Will they use money?

Mr. MARSHALL: No, but they will use their tongues.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I am in favor of this proposal because we do not get the most efficient service under the present plan. Notwithstanding what was said by the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON], the custom does prevail over a great part of the state that we elect county officers for only two terms. In our county that is the prevailing custom, and scarcely any one is ever elected more than two terms.

Mr. LAMPSON: That being the custom and regulated by the people, why are you not content with it, and why do you want to force it on other counties where that custom does not exist?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I was about to state, for the reason stated by the gentleman from Morgan, that the candidates now in the campaign for nomination are elected this fall and about six months afterwards they are in another campaign and the whole thought during all that time is to secure another nomination. For that reason I think this objection at least ought to be removed. There are some other county officers—for instance, I was a member of the board of review, and the complaint has been made by those in a position to know that we don't get the very best service from the officers on the board of review, and it seems that they want them to come under this provision too.

I think the amendment offered by the delegate from Richland should be carefully considered. I think we would be doing an injustice to the county officers who have served only two years to deprive them of a chance to be elected again.

I doubt very much the feasibility of taking the word "treasurer" from the proposal. I think, as Mr. Tannehill suggested, that the auditor should be included with the treasurer, because otherwise this would bring the change of those officers right at the time when the tax collection is on. We know that the law specifies that taxes shall be paid up by the 20th of December, but that is not followed over the state. Taxes are paid way up in January and February, and it seems to me it would be very embarrassing to make a change of those two officers at the time specified.

Mr. HARTER, of Huron: How does that affect anybody up for re-election—this does not go into effect in November?

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: If the election on the constitution is before the regular election it might affect them.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like just a word on this proposal. I am opposed to the whole proposition. I do not believe this is of sufficient importance to put up to the people of Ohio as an amendment to the constitution. I do not know that I have heard any complaint from our section of the state about the operation of the present law. Of course I have heard complaint that men were campaigning when they should have been attending to official duties, but you will never devise any system that is perfect. I believe the best safeguard to get service on the part of the officers is to let them return to the people with reasonable frequency for re-election and indorsement. The terms under the law now are about proper. I do not think we ought to pass this proposal or anything of its kind. I am content to let the present condition remain. Therefore, I am against the whole proposition, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the indefinite postponement of the whole matter.

The motion to indefinitely postpone was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 180 by Mr. Moore, which the secretary will read.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. MOORE: My object in introducing this was to get the short ballot. I believe that public affairs should be reduced to a business system. I believe that a few officers properly organized might be able to form a board of scientific management. I believe in the future we will reach that condition in society, but at present I believe it is not acceptable to a majority of the people of the state of Ohio, or even to this Convention. While I am strongly in favor of the principle enunciated in the proposal and believe it will be put in practice sometime, I move now its indefinite postponement.

The motion to indefinitely postpone was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next is Proposal No. 309, which the secretary will read.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: The committee on Method of Amending the Constitution had before it thirteen different proposals affecting this portion of the constitution known as article XVI, sections 1, 2 and 3. The committee, I think, heard every one who had offered anything to the Convention on this article. The committee met very frequently and I want to take this opportunity of calling attention to the fact that this committee served you very conscientiously and faithfully. The report as finally adopted was embodied in this Proposal No. 309 introduced by Mr. Taggart. After this proposal came before the committee, and after two meetings to consider it, the proposal was changed somewhat. I want to call attention to the fact that this committee on Method of Amending the Constitution was made up of many different kinds of men. There were men of totally different types of mind. At first the committee seemed hopelessly divided. Every member was of the opinion that on this committee rested the greatest work that this Convention was called upon to do; to provide a simple and easy method of amending the constitution, because if we do that it matters not so much what else we do; the people will have the machinery whereby they can, in a simple and businesslike way, get what they want. In the committee's report, in spite of the fact that we were at first divided, we practically agreed upon this proposal introduced by Judge Taggart. The committee's report was signed by Messrs. Stokes, Kunkel, Taggart, Stamm, Brat-tain, Wise, Woods, Stewart, Colton, Kerr, Kehoe, Pettit, Mauck, Harter and myself. There were only two gentlemen who did not sign the report, one of them being Mr. Price, who is in the hospital, and the other Mr. Stilwell, who did not feel that he could conscientiously sign because there was one part of the report to which he could not agree.

Now I will not compare the proposal recommended by the committee with the proposal of Judge Taggart, but I will compare the proposal we recommend with the present constitution. Take your book and look at amended Proposal No. 309 and you can see where we recommend changes in the present constitution. All the changes except one or two minor ones are indicated by the italicized words. The first change appears in line 8 where the word "in" is inserted. That is a mistake in Judge Taggart's proposal. He used the word "of" and we changed it to "in." In line 9 is a substantial change. Under the present constitution the advertisement of an amendment by the general assembly in the newspapers must be for six months preceding the election. We recommend that amendments shall be published in at least one newspaper in each county once a week for eight consecutive weeks. We recommend cutting down the number of months from six months to two months. When the constitution of 1851 was adopted railroads were very scarce and mail was distributed by riders on horseback. Newspapers were not nearly so numerous as they are today. The committee feels that six weeks publication today is fully equal to six months publication sixty years ago.

We provided another change in lines 9, 10 and 11. The old constitution provided that this constitutional amendment must be submitted at a regular fall election when senators and representatives were elected. The committee recommends that it leave to the legislature the fixing of the time of submission, so that they may submit it at a special or general election as they may prescribe.

We provide another change in this, that an amendment submitted to the people must be on a separate ballot without party designation of any kind. The old custom, as you will remember, from 1851 up to 1891, was for the political party machine to print a separate ballot and, if it saw fit, to print the constitutional amendment right on the ballot with the party ticket. The parties did this so that a man going in to cast his vote would vote for the constitutional amendment that his political party desired. Your committee suggests and recommends that all constitutional amendments be submitted on a separate ballot without party designation of any kind, so that constitutional questions will be decided on their merits.

In line 13 you will see the greatest fundamental change. We have changed absolutely the number of votes required to pass a constitutional amendment. The constitution now requires before a constitutional amendment shall become effective in Ohio, that it be voted upon favorably by a majority of all the electors voting at the election. Your committee recommends that a majority only of those voting on the question be required to carry it.

We have adopted some constitutional amendments in Ohio, but they have been adopted because the political parties wanted them.

In giving the figures that I am about to give I am using the tabulated list of elections on amendments prepared by the member from Fayette [Mr. JONES]. As I said, up to 1891 the party managers could print the amendments on their party ballot. In 1891 the Australian ballot law went into effect. It required that each ballot should be marked by the voters. There were two amendments submitted in that year, 1891, and one of them was in regard to the holding of a constitutional convention. It received only thirty-two per cent of the votes cast. The other was a taxation amendment, looking to enlarging the powers of the general assembly in taxation matters, and that amendment was lost because it received only forty-six per cent of the votes cast at that election, although four times as many people voted for the amendment as voted against it.

In 1893 a fundamental change was made. The people of Ohio realized that they could not get their will into the constitution, that they had no power to express themselves as to amendments that our gallant forbears of 1851 had legislated not only for themselves, but for all time in Ohio, because they had made it practically impossible to carry any change into the organic law, even if the people wanted it. So in 1893 what was known as the Longworth law was passed which permitted the party convention to declare themselves in favor of or against constitutional amendments and print the words "yes" or "no" on the party ticket, so that the voter going up to the polls, intelligent or unintelligent, marked his ballot under the rooster or the eagle and thus cast his vote for a constitutional amendment. Under the Longworth act some changes were made in the constitution. I am not going into details of what those were, but I will call your attention to one provision, which was passed in 1903 and indorsed by both of the political parties. It received ninety-eight per cent of the votes at the election. Let me call your attention to the vote of 1893, providing for municipal classification. Neither party indorsed that change. It received only six per cent of the votes cast, whereas another amendment in the same year which was indorsed by the political parties received ninety per cent of the votes cast. The Longworth act, as it was known, was repealed in 1905—at least after 1905—and in 1908 there were three measures submitted to the people, one in regard to passing a bill over the governor's veto, another fixing the time when the general assembly should meet and another with regard to taxation.

The first proposal received only thirty-four per cent, the second only thirty-four per cent and the third only thirty-eight per cent of the votes cast at the election, although all three received an overwhelming majority of those voting on the question.

Now let me call the attention of the Convention to a provision in this regard in other states of the Union.

Twenty-seven states of the United States provide that a majority voting on the amendment shall make it a part of the constitution. Three other states provide that an amendment shall be submitted at a separate election, which amounts to the same thing. So that we have the constitutions of thirty out of forty-eight states of the Union providing the method of amendment which we recommend.

It is interesting to note that several of the states which had the same provision as our constitution of 1851, requiring for decision a majority of those voting at the election, when they held a convention came over to the plan we now suggest, requiring only a majority of those voting on the question to decide it.

The next change I ask you to note is in line 20 of section 2, which provides for the calling of a convention by the general assembly. We recommend that this question of whether or not there shall be a convention to revise, alter or amend the constitution of the state must be submitted on a separate ballot without party designation of any kind. We provide in line 22 that only a majority of those voting for and against the calling of the convention shall be required to call it.

In lines 24 to 27 we make another radical departure from the present constitution. We provide that the delegates to all future conventions to revise, alter or amend the constitution shall be nominated by nominating petitions only and "shall be voted for upon one independent and separate ballot without any emblem or party designation whatever." In other words, we are so pleased with the makeup of this body that we feel it is wise to require the next constitutional convention to be made up of men elected as we were elected.

In section 3, which deals with the question of periodic arbitrary submissions of the question whether or not there shall be a convention, your committee recommends that the question shall first be submitted to the people in 1932 and every twenty years thereafter. This is exactly the same provision we have at present except as to adjusting the date. We provide that the question of whether a convention shall be called shall be decided by a majority of those voting for and against the calling of the convention. Your committee has tried to steer as close to the present provision as it could so that there might be as little change as is consistent with real progress.

Mr. KNIGHT: Line 21, as printed, and I find the engrossed bill is the same, reads: "election for members to the general assembly, or against the Convention."

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I have looked up the original proposal and find that is a misprint. I have an amendment which I will offer to cure the error.

Mr. KNIGHT: In line 28 the language is "who shall be chosen as provided by law." What is the intent of that phrase after having specifically provided a few lines above how they shall be nominated and elected?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: The members of the committee thought it might be safer to leave that language in. So if there is any election machinery needed that is not covered in the constitutional provision the legislature may provide it.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is not this the danger in that, that by party machinations we might be brought back to the same condition we were in under the so-called Longworth act? Is not this language broad enough for that? I am a little afraid of that. It seems to me unnecessary to leave a loophole for uncertainty.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: The committee did not consider it so, and they certainly do not want such a thing to happen as the gentleman speaks of, but it was deemed on the whole a little wiser to put these words in.

Mr. MARSHALL: This Proposal No. 309, lines 7 and 8, reads: "entered on the journal with the yeas and nays, and shall be published in at least one newspaper in each county of the state." Who will have the authority to select that one newspaper of each county of the state?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Whoever has the authority at present. I suppose the secretary of state attends to that.

Mr. MARSHALL: There are a good many journals in the state. Won't that cause some confusion?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: If you recall the present constitution you will remember it has the same language, and while I do not think any very great injustice has been done by it, we were trying to cut down expenses and we have cut them down considerably.

Mr. PECK: I do not find anything in this proposal referring to amendments by the people by way of initiative. Did you consider that?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: The committee was very careful not to take final action until the committee on initiative and referendum had fully completed its work, and we continued meetings from day to day until the committee on Initiative and Referendum reported. I hope you do not find anything in this provision which conflicts with the initiative and referendum proposal adopted some weeks ago. This provides the machinery when the general assembly acts.

Mr. PECK: You provide that amendments to the constitution shall be made so and so, and that would exclude all other methods.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I don't think that is a fair interpretation. We provide that constitutional amendments shall be made in this way and there is another part of the constitution which deals with amendments to be made another way. I do not believe there is any conflict here.

Mr. PECK: I am not sure there is, but I want to direct the attention of the committee to it. It might be well to have a saving clause at the end "that nothing herein shall be held to prevent the people," etc.

Mr. ROEHM: In lines 12, 20 and 26 you speak of separate ballots. We have just passed Proposal No. 242, which makes voting by machine possible. What effect would that have in case the people adopted Proposal No. 242. Would not that be provided for by making it "separately"?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: You could possibly adjust the difficulty if there is one.

Mr. ROEHM: How could the machine be used if you use the word "ballot," in view of what the supreme court has said?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: If you think there is any danger of our preventing that, I will be glad to have an amendment offered.

Mr. ROEHM: Why not cross out the "on the ballot" and say "separately" instead of using the word "ballot" in each one of those places?

Mr. KNIGHT: That would require a separate machine for each ballot.

The vice president here took the chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Mr. Smith, of Hamilton, has the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I am very glad to have this discussion, because it is bringing light. The committee only wanted to do what is best to secure the end it seeks.

Mr. COLTON: In line 28 you have "as provided by law." Were not those words inserted to cover such things as a detail of petitions for nominations, etc., which are not specified in that proposal?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: Yes; I think so.

Mr. COLTON: That was my recollection.

Mr. ULMER: I want to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Does the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. SMITH] yield the floor?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: First I want to correct a misprint and I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 21 strike out all after the comma and insert in lieu thereof "for or against a convention."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Now the amendment of the gentleman from Lucas [Mr. ULMER] can be read.

Methods of Submitting Amendments to the Constitution.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of section 2 add the following: "No member of the general assembly shall be eligible to membership in the convention."

Mr. ULMER: There is no member in this Constitutional Convention who was a member of the last general assembly.

Mr. EVANS: What about Mr. Crosser?

Mr. ULMER: I had forgotten him. I do not think any member of the general assembly calling a constitutional convention should be eligible for membership of a constitutional convention. Members of the general assembly could agitate the calling of the convention in order to be members of the convention themselves and so do it for their own interest.

Mr. PETTIT: I move that the amendment of the member from Lucas [Mr. ULMER] be laid on the table.

The motion on a division was carried and the amendment was tabled.

Mr. DOTY: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After line 21 insert: "provided, however, a convention to revise, amend or change this constitution shall be voted upon by the people whenever twelve per centum of the qualified electors of the state shall file a petition with the secretary of state calling for such a convention."

Mr. DOTY: The amendment at the desk is not exactly right, but this is what I am attempting to do: I am attempting to provide that there shall be another way of calling a convention besides through the legislature once in twenty years. I am attempting to provide by the initiative and referendum that the people themselves may call a convention at any time without consulting the legislature and without waiting for the twenty-year period. I think I have done it. I may be in error as to some of the wording of it, but that will not prevent our discussing the point that I am attempting to make.

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I think we should take this matter up one point at a time. The committee was of opinion that we ought to have this legislative way of amending the constitution very distinctly separate from the initiative and referendum method, in case a majority of the people of Ohio are not in favor of the initiative and referendum. The very fact that such an amendment as Mr. Doty's has been introduced may defeat this. Therefore the committee was in favor of the proposal as reported. The question of putting some such provision as this in the constitution came up and was discussed and considered, but we thought it was best to leave this as it is and let the people through the general assembly submit their amendments.

Mr. KERR: I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Upon which the yeas and nays were regularly demanded; taken, and resulted—yeas 68, nays 29, as follows:

Those who voted in the affirmative are:

So the amendment was tabled.

Mr. RILEY: I think if there is anything we can agree on it is that this Convention is entirely too large to transact business satisfactorily and that a much smaller body would be better.

DELEGATES: Oh, no.

DELEGATES: Agreed.

Mr. RILEY: It may be there are several who do not agree with that, but I cannot help that. I expect to be around here, but not as a member of the next Convention.

I sat in the committee presided over so ably by the gentleman from Hamilton and I was impressed with the fact that the committee handled its work so well that I believe a convention of half the number could go over the whole constitution and amend it in one-fourth of the time and much more satisfactorily than we shall be able to do, and there were only fifteen or twenty members there.

Mr. WALKER: Was the report of that committee in better shape when reported from the committee than when it was finally acted upon?

Mr. RILEY: I am not disposed to go into that very much. Of course I did not agree with the conclusions of that committee, or I would not be here talking about a smaller body. I had a proposition before the committee that I desired the opinion of the Convention upon and they did report it. I think the deliberations of that committee were conducted properly, and while I differ with the conclusion I still think a committee of that size could write a better constitution and do it more speedily for the state and much more satisfactorily than a body of this size, and it would cost only one-third to one-fifth as much. My proposition is to have two men elected from each congressional district of the state. That would make the body just a little bit bigger than the senate, but I think that is large enough, and I therefore offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "of" in line 27 strike out the words "as many members as the house of representatives" and insert the words "two delegates from each congressional district in this state."

Methods of Submitting Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. DOTY: I call the member's attention to the situation that might arise over which we might not have any control. It might come about that we would only have a constitutional convention of two people. There is no provision that compels the state to divide into congressional districts. A congressional district is like a ward in the city. They are not subdivisions of any kind except for temporary purposes, from time to time, to divide up our membership in the general assembly. At the present time we have twenty-one districts, but there have been members elected to congress from the state at large. It is not impossible that we might go back to that system. I think it will be very foolish to insert this in the constitution. It might result in having two men perform the functions of these one hundred and nineteen men.

Mr. RILEY: You are supposing something that never did happen.

Mr. DOTY: But I am not supposing anything that never can happen. The mere fact that it never has happened does not prove that it may not happen in Ohio. More than that, a congressional district is not a division of any kind and it has no business in the constitution. Whether the member is right in reducing the size of the body or not, certainly his manner and method of going about it is all wrong.

Mr. STOKES: I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. RILEY: I am very much enlightened by the gentleman and I want to strike "congressional" out of that amendment and make it read "senatorial districts."

Mr. STOKES: Well, I move to lay that on the table. The motion was carried.

Mr. CROSSER: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "either branch" and change "the" to "The."

Mr. CROSSER: Reading this proposal, it occurred to me that the words "either branch of the general assembly" makes an ambiguous phrase. Does that mean that either branch must act by a general vote—

Mr. TAGGART: May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that is exactly the language in the old constitution?

Mr. CROSSER: I am aware of that, but because it is in the old constitution is no reason for continuing it if it is not proper.

If it is wrong in the old constitution it is wrong here. It is perfectly clear that "either branch" might be construed to mean a unanimous report.

Mr. KNIGHT: Has there ever been any question on that in the sixty years that we have been under it?

Mr. CROSSER: I don't think there has been any construction of it.

Mr. KNIGHT: All you undertake to say is that any member of the general assembly ought to be privileged to offer amendments?

Mr. CROSSER: Yes.

Mr. DOTY: Does not this sentence refer to the method of proposing amendments to the people by somebody?

Mr. CROSSER: It cannot be so, because of the very next words. Just read:

Either branch of the general assembly may propose amendments to this constitution, and if the same should be agreed to by three-fifths of the members of each house, etc.

Mr. DOTY: To get the meaning you are contending for, ought not you strike out and say "the general assembly may propose amendments to the constitution"?

Mr. CROSSER: I don't object to that.

Mr. DOTY: If you strike out "either branch of" it would be clearer, according to your contention.

Mr. CROSSER: It ought to be possible for a member of the general assembly to propose amendments just as we do.

Mr. DOTY: The next line says, "if the same shall be agreed to by three-fifths, such proposition should be spread on the journal," etc., showing that before the general assembly does it, it shall be by three-fifths vote. Therefore, one branch cannot propose as in the sense in which you contend.

Mr. CROSSER: I think it would be just as well to say "Any member of the general assembly may propose amendments," and three-fifths must vote for it.

Mr. DOTY: Won't the fact be that any member can propose an amendment to the constitution? Won't that be the way it is done?

Mr. CROSSER: Yes. But either branch must pass on it by three-fifths. You say either branch may do it, and why not say any member can do it?

Mr. SMITH, of Hamilton: I am very much afraid the gentlemen are mixing up the question of the introduction of an amendment and the proposing of an amendment. Any member may introduce an amendment, but a house must propose it to the other house.

Mr. CROSSER: Is it not true that all we can do is to propose amendments to the constitution, and that is all that the general assembly can do? We propose them to the people.

Mr. TAGGART: The constitution of 1851, in respect to amending the constitution, read as follows:

Either branch of the general assembly may propose amendments to this constitution.

Now if you strike out "either branch of," you leave it simply, "The general assembly may propose amendments to this constitution." That would mean a joint action of both house and senate. You will have both houses troubled at all times with the proposal introduced by any member of the house, and you will have both houses voting on amendments introduced by one member.

Mr. CROSSER: That is exactly the trouble that I saw in the proposal as it now stands. You seem to realize the trouble there—namely, what shall constitute an amendment to the constitution. To say that one member can do it would be all right. How many do you think it takes to do it?

Mr. TAGGART: A majority of either house.

Mr. CROSSER: How does it come about?

Mr. TAGGART: Just as any other measure brought to the house. A member in the house or in committee proposes an amendment and the house or senate adopts it, and then that branch of the general assembly presents it or proposes that amendment to both houses, and if three-fifths concur it goes to the people. This language is clear and explicit, and is not subject to any trouble if you simply leave it as it is. If you adopt the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Cuyahoga, then any member can propose an amendment to the constitution, and the two houses must act on it.

Methods of Submitting Amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. CROSSER: They do it that way now.

Mr. TAGGART: After one house acts on the amendment proposed by an individual member they do, but not until that house acts on it. This provides that either branch may propose an amendment, but the house must act upon the proposal as suggested, and then it goes to the other house.

Mr. ANDERSON: It is your idea that if the Crosser amendment prevails, then if any member of the house or senate proposes an amendment there must be a joint session to act on it?

Mr. TAGGART: Undoubtedly that would be so.

Mr. ANDERSON: And under the wording of your amendment either the senate or the house would have to act on it before you could have a joint session?

Mr. TAGGART: Certainly, and that is the reason the language is used in the present constitution.

Mr. KING: I think the disturbance arises from the use of the word "propose." Members do not propose amendments to the constitution. The member introduces the resolution. That is all. He simply introduces the resolution. If you would use the word "introduce" as to the action in getting the thing started, you would not have any trouble.

Mr. TAGGART: The member from Erie is undoubtedly right. The member in either the house or the senate introduces the resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution, and then the house or senate acts upon that, and the house or senate proposes the amendment to the two houses, and therefore either branch may propose an amendment, and the language of the present constitution is eminently correct.

Mr. CROSSER: How could the house propose it?

Mr. TAGGART: By its action as an entity. The house of representatives is an entity. It proposes an amendment to both houses.

Mr. CROSSER: Does not the language indicated by Judge King show that the member introduces it?

Mr. TAGGART: The member introduces the resolution—there is no trouble about that.

Mr. DOTY: After the resolution is introduced and acted upon by both houses it then becomes a proposal by the general assembly, does it not?

Mr. TAGGART: The proposal by the general assembly?

Mr. DOTY: Now, does not the language that I offer produce the very result that the member from Erie pointed out, that what the members of the general assembly may do is to propose an amendment to the constitution? What we have done here is in the old constitution, and it says that either branch may do it all alone and yet that has never been done. But it seems to me the language makes it possible.

Mr. KNIGHT: It seems to me the amendment of the delegate from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory] striking out the first three words and leaving it "The general assembly may propose amendments" is one that ought to be adopted. It would be absurd to say that the members of the general assembly should have a right to introduce a resolution or a bill. They have that right anyhow as members. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. Dory] covers the entire ground and removes any doubt.

Mr. COLTON: It seems to me the language here is all right and should remain as it is. Either branch of the general assembly may propose amendments to the constitution. Of course the amendment would be introduced by resolution in that branch and would be acted upon. If it is carried in that branch by a vote of three-fifths that branch proposes it to the other branch and that other branch would have to carry it by three-fifths and then it would be proposed to the people.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would not that be the final action of the general assembly and not the act of one branch?

Mr. COLTON: The final conclusion is an act of the general assembly, but the act of either branch has first to have three-fifths vote in favor of the resolution.

Mr. DOTY: Is that any different from getting up and introducing the resolution? It is only part of the machinery.

Mr. COLTON: It has the three-fifths vote in that branch.

Mr. DOTY: That is the detail of how the act is done. When it is all through, does the general assembly propose something to the people as the member from Franklin has pointed out. It does not go through until acted upon by three-fifths of each body.

Mr. COLTON: Then it is the act of the general assembly.

Mr. DOTY: Proposed to whom? Are we caring whether the senate proposes something to the house or not? This says that either branch may propose amendments to the constitution.

Mr. COLTON: It does not say to the people.

Mr. DOTY: It does not say to the people?

Mr. COLTON: No.

Mr. DOTY: Why not make it clear?

Mr. COLTON: It is to be acted upon by three-fifths of one branch and proposed to the other branch, and when the other branch acts on it by three-fifths then it is proposed to the people.

Mr. ANDERSON: For sixty years this language has stood the test.

Mr. CROSSER: Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes.

Mr. CROSSER: Did not the gentleman stand on the south side of this platform here and lambast everybody connected with the initiative and referendum for having adopted language which stood in the constitution of Oregon for fifteen years?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; and we had to take your Crosser proposal and straighten it out.

Mr. CROSSER: I claim it was not straightened out. I claim it was made crooked.

Mr. ANDERSON: I believe the people who made the constitution in 1851 knew more about what they were doing than the people of Oregon have shown provided this proposal of yours was copied from Oregon.

Now, Mr. President and Gentlemen, this language has stood the test for sixty years. I do not know of any time or place where it has been criticised or questioned. Therefore I move that the Crosser amendment be tabled—no, I move that both of the amendments be tabled.

Methods of Submitting Amendments to the Constitution.

The VICE PRESIDENT: There is only one. The gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. CROSSER] accepted the other.

The amendment was tabled.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: I want to occupy the attention of the Convention for a moment. I think the important thing for this Convention to do, and I believe the proposal accomplishes that, is to make the constitution easily amended, not to make it easy to call a new convention, because I do not think the people of Ohio will be guilty of that offense in the next forty years. I think that is well settled in Ohio, but let us make it easy of amendment. That is my theory about it. It was a mistake in the framers of the constitution of 1851, that they made that constitution too difficult to amend, and we have had to resort to various devices to get it amended. The gentlemen who propose this amendment or this proposal I think have made it quite easy to amend the constitution, and I think if the constitution with this proposal in it is adopted by the people in a very short time they will regard it as the dearest right they have, the ease with which they can amend their constitution. Therefore I heartily agree with the proposal, because it makes it easy to get rid of a bad amendment that may be placed in the constitution. I shall heartily support the proposal as amended by the committee.

Mr. PETTIT: I demand the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question is on the passage of the proposal.

The proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 309—Mr. Taggart. To submit an amendment to article XVI, sections 1, 2 and 3, of the constitution.—Relative to amendments to the constitution.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. Either branch of the general assembly may propose amendments to this constitution; and if the same shall be agreed to by three-fifths of the members elected to each house, such proposed amendments shall be entered on the journals, with the yeas and nays, and shall be published in at least one newspaper in each county of the state, where a newspaper is published, once a week for eight consecutive weeks preceding the election at which time the same shall be submitted to the electors at either a special or general election as the general assembly may prescribe, for their approval or rejection, on a separate ballot without party designation of any kind, and if the majority of the electors voting on the same shall adopt such amendments the same shall become a part of the constitution. When more than one amendment shall be submitted at the same time, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote on each amendment, separately.

SECTION 2. Whenever two-thirds of the members elected to each branch of the general assembly, shall think it necessary to call a convention, to revise, amend, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors to vote on a separate ballot without party designation of any kind at the next election for members to the general assembly, for or against a convention; and if a majority of all the electors, voting for and against the calling of a convention, shall have voted for a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, provide, by law, for calling the same. Candidates for members of the constitutional convention shall be nominated by nominating petitions only and shall be voted for upon one independent and separate ballot without any emblem or party designation whatever. The convention shall consist of as many members as the house of representatives, who shall be chosen as provided by law, and shall meet within three months after their election, for the purpose, aforesaid.

SECTION 3. At the general election, to be held in the year one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two, and in each twentieth year thereafter, the question: "Shall there be a convention to revise, alter or amend the constitution" shall be submitted to the electors of the state; and in case a majority of the electors voting for and against the calling of the convention shall decide in favor of a convention, the general assembly, at its next session, shall provide, by law, for the election of delegates and the assembling of such convention as is provided in the preceding section; but no amendment of this constitution, agreed upon by any convention assembled in pursuance of this article, shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to the electors of the state and adopted by a majority of those voting thereon.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I move we adjourn until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

The motion was carried and the Convention adjourned.

SIXTY-SECOND DAY

MORNING SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, April 24, 1912.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, was called to order by the vice president and opened with prayer by the Rev. John Franklin Grimes, of Columbus, Ohio.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. PARTINGTON: I was called away when the vote on Proposal No. 309 was taken, and I ask the privilege of voting on that proposal.

The member's name was called, and he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I want to introduce a resolution.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolution No. 108:

Resolved, That Resolution No. 90, adopted April 9, 1912, be amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention, when it adjourns on Friday, May 3, 1912, shall adjourn to Monday, May 13, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m. at which time the standing committee on Arrangement and Phraseology shall report upon such matters as shall have been referred to said committee.

Resolved, That the calendar of business for May 13, 1912, and thereafter, shall consist only of proposals for third reading and questions appertaining thereto, and no other business shall be considered except that which shall pertain to the concluding work of the Convention.

Resolved, That this Convention shall adjourn sine die, at 12 o'clock noon, Friday, May 17, 1912.

Resolved, That Resolution No. 90 is hereby rescinded.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I want to say in connection that the other resolution in reference to adjournment was that we adjourn next Friday. We shall not be ready to adjourn next Friday. This fixes the adjournment a week later. I move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution be put on its passage at once.

The motion to suspend the rules was carried.

Mr. KING: I want to call attention to the fact that there was a session provided for on the 9th of May, and that ought to be changed if this resolution is to be adopted.

Mr. DOTY: It will be quite easy to make the arrangement after we have settled the main proposition. We ought to settle that first.

Mr. KING: I have the utmost confidence in the helmsman. I just wanted to remind him there is a rock ahead.

Mr. DOTY: I had already gotten that from the member from Ross [Mr. BAUM].

The VICE PRESIDENT: The Convention might desire to hear from Mr. Baum, of Ross.

Mr. BAUM: Any other day will be satisfactory, but we would like to have it established so that the people will know.

Mr. PETTIT: There will be an interim, and we will have the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology at work. I do not see why this Convention cannot be here as a body. We could save considerable time by going ahead during that entire period without adjournment at all.

Mr. ELSON: I do not see any need for this resolution. I do not see why we should resolve so long ahead when we will adjourn. I do not think we will get through a day or an hour sooner by resolving that we are going to do so and so. As to the ten days' recess for the committee on Phraseology, of course I cannot speak for that committee as a whole, but I do think that it is doing its work right along, and I don't think it will need anything like ten days. It seems to me that we should get rid of all these resolutions and go on and do our work the best we can, and get through with it as soon as we can.

Mr. READ: Adopting this resolution looks to me like child's play. We were elected for a purpose, and that was to revise the constitution of the state of Ohio. We are supposed to stay here until we get that done properly. This Convention ought to have sense enough to know when it is ready to adjourn, and it will not know until it gets all of its work done. This thing of setting a time ahead, and trying to work up to it is going to do an injustice to some of us here. It is unjust to the Convention and to the people. I feel that we do not fully comprehend the responsibility we have here in this place. Our duty is to stay here until we get our work done, and not to set any time, but as everything comes up to give it due consideration. I am bitterly opposed to resolutions setting that time. We know that we will not be through by that time. There are too many important questions to consider. We should stay here and attend to our duties, wait until we are through, and then decide when to adjourn.

Mr. HARBARGER: I join fully in the feeling expressed by Mr. Elson and Mr. Read. It seems to me it is a little premature. I do not like the idea. Repeated resolutions of this kind for adjournment don't settle the adjournment. There are just so many things coming up that we must take action upon and we have to attend to them. I do not see any sense in this resolution and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. JONES: I agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Summit [Mr. READ] and the gentleman from Franklin [Mr. HARBARGER]. The primary purpose for which we are here is to do this work in the best possible manner. What can be gained by a resolution fixing the time that this work must end? Can anybody say that it is going to be completed in a proper manner in a given time? It looks to the outsider as though we were now getting very anxious to quit the job, that we have done enough work for the salary paid us, and that we ought to be getting away as rapidly as possible. Personally, there is nobody here who would like to be through any more than I. It interferes with my personal matters as much as it does with the personal affairs of any member of the Convention, but I do submit that no such considerations should be here involved. If it is being done, it is entirely out of place to be trifling with it. When the Convention gets through with its work it will adjourn, and we can not tell when that will be. Nobody can predict it. I hope this resolution and all others like it will be discountenanced in the future deliberations of this Convention.

Resolution Relative to Adjournment.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I am not very particular about this resolution one way or the other. One such resolution has already been adopted, and now we have to change it. But I want to call the attention of the Convention to the acceptance of an invitation from Chillicothe, and this Convention owes it to Chillicothe, having accepted that invitation, to go down there. If the Convention expects to stand by its acceptance of that invitation, we should arrange for it. I have not any doubt that under proper presentation it might be shown to the people down there that it would be inconvenient, and we could rescind it.

Mr. DOTY: Did you know that the member from Ross [Mr. BAUM] had made that statement?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: No; he didn't. He said it was all right if he knew the day.

Mr. STEVENS: I move to strike out all the resolution except the portion rescinding Resolution No. 90.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: This practically orders the previous question on every matter before us. I can understand when the general assembly is in session, and there are two bodies, why those two bodies should agree on a time to come to an end. I can understand why the governor, who has power to recommend things to the legislature, should have some notice that at a specified time the legislature will adjourn, but we have no such thing as that before us. We are here to work until the work is finished, when we can go home. I hope the resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. BOWDLE: Man may be roughly defined to be an animal which passes resolutions. I have personally in my life passed so many resolutions which I have broken, that I do not want to see this dignified assembly involved in that same specific sin, and I am opposed to this resolution.

Mr. PIERCE: I am opposed to this resolution. I think it is nonsensical. There are only two ways we can get away from here. One way is to put in more hours, and the other is to shorten debates. I believe every member of the Convention will agree with me that every proposal should receive respectful consideration at the hands of the Convention, and there is no use for us to try to adjourn sooner by passing a resolution in this Convention. If we want to get away we should either hold two or three sessions a day and put in more time, or we should limit debate. As a rule, I am not in favor of limiting debate. When we have important matters to dispose of it is essential that they be given proper consideration, but we can, if we will work, get through with all the matters before the Convention, and probably adjourn before a very great while. I would like to adjourn next week as far as I personally am concerned, but at the same time I feel that we owe a duty to ourselves and to the people of the state, and that is to transact the business before us, and finish it in the right kind of a way, and not adjourn until we have done this.

Mr. WINN: We owe a great deal to the state of Ohio, and the greatest duty we owe is to pass two or three more important propositions, adjourn, go home, and leave the state at rest. If we should stay here and keep up this work from now until just one year from now, we would have just as big a calendar as we have now. There never was a session of the general assembly that didn't have more bills in its bill book and more measures framed for a hearing at the time of adjournment than at any other time during the session. It will always be so. There is just one way to get through and that is to agree to fix a time to adjourn, and adjourn at that time. I do not believe there is any occasion for the prolongation of the session another moment than that. I shall vote for the amendment, but I think it will be about as senseless as anything that could be if we would vote down these resolutions altogether, allow the work to go on and adjourn when we get ready. We will never reach that time. There is just one thing that will get us through and get us away from Columbus, and that is hot weather.

Mr. PETTIT: Do you see any necessity of an interim of ten days for the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology?

Mr. WINN: The committee on Arrangement and Phraseology say it is necessary for the committee to take that number of days. I do not like to dispute that assertion.

Mr. PETTIT: Don't you think the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology can be at work while the Convention is in session?

Mr. ELSON: I would like to know whether Mr. Stevens was recognized with his motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion before the Convention is the amendment offered by the delegate from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS].

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend Resolution No. 108 by striking out all except the portion rescinding Resolution No. 90.

Mr. COLTON: Realizing the fact that men can resolve and re-resolve, I am in favor of this resolution. We may not be able to adjourn one week from next Friday, but if not we can adjust ourselves to the situation. All of us have seen that the fixing of the day for adjournment has had an effect on our work. We have done more work each day than we did at any time before. I do not think any measure was slighted either. We have not had any three-hour speeches since that resolution, and the men who have addressed us have confined themselves strictly to the matters before them. If we cannot get through with the work on the day fixed we will have to extend it, but if we pass this resolution to that end we shall accomplish far more than if we leave it indefinite.

As to the work of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology, that committee will undoubtedly need some time after the Convention recesses. If the Convention adjourns Friday it will need some days, and we could not finish in time for the Convention to come back Monday night. Therefore there is no use in calling the Convention back that week. The period of the recess should be the whole week, and I hope the resolution will pass.

Resolution Relative to Adjournment.

Mr. WOODS: It has been my experience, and the experience of everyone who has been in the legislature, that there must be a day set for adjournment. Every legislative body in which I have ever had experience has always fixed a day for adjournment, and has endeavored to work to that day, and it always tends to lessen the length of the session. I corroborate what has already been said, that just at adjournment there are just as many bills on the calendar as at any other time. I didn't introduce this for myself. I can stay here until next January, but there must be an end sometime to this Convention. The proposals have to be given the third reading. We want fully a week's time on third reading.

Mr. READ: I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does he not know that after the calendar committee is appointed in the legislature, then is the time that the most vicious laws are passed in the history of legislation, in the last few days, when they are in a hurry to adjourn?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I think you are mistaken. I remember that I have always moved that no work should be taken up except the bills on the calendar; that they alone can be considered.

Mr. READ: But the history of legislation is different from that.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: That is the gentleman's statement of the history of legislation. I have given my experience.

Mr. READ: Do you think this Convention knows when it wants to adjourn?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: I think it does, and it knows now.

Mr. READ: Does the Convention need some member to dictate to the Convention when it shall adjourn?

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: No, sir; no one wants to dictate, and it doesn't want anyone to dictate how long it shall stay here.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I was opposed to the original resolution fixing May 11 for adjournment, because I never like to vote for anything that I think is buncombe. Since voting against that resolution I have done everything I could to try to carry it out, though I was opposed to the introduction of the resolution and voted against it. I voted against the suspension of the rules to introduce this resolution, but I will vote for this resolution if the gentlemen will help me to demand a yea and nay vote on the previous question hereafter. I am as anxious to get away as anybody, but I do not care to run away from duty. I do not agree with the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN] that if we stay here all summer, we will have just as much business as we have now, because some of us would be going and there wouldn't be as many to introduce business. If we fix a time to adjourn, I don't think it will help business much. A good deal has been said about the general assembly adjourning. I have had four years' experience — four different sessions — and when we reached the time to adjourn in the old time, when I was a member of the general assembly, we lived up to it and carried it out. There may be exceptions now, and it may expedite business. I am in favor of the resolution fixing adjournment, as proposed by the gentleman from Wood [Mr. BEATTY], if he will join me and go on record and agree not to rescind it unless by a majority of all of the Convention.

Mr. JONES: I want to ask the gentleman, by reason of his experience in the legislature, if there is not a very marked difference between the deliberations of this body and of the ordinary legislative body, and a distinctive difference in the amount of work that may come before the bodies?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I will say I think this Convention has, or ought to have, more dignity, and it does seem to me we don't need to indulge in any boy's play to fix the time to adjourn. I don't think it makes such a wonderful difference to fix that time, but it may help a little, and for that reason at this stage of the game — if you are willing to allow me to use that term — I am willing to fix the time on the conditions that I have just stated. In answer to your question, I think there is a difference between this assembly and a legislative body, and there ought to be a difference. We ought to be a more deliberative body, and we ought to complete our work thoroughly, and then go home. I am just as anxious as anybody to go home. I have farming interests that demand my care, too.

Mr. ELSON: I rise to a point of order. The gentleman's time is up and he won't quit.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Williams: I am ready to quit and vote for the resolution.

Mr. PECK: I offer a substitute for the pending resolution and amendments which I think may furnish a solution to this question:

The substitute was read as follows:

Resolved, That no further proposals shall be received after Monday, April 29, but thereafter the Convention shall proceed to dispose of all pending proposals and adjourn as soon as that is done.

Mr. PECK: I think this is the way to get through with the business, to fix a limit. I don't care whether you fix the date that I have named or some other date, but to fix a limit beyond which no proposals shall be received, and then go to work and draw up everything, and then you are done. It seems to me that is a practicable and reasonable mode of getting along. This thing of fixing a date two or three weeks in the future to adjourn seems impracticable. It is derived from legislative practice. The legislature has no definite work. It can adjourn whenever it wants to. We are here for a definite job, and we have to do that. The general assembly has no definite job. It meets to make general laws on any and every subject under the sun.

It is true that proposals will continue to come in unless we limit the time when we receive them. I believe that all the proposals that are of real value, and that ought to be adopted to amend this constitution, are before the Convention. I do not anticipate that there will be any coming in later of much value, but I think if we fix a time when no more will be received and then go to work and clean up the calendar we are through.

Mr. LAMPSON: You mean by "received," reported to the Convention?

Resolution Relative to Adjournment.

Mr. PECK: No; I mean introduced in the Convention by the members.

Mr. NYE: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: It does seem to me that this amendment ought not to pass. There are some amendments which ought to be made to the constitution we now have to make it conform to the amendments that we have adopted and that will be proposed and submitted to the people. To illustrate, the terms of the different officers of the state have to be gone over and fixed and changed in the main body of the constitution. The names of the circuit courts, if the judiciary proposal is adopted, should be changed to the courts of appeals, and there is quite a number of formal matters that ought to be changed in the old constitution to make it conform to the new, and these proposals can not be presented until this Convention has passed upon them and we know what the amendments are to be that are to be submitted to the people. So I do not think we should pass the resolution that no other proposals should be introduced after a certain date, because it cannot be done until we know what they have to be.

Mr. ANDERSON: If you would put in a substitute "except by unanimous consent," would not that remedy what you suggest?

Mr. NYE: Hardly that. Somebody might object.

Mr. PECK: Everything of the kind will be provided for by the schedule of the constitution, and it will be provided for by provisions in the schedule.

Mr. NYE: I don't think they will. The words "circuit court" occur in a good many places in the constitution that have not been amended.

Mr. PECK: Well, can't the committee on Phraseology attend to that?

Mr. NYE: It is fixed in your proposal, but not in the other.

Mr. PECK: It is within the province of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology to make the phraseology of the constitution consistent throughout.

Mr. DOTY: No.

Mr. NYE: As I understand, we have a right to fix the phraseology of any amendment that is passed by this Convention, but the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology has no right to fix the phraseology of other sections of the constitution, at least not before receiving instructions from this Convention.

Mr. PECK: I submit that their jurisdiction is not so limited as you think. Their jurisdiction extends to the whole constitution, to make it all consistent.

Mr. NYE: If that is understood, all right.

Mr. PECK: Then it comes back for final adoption to this body. The committee on Arrangement and Phraseology has not the final say. This body has the final say.

Mr. NYE: If the gentleman will bear with me a moment, he will see by going through the judiciary proposal that there are a number of sections where the circuit court is spoken of. It seems to me that if we are to have a constitution that is uniform that these sections ought to be changed so as to have it read "the courts of appeals," as provided for by the Judiciary committee. There are other places where the terms of the various judges of the courts are fixed, and they are fixed at different numbers of years from those fixed in the judiciary proposal, and this ought to be changed. I do not want to have any resolution that goes into the merits of the constitution after a certain date, but we should be open to offer amendments of this character.

Mr. STEVENS: The Convention is at the present time considering Resolution No. 90, which provides for temporary adjournment on the 26th, and a sine die adjournment on some other day. The objection I have to the substitute of the member from Cincinnati [Mr. PECK] is that it does not get away from Resolution No. 90, and even if his substitute is adopted we are still under Resolution No. 90. The only sensible thing is to pass my amendment. That will then clear the slate. Then I would be in favor of some such proposition as the member from Cincinnati suggests to stop incoming business. But I think we should rescind Resolution No. 90. My amendment is simply to strike out everything of this present resolution except the rescinding clause.

Mr. KNIGHT: Provision should be made for the introduction of proposals made necessary when the work of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology is brought in. I do not agree that that committee has a right to change a single word in a single section of the constitution outside of what has been adopted in this Convention. It is fairly apparent from an investigation by some of us already that it will be necessary when we bring in our report to suggest to the Convention the necessity of some modifications in other parts of the constitution, because it is clear that in one or two instances there are inconsistencies between what we have done and other parts of the constitution. If the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] would modify his resolution to allow the work suggested by the report of the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology to come in, that would cover it and be satisfactory.

Mr. PECK: What is the use of a Phraseology committee if you can't change a verbal mistake?

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not talking about any verbal mistakes in what we have done, but in other parts of the constitution, made necessary by what we have done, and I do not think we have a right to change a single word or a single line in any other part of the constitution, except what has been passed by this Convention and submitted to us.

Mr. DWYER: Do you not on final ratification adopt those changes, and why can't you make the changes to cover things that are necessary because of what we have done?

Mr. KNIGHT: We simply haven't any authority.

Mr. PECK: You report back here, and the Convention will authorize it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I just want to call the attention of the Convention to the fact that we have wasted one hour in this discussion of this question. I take the liberty of suggesting that Judge Peck accept the Stevens' amendment.

Mr. PECK: That is just what I am going to do.

Mr. TETLOW: I move the previous question.

Mr. PECK: Before that is done I want to offer an amendment to my own resolution.

The amendment was read as follows:

Amend the amendment by Mr. Peck to Resolution No. 108 as follows:

Resolution Relative to Adjournment.

Add at the end of resolution "Resolved that Resolution No. 90 is hereby rescinded."

Mr. DOTY: I want to call attention to the one fact you have overlooked. The member from Hamilton [Mr. PECK] and many other members seem to think that the prolongation of this Convention will come entirely from the introduction of proposals. Perfectly preposterous! That is not where the trouble is. There are enough proposals before us now to keep us here until next Christmas. There are many members who think we have a definite time-clock job, to come here at ten o'clock, ring up our time work till lunch time and then work three hours in the afternoon and we have done a day's work. We never will get through with this feeling. There is always going to be something else. It occurs to me that since we have passed a resolution to adjourn this week on Friday we have been doing a remarkably large amount of work, and that with the matters on the calendar and a few things that are yet to be reported the work can be concluded by one week from Friday with as much decorum and as much attention to business as we gave to our work yesterday; and who can say that we did not give every proposal before us proper consideration and that without the previous question too? And we can keep that up.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do I understand you to say we can clean up the calendar if we work until Christmas?

Mr. DOTY: Nothing like that. Do you want what I said?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: No; I want to ask another question.

Mr. DOTY: All right then, if you don't want me to tell you.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have referred to the word "calendar" and I want to ask a question about that. How does it happen that in the arrangement of the calendar the report from your standing committee, which was presented to the Convention and agreed to after the report from my committee, appears on the calendar before mine?

Mr. DOTY: If the member will look up the rule he will find out why.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Does the gentleman refer to the rules that he makes as he goes along or to the standing rules of the Convention?

Mr. DOTY: If the member means to insinuate that I have been "hokuspokusing" the rules I want to deny it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You were referring to the rules. I am referring to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The Convention will be in order.

Mr. DOTY: I don't know what that has to do with the question, but it appears that the member from Ashtabula is trying to insinuate that something has been done with proposals that have gotten ahead of his. If he will look up the rules himself he would not have to ask such foolish questions.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I admit your rules are foolish.

Mr. TETLOW: I want to get through with this work and I don't want to hear all of these useless questions. I desire to press the motion for the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The debate is closed—

Mr. DOTY: I demand a roll call on the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT: What was done with the amendment offered by the delegate from Tuscarawas [Mr. STEVENS]?

Mr. STEVENS: If I understand correctly the member from Cincinnati [Mr. PECK] has incorporated my amendment in his and I withdraw mine.

The VICE PRESIDENT: If that is agreeable the vote will then go upon the amendment offered by the member from Cincinnati [Mr. PECK], including the amendment of the gentleman from Tuscarawas.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is one word that is omitted I think in that resolution of Judge Peck. It was understood that no new proposal should be introduced.

Mr. PECK: That is the understanding of what this means.

Mr. WATSON: I move that that amendment be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The gentleman is out of order. The vote is on the amendment.

Mr. PECK: I hope the gentlemen who have gotten on the water wagon will stay there and not change this resolution next week.

SECOND READING OF PROPOSALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The business in order is Proposal No. 169.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: As chairman of the committee which had this in charge I wish to announce that it is a unanimous report. Our committee has not been a busy one. We have taken care of about all the business placed before us and this is the most important matter that was before us. We are glad to offer a unanimous report and we are sorry that Judge Worthington is not here in person to advocate this proposal. We feel that it is one of the most important that has come before the Convention and trust it will be unanimously adopted, as it was by the committee.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am sure we all regret the absence of Judge Worthington, who is very much interested in this proposal. I think there is no doubt it is a matter we shall all agree without much debate, to place in the constitution. At present the merit system applied under the civil service in municipalities depends upon a mere legislative enactment which can be repealed at any time. The day in this country has passed when there is any question as to the entire necessity of this in all public service. The object of this proposal is simply to place this state in line with other states in the Union and to extend the merit system of appointment and promotion—civil service in state, county and city—for merit and fitness alone. It is obvious that in each and every instance, on account of a variety of services, we can not apply this to all the heads of the state—in other words, not all can be made to come under the civil service. Therefore, the provision that “so far as practicable” appointments shall be made upon the basis of civil service. There are certain kinds of offices where it is impossible to require it to be used, and to require the impossible is never expected. This goes as far as any constitution can wisely go. It is a thing that can not be self-operating. It must require statutory enactments to carry it into effect. Therefore, the provision in the latter part of the clause which makes it the duty of the legislature to carry it into effect. I think the proposal should receive as substantial a vote as the other proposal of Judge Worthington, which was the first measure passed by a unanimous vote.

Mr. READ: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: When I was considering the proposals that would be the most important for the service of the state the civil service proposal was the first thing I thought of. I had prepared such a proposal in connection with another one, but because others were offered I withdrew mine. I want to say to this Convention—and I only intend to say a word, but what I do say I shall speak from personal experience in civil service—I consider this one of the most important proposals that can be presented for the good of the commonwealth of Ohio. Those who have been in the civil service and who have had experience, know that appointments are made, not upon merit, but on account of political preference, I care not who is holding the position as governor.

Mr. MILLER, of Crawford: I rise to a point of order. We can not hear, there is so much disorder.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The sergeant at arms will please maintain order.

Mr. READ: When a young minister once asked Henry Ward Beecher what he did when his hearers went to sleep Henry Ward Beecher said: “Whenever I hear of a congregation going to sleep, I instruct the man in charge of the church to go wake up the preacher.”

I hope this matter will be carried unanimously. I would like to see the Convention give its unanimous indorsement to a proposition of this kind. I would like to see the civil service conducted upon merit so that the persons appointed to positions will be appointed because they are capable of filling the positions to which they are appointed and not because they are political henchmen. That has been the case heretofore, and I know it.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not a fact that frequently a political henchman gets the men their positions, even when the examination is conducted?

Mr. READ: It should not be so. If the examination is properly conducted it would not be so. But now there is no recourse on that point and those who can do the best political work are appointed instead of those who can do the best for the service of the state. They do not concern themselves very much about the service to the state or the good of the commonwealth. I am glad there is such a proposition as this before the Convention and I hope it will be carried unanimously.

Civil Service.

Mr. FARRELL: I would like to ask a question. Can you imagine any plan or theory that the legislature could adopt for providing for putting men into office into which the question of politics would not necessarily enter?

Mr. READ: If other things are equal there would not be any objection.

Mr. FARRELL: But can you imagine a bill the legislature could pass that would eliminate this evil complained of?

Mr. READ: A bill might not, but if it were properly carried out it would. The merit of this proposal strikes me as being so great that extended discussion is not necessary. This is a blow at the spoils system which has been such a great evil in the national government and, at present is an evil in our state government. It may not be effective to entirely remove that evil, but it is a step in the right direction, and I think we should vote for it unanimously. We paid Judge Worthington the compliment that we were glad to pay him on his former proposal, but we don't have to do that on this. The merit of the proposal should commend itself to every one and secure for the proposal our unanimous support.

Mr. PECK: If you want to weaken the power of the political boss over the state, this is the bill to do it. If a man is appointed to office by reason of his merits, as shown by an examination under civil service, he is not under any political obligation to anybody. He is more likely to do his duty in that office and not be running about the state fixing up political matters, as many of our prominent officers are doing today. We want a clean, honest political service, and there is no trouble about administering it. It is being administered by the United States government all through the country. It is being administered right now in Cincinnati in a large way. All the minor officers are being appointed under the civil service rule. The board examines applicants daily and these examinations are not simply school examinations on arithmetic and geography and clerical work; they include all that the man has had. That comes early in the examination and counts for more than anything else, his general fitness for that sort of work. It includes a great many things not included in the ordinary examination. It is working and is satisfactory to everybody, and is slowly but surely eliminating the power of the political boss. That is one of the reforms the people of Cincinnati voted for at the recent election and that they have accomplished. It is one that is going on all over the United States. It is in line with what we have been doing in this Convention and ought by all means to be adopted. I would regard it as a calamity if this proposal were defeated.

Mr. TANNEHILL: I will support this bill, but civil service as it is administered now is usually a big farce. In my county they had civil service examinations for census enumerators and it is a remarkable fact that every applicant from one political party failed and they were all appointed from the other political party.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: There is but one question in this proposal: Are you in favor of or are you opposed to civil service? There is no escape from that proposition, no matter how you may attempt to hide your real position. We know that the efficacy of any law depends to a great extent upon the ability and the sincerity of those who have to execute it. We know that all men are not perfect and in any great measure of this kind there will be failures of enforcement by some people.

Bear in mind that civil service is not a plant of recent growth. It has a history of nearly forty years in the United States, but there is always a certain opposition to the setting aside of any old established rule of gentlemen, and we can readily imagine what the determined opposition would be to civil service when we remember that for seventy years preceding the adoption of the civil service the exact opposite had been accepted by all departments of this government, that to the victor belonged the spoils. For fifty years that was the cardinal principle of both political parties of the United States, but that doctrine has gone and no one in any community dare recommend it longer.

We recognize there are the particular instances of nonenforcement that has been recognized by Mr. Tannehill and others, that the individual charged with the carrying out of the law may not be in sympathy with it, and therefore he will carry out the law only so far as he feels he is compelled to do so by the statute. But it is not the exception that must be regarded. It is the general rule or proposition that all of you are familiar with. We know that politicians in the narrow sense, politicians for spoils only, dread nothing so much as civil service carried out in spirit instead of letter. It means the elimination of the political boss. It is only a question of time when you will practically completely destroy him. Given civil service and the initiative and referendum, and in one generation I venture to say the political boss will be as rare a creature in the United States as he is in England, France and Germany.

Now I want to call your attention to this fact, and it also appeals strongly to the labor delegates in this Convention: In the many requirements of employment in municipalities the far greater number of employments is in manual labor, as I would term it, and every civil service commission that is one in fact as well as name and that honestly carries out the spirit of the civil service, looks at the man's practical knowledge. We will need fifty horseshoers in the city of Cincinnati, and we examine men primarily as to their knowledge of horseshoeing, whether they are practical mechanics. The practical mechanic starts in with seventy-five per cent to his credit and the remaining examination is devoted to what he should know of ordinary knowledge. It is of great value to the ordinary labor man that a civil service law should be carried out in spirit and not in letter. Of course, there are instances of abuses. Every city has them. We have had that in Cincinnati. There is a fight always to overcome the abuse, but as soon as any place has had one year of the operation of a civil service law there is no power that can take it away, and this proposal is simply applying to the state the same principle that you demand for the municipality. If we adopt this, if it is ratified and becomes a law of the state, it will take time to get it to working properly. You can not expect it to be in full force and effect next year or the year after. It may take five or ten years, but after that you will hear no more of great political machines in the state controlling conventions and nominations.

Civil Service.

Mr. PETTIT: I am in hearty accord with a civil service law if it were ever carried out. I think a better name for it would be snivel service. Judge Peck says it has been carried out in the United States government for years. What do we see in regard to the rural route carriers of the state of Ohio or any other state? How many of them are democrats?

Mr. LAMPSON: Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. PETTIT: Not now.

Mr. LAMPSON: Do you think the question of whether a man is a democrat or not—

Mr. PETTIT: I said I didn't yield. I say a democrat has as much sense in an examination as a republican, but he doesn't stand any more show to be appointed a rural route carrier or a census enumerator than a snowball in the lower regions. They announce down in our county that they will have an examination for rural carriers. The democrats go up there and take an examination, but they don't get the route and they don't even get appointed "sub." In Maysville Mr. Kehoe was a democratic congressman and he worked some democrats in, but they got rid of every one of them in a very short time. Not one could carry a route. It is all nonsense, talking of this law's being carried out. Grover Cleveland set an example when he appointed a board of examiners and he gave the republicans representation, but when he went out of office, did the republicans keep it up? Not for a minute. They didn't in our county. Talk about getting rid of the bosses! You won't do it by civil service, and I am opposed to the whole theory.

Mr. KERR: I have one particular friend who has the duty of going about to ascertain whether the civil service regulations are respected or not, and he says it is marvelous the number of people who are trying to violate the letter of the law, but I think that if you believe what has been said here the modern methods in politics ought to be corrected, and that they can be corrected very largely by this measure if the people will get back of it. The fault is not the law, but the looseness of the people under the law in the process of enforcing the law. But this Convention has put itself on record on so many modern reforms that it seems to me it would be fatal for us to adjourn without giving this proposal a very substantial vote. I should like to see it receive a unanimous vote, not simply because it was brought in by our much respected friend, who is absent by enforced necessity, but because it represents one of the most modern things that we are today thinking about along the lines of the betterment of government. I hope that this Convention will put itself on record in reducing the evils of the spoils system, and go as far as possible in making merit absolutely the essential in choosing servants of the government. As Mr. Watson and others have said, it has been a farce in some places, but that is because public opinion has not been sufficiently aroused. We can certainly arouse it and make it effective, and I hope we shall adopt the proposal unanimously.

Mr. STEVENS: In view of the fact that everybody up here seems to be in favor of the proposal, and nobody is against it, I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered.

The vice president resumed the chair.

Proposal No. 169 — Mr. Worthington. To submit an amendment to article XV, of the constitution. — Relative to the civil service.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE XV.

SECTION 10. Appointments and promotions in the civil service of the state, the several counties and cities, shall be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained as far as practicable by competitive examinations. And it shall be the duty of the general assembly to enact laws providing for the enforcement hereof.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. WATSON: I move that we recess until 1:30.

Mr. DOTY: Wait a minute.

The motion to recess was lost.

Mr. DWYER: Mr. President —

DELEGATES: Regular order.

Mr. DOTY: This is the regular order.

Removal of Officials.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The special committee of which Judge Dwyer was chairman had authority to report at any time, and this is the regular order.

The report was read as follows:

The select committee to which was referred Proposal No. 241—Mr. Dwyer, having had the same under consideration, reports it back and recommends the passage of the following substitute for the proposal and all amendments thereto:

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

Laws shall be passed providing for the prompt removal, upon complaint and hearing, of all officers, including state officers, judges and members of the general assembly, for any misconduct involving moral turpitude or for other cause provided by law; and this method of removal shall be in addition to impeachment or other method of removal provided.

Mr. DWYER: Mr. President and Gentlemen: In presenting my views on the proposition pending I realize that I am addressing gentlemen of eminence in the legal profession, gentlemen who have acquired distinction, as judges on the bench, as ministers of the gospel, as professors of learning, as members of the medical profession, in business affairs and in agricultural life; in fact, it would be difficult to collect a more representative body of men than are the members of this Convention. This being so, I shall not engage in any hustings oratory, for that would be out of place.

Much has been said in argument, both in praise and in blame of our courts, on which, by your indulgence, I shall briefly comment. Under our system of government, both state and federal, with written constitutions, the landmarks of jurisprudence by which our courts have to be guided are distinctly defined.

Under the federal constitution the courts must look to see what powers are expressly granted, for beyond the power expressly granted they cannot pass.

Under our state constitution the courts have only to look, when considering the subject matter before them arising under it, to see whether the power is denied or limited.

The constitution being the organic or fundamental law, all laws passed by the legislature, to be valid, must harmonize with its provisions. What authority is to determine this matter? Notably the courts. Legislatures are comprised of politicians, sent to carry out party policies. There is usually a majority in each house of one political party, actuated by party motives, and seeking party advantages. Take the redistricting of the state for congress. It is usually what is known as a gerrymander for party advantage. Take the apportionment of the state for members of the house and senate, and we have the same results. Whenever it is possible to obtain party advantage the majority party in the legislature is prepared for it, and in so doing it has very little regard for constitutional inhibition. For years a notable succession of gross violations of the constitution were enacted into laws which, for a long period, unfortunately, were held to be constitutional by the supreme court. I have reference to the laws growing out of the decisions of the supreme court in the Cincinnati Southern Railroad case. In that case, the legislature, having passed a law authorizing a city of the first class—having a population of over 150,000 population—to construct a railway, one terminal to be in said city, it was of necessity held to be constitutional. At that time Cincinnati wanted a railroad to reach the coal, iron and other minerals and timber of Kentucky and Tennessee for its factories, and the trade of the South for its merchants. Therefore, the law was passed. Under it the city had proceeded to build the road, it had made its contracts and it had issued its bonds and sold them, and they were in the hands of innocent purchasers. When the case as to the constitutionality of the law reached the supreme court the matter had gone so far that the status quo could not be restored, and great loss to innocent parties would result if the law were held unconstitutional. The supreme court, in the case of Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 O. S., held the law to be a law of a general nature and constitutional. It was a decision of necessity. But this decision was the opening of the Pandora box that let loose upon the state a flood of legislative evils to which I have referred. From that time for many years almost one-third of the session laws passed by the legislature were about as follows: "That in counties by the federal census of 1890 which had a population of not less than 21,720 and not more than 21,730, the county commissioners' reports shall be printed in folding circulars (a job for some printer)." "In counties having a population of not less than 40,480 and not more than 40,500 at the last federal census, the court of common pleas shall appoint an official stenographer (a job for some stenographer)." So matters went on, in utter disregard of the constitution. Cities were by law authorized to be divided into wards. The governor or some common pleas judge or somebody in line with the scheme was to appoint a partisan commission as authority to do the work. All this afforded fine opportunity for political bosses and they took full advantage of it, as the session laws of the legislature show. It was not the voice of the people, but that of the political bosses, through their tools in the legislature, that prevailed. Talk to me of trusting the legislature with all of this experience before us!

The supreme court first criticised this evil in one or two of its decisions, but in the case of the Cincinnati Hospital, 66 O. S., 444, it stamped it out forever. The judge who rendered that decision, Judge Schauk, is still on the bench of the supreme court, and to him more than to any other of the judges of that court is the credit due of putting the stamp of judicial condemnation on that nefarious kind of legislation. That the judges of the supreme court, as well as of all the other courts, are as free from bias in their decisions and as clean in their official and private life as any other class of men I claim to be true. Take the ministry. Don't we read every little while of the intolerance and misconduct of some of them? Yet who would denounce the entire body of the Christian ministry for the faults of the few? The medical profession is comprised in the main of honorable men; yet there are some who are unworthy, and this should be no condemnation of the entire body. And what I claim as true of the American courts is equally true of the courts of Great Britain. Much of the protection of law thrown around Englishmen in their country has been the work of English judges. The reasonable doubt and the presumption of innocence in cases of crime, are the invention of the English judges in favor of the accused. And all the recent reforms in English legal procedure have been in the main the work of the English judges. On this floor the main criticism of the judges to which I have listened is that they lean in their decisions in favor of the interests. I hope that this criticism is much exaggerated. I trust we will consider the subject in the light of absolute fair play.

Seventy years ago, before the days of railroads and of machinery in factories, there was very little capital employed in business, not more than five or ten thousand dollars in any one enterprise, and encouragement had to be offered to people to induce them to go into business. Consequently the necessity for laws to protect human life and limb and health in this day of giant enterprises did not then exist. Such laws would then prevent people with their small means from embarking in business as one accident would bankrupt many of them. The doctrine of the fellow-servant and contributory negligence and assumed risk are relics of those days, but have outgrown their usefulness. If the proposals to amend the constitution which have been reported by the Labor committee, and to which I have given my full approval, are adopted by this body and ratified by the people hereafter at the polls, there will be no trouble with the courts. I would rather trust the courts any time than a lot of politicians in the legislature, who in every move they make are only looking to political advantage. So much for the courts.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer is under the painful necessity of reminding the gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. DWYER: I thought a member who makes a report is entitled to more time under the rules.

Mr. HALFHILL: It makes no difference how much time he is entitled to, I move that Judge Dwyer's time be extended until he finishes his address.

The motion was carried.

Mr. DWYER: I will now briefly consider the question of impeachment of judges for misconduct. Both Senator Burton and ex-Senator Foraker, in discussing the recall, said that they objected expressly to the recall as to judges, and so do I. They suggested that the attorney general prefer the charges of impeachment, but did not seem to know how to work the matter out. One of them suggested a commission to be appointed by the governor to try the charges in such cases. The special committee's plan is prompt and efficient. I trust what is done in this matter will be in such a way as comports with the dignity of the great state of Ohio. To me the position of a judge—to sit in judgment between man and man, in their controversies, as the representative of justice—is the highest office on earth. The other branches of government, being political, may become corrupt, but the judiciary should never.

On motion of Mr. Brown, of Lucas, the Convention recessed until 1:30 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to recess and was called to order by the vice president.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The business before the Convention is the report of the committee, of which Judge Dwyer was chairman. What shall be done with that report?

Mr. HALFHILL: Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention: It seems to me, after the discussion of the original report, that the Convention acted wisely in referring this to a special committee, which has just reported. This report which is now before us looks as much like organic law as anything that has been before us for consideration. I am very much in favor of this report, because it agrees in substance with the feeling that a number of us have expressed here, that it would be much better to vest in some tribunal in Ohio the right to inquire into shortcomings of officials, and especially judges of courts, than it would be to adopt a "recall" proposal, which we fortunately killed yesterday, for this proposal now provides a way by which you can proceed in an orderly fashion, or enables the legislature to provide a way to proceed in an orderly fashion, and bring any offending officer promptly to book. Hence I am heartily in favor of this report, and I think that the very able address made by Judge Dwyer in presenting the same ought to recommend it to the Convention. He said some things in that address that are worth remembering by all of the members of this Convention. He referred to the case of Walker vs. Cincinnati, 21 O. S., in which the supreme court by force of circumstances rendered a decision which set in motion a great train of evils in Ohio. He also showed by the later decisions how the supreme court did assist the state of Ohio to recover from that; but there is one case which he did not mention, and I would like to refer to it. Starting in with 21 O. S., Walker vs. Cincinnati, where power was conferred upon the municipality to construct a railroad, you will find on examination of the reports that we never got away from the bad doctrine in that case until the report 38 O. S., Counterman vs. Dublin Township. I am particularly interested in Dublin township, Mercer county, for I was born there. They passed a law through the state legislature providing that a railroad six miles in length might be built by a township, and it was one of a series of acts of that kind providing a tax levy for such purpose by popular vote at the polls. At that particular time $20,000 of bonds on the township was a great burden. The roads were not built and the ditches were not yet constructed. For myself, I helped earn the money by hard labor on the railroad for our share of the expense fund that hired a distinguished lawyer from my present city, who took that case to the supreme court, and the law was declared unconstitutional under which a tax of $20,000 had been voted and levied on the property of Dublin township.

Now the point I want to make is that both of the lower courts held that kind of legislation constitutional, and it took the supreme court in that particular case of Counterman vs. Dublin Township to wipe out the most vicious kind of legislation that the state of Ohio has ever seen.

Removal of Officials.

Mr. LAMPSON: I am a little curious to know whether it was the holding of the law unconstitutional or your labor on the railroad that broke up the railroad?

Mr. HALFHILL: I presume the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. LAMPSON] thinks I am like himself, one who toils not and spins not, but I assure him that I did do honest, hard work on that railroad.

Mr. LAMPSON: My work is always constitutional.

Mr. HALFHILL: These are a very interesting series of statutes, and they were brought to my renewed attention today by the citation by Judge Dwyer. I hadn't thought of that case of Counterman vs. Dublin Township for a long time, but if you will examine Walker vs. Cincinnati, and trace its subsequent effects you will find that along in the eighties, or possibly in the latter part of the seventies, the legislature of Ohio passed much of that sort of special legislation, and it was the special interests of the state of Ohio that got those laws enacted. The supreme court in that instance was helping to relieve every foot of land in the state of Ohio from unjust taxation, for every foot and every acre of land and all personal property in the state of Ohio was laid under tribute by such laws. This has only been supplemental to the able argument in support of the proposition of Judge Dwyer that the courts of Ohio have protected the interests of the people of Ohio. I think this report of the special committee ought to be adopted, and I am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. ANDERSON: I may be mistaken, but it seems to me this is awkwardly worded: "Laws shall be passed providing for the prompt removal upon complaint and hearing of all officers," etc. You will notice that they are to be removed upon complaint and hearing. It seems to me that somewhere in there ought to be put "and a finding of guilty".

Mr. LAMPSON: May I ask a question? Would it not improve it a little to say "prompt removal from office"?

Mr. WATSON: I offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Has the gentleman from Mahoning yielded the floor?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; I am very much in favor of the proposal if it is properly worded. It has been called the recall. It is not a recall at all. A recall is never based upon a hearing of the person sought to be recalled. It is never predicated upon a finding of guilty of the person sought to be recalled. A recall simply provided that if anyone has within his mind anything that would cause him to vote against the person sought to be recalled, that is a valid reason for a removal from office, so that this proposal does not sound in recall at all.

Much has been said in defense of the supreme court. One member even took the opportunity to refer to his boyhood days when he earned an honest dollar by the sweat of his face, and he used that to bring a case which the supreme court decided properly years and years ago; and he has remembered it in all these years because it was a proper decision. It seems that every opportunity is being taken here to hark back to some things that were said in reference to the supreme court, but the gentleman, harking back purposely or otherwise, mistakes what was then said.

There is no corruption of a court that I have ever known of. I have tried as many cases before judges as any member of the Convention. I was never conscious of any corruption on the part of a court. I was never conscious that it existed, but I do want to guard against judge-made law, and I have no apology to make to any of the defenders of the supreme court, or anybody else on that subject; but I would suggest that this proposal be worded so that it carry at least a clearer meaning of the thing we intend to do.

Mr. WATSON: I offer an amendment.

Mr. DOTY: The simple way out of this is to adopt the report of the committee, and then you have the report before you and it can be easily amended. If the report is adopted you have the report before you, and different amendments can come in as usual. I only want to give you a suggestion of the easy way.

Mr. WATSON: I withdraw my amendment temporarily.

Mr. EARNHART: I am opposed to this whole proposition. It looks like an ingenious subterfuge. My friend from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] who is a fair fighter all the time, has accentuated that declaration. I look upon this as a subterfuge and not intended to be a corrective agency. The tribunal having the jurisdiction will be a court, and it cannot be expected to and it will not do anything in disregard of the wishes of its creator. I think we should not take any action at all on this matter, rather than make what seems obvious will be an ineffectual attempt. We well know — and I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Cincinnati, who spoke so eloquently a day or two ago against the recall, to just a word or two. He will remember, as we all do, that because the people could not obtain evenhanded justice the court house at Cincinnati was burned by a mob. Later on, just recently, fresh in the minds of all of us, a man down there who practically owned the courts, compelled those courts in a manner to forego prosecutions of himself. The man's name is George B. Cox, and he belongs in the penitentiary today, and you all know it. What are you going to do in an instance of that kind? We see it all over the land. A poor fellow steals thirty-five dollars' worth of something, and he is sure to go to the penitentiary. A man can steal a million, and they pat him on the back, and he comes out scot free. This is a dangerous condition and the conditions are growing worse as time goes on. There must be something changed or there will be trouble and we will have revolution. The people are long-suffering and patient, but there comes a time when endurance ceases to be a virtue, and the people will take the matter into their own hands. Then you will have effective corrective agencies, but the self-constituted tribunals are but mockeries, and I hope that this subterfuge will not pass, and that we shall have a free and open field. It is not an improvement over the present system. Leave a free, open field. When the time comes that the people want the recall, and that will be very soon, leave them free and open to take the matter into their own hands. I have faith in the intelligence of the people of the great state of Ohio. They will meet the situation and solve the problem intelligently and effectually.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am of the opinion of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. Doty]. I think that is entirely a proper course to take to decide what we will do with the report of the committee, and if I could outline what we would do, we would put the matter over a day or two and have the report printed. The member from Allen [Mr. HALFHILL] has given it as his opinion that this ought to go into the constitution. This may be proper, but every member should have this printed and be able to look at it. I think we need that to properly act on the question of accepting or refusing to accept the report of the committee.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: As a member of the committee which drafted this proposal, I wish to say to the Convention that the question now before us is upon agreeing to the report of the committee. That does not in any way bind any member of the Convention. We want to get the committee's report agreed to, and then there are two formal amendments, which we would like to have adopted if possible, one by the member from Franklin county [Mr. KNIGHT] clearing up the title, and another one which I have before me. Then, if it is entirely agreeable to all of us, have it printed and made a special order for any time that the Convention sees fit.

Mr. MAUCK: If we adopt this we have supplanted the Dwyer proposal, which I very much approved.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: That is correct. This supplants that.

Mr. MAUCK: Why not take up the special report, and let the pending question be on the substitution of that report for the other measure?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Judge Dwyer was a member of the select committee which drafted this, and Judge Peck was a member of it, and they both recommend this substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer is anxious that the Convention be not confused on the effect of this vote. This is a report of the select committee, reported to us, and the question is on accepting that report. If it is accepted, this is not adopted, but simply to be presented in regular form as a proposal subject to any amendment that may be offered to it.

Mr. DOTY: Is not that the proposal, and would it not be up for second reading?

The report was agreed to.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have a formal amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In the title strike out the words "Section 23" and at the beginning of the line immediately following the resolving clause, insert "Section 24a."

Mr. KNIGHT: The proposal as it went to the committee distinctly provided for an amendment to article II, section 23, and that contains all of the article in the constitution on impeachment. If we accept this, we have by inference stricken out of the constitution what is now provided there on the subject of impeachment. I therefore offer the amendment making a new section, 24a, to correct that. It will be inserted in the proper place.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

"In line 4 after the word 'removal' insert 'from office'."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I cannot refrain from endeavoring to find out exactly what this matter means. I move that the substitute and amendments be printed, and that the whole question be deferred.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion to print has not been seconded. I recognize the member from Lucas.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: This is formal matter. What we desire is to get the proposal clearly before the body, and then have it printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am willing to defer until this is done.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: This clears up the matter, and the proposal is now ready to take its regular course.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Guernsey [Mr. WATSON] is recognized.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I now renew my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The gentleman from Guernsey has the floor.

Mr. WATSON: I will defer.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Where do you want this matter put?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I move that it be postponed until tomorrow.

Mr. DOTY: The proper motion is to postpone until tomorrow, and place it at the head of the calendar, and that in the meantime it be printed.

The motion was carried.

Mr. JONES: Mr. President—

Mr. DOTY: Regular order.

Mr. JONES: I would like the opportunity to introduce a proposal.

Mr. DOTY: The regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT: There is objection to making any change from the regular order.

Mr. JONES: I want to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a proposal. I ask this favor because I am informed by the chairman of the committee to whom the proposal will be referred that they will have no further meeting this week, but will have a meeting next week, and in order that the matter may get into the hands of the committee, which it would not do if not introduced until Monday night, I would like to suspend the rules for the purpose of having it introduced.

Mr. DOTY: Personally, I have not the slightest objection, Mr. Jones—

The VICE PRESIDENT: A motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The motion to suspend the rules was lost, the vote being 49 in the affirmative and 29 in the negative.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The motion is lost, as it requires a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules. The regular order now is Proposal No. 72, which the secretary will read.

Proposal No. 72 was read the second time.

Mr. HOSKINS: I want to discuss this proposal at the request of the author, Mr. Stokes, and not upon my own initiative, as under the ordinary rules he should open a discussion of this sort. The committee on Corporations had this matter under consideration at some considerable length, and it was also more or less discussed last week when another proposal along the same lines was under consideration. This proposal and several others formed a combination of proposals that were put before the committee on Corporations. This was formulated by the subcommittee, reported to the full committee, and reported to this Convention, I believe, recommended by the entire committee on Corporations.

The original idea of the proposal was to supervise the sale of stock by corporations in the state of Ohio, both domestic and foreign. I might say that the idea proper has been suggested by what has been enacted in the state of Kansas to prevent the sale of fraudulent stock, to prevent the public from being imposed upon by the sale of stocks and bonds where there is little or no value behind them. When we came to discuss the question we thought it ought to be broader than that, and that authority ought to be conferred on the legislature not only to provide against the evils that might grow out of fraudulent sale of stocks and bonds, but that it might provide for supervising the organization, control and issuing of securities by corporations. I believe that the state has a perfect right to supervise and control the issuance of securities, either stock or bonds, by all the corporations in the state. A corporation is an artificial person. It enjoys all of its privileges by reason of the fact that the state has given it life, and it protects the citizens engaged in that capacity by exempting them from liability as they would be liable in a partnership. Corporation liability is limited, but partnership liabilities are not limited, and for these reasons we believe the state should take some action to protect its citizens from the wrongs they have suffered in the past by reason of the sale of fraudulent stocks and bonds.

I think if I could judge anything of the temper of the Convention last week that they have probably discussed this question almost as much as they care to discuss it. The committee also believes that the legislature ought to provide for the classification of corporations. We have not changed section 1 of article XIII. That stands as it is in the present constitution. The first sentence of the present proposal embraces all of section 2 of the present constitution, and the new matter is that which follows the first section. Any of those who want to follow the changes will simply read into the present constitution all after the first section: "Corporations may be classified, and there may be conferred upon proper boards, commissions or officers such supervisory and regulatory powers over their organization, business, issue and sale of stock and securities, and over the business and sale of stock and securities of foreign corporations in this state as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: This is meant to take the same place here as those laws in Kansas called the "sky blue" laws?

Mr. HOSKINS: The "blue-sky" laws.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: There does not seem to be any provision here to prevent any kind of company from selling fraudulent mining stocks?

Mr. HOSKINS: We think there is.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: This seems to apply only to corporations. Would it not be well to add private companies also?

Mr. HOSKINS: I do not understand that there is any such thing as private companies selling stock.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Private mining companies might sell their mining privileges.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would say that you cannot undertake to supervise a business which the state does not create, and the state does not create the natural individual. If my friend from Cuyahoga comes over into my county with a spavined horse and beats me in a horse trade, I have no way of reaching him except by the criminal law; but if he comes over there with any corporation that is given life by the state, and undertakes to sell me something in that corporation, which the state has licensed to do business within the state, then the state is responsible for what it is doing, outside of the criminal law. As I understand it, if anyone outside of a corporation would undertake to sell a mining privilege, it would be something which that man must own in his individual or private capacity; and I do not believe the state should undertake to supervise that any more than the ordinary every-day private transactions of individuals. Does that answer your question?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Yes, sir, very well; but I do not see why the constitution of this state could not give the officers of the state power to regulate the sale of fraudulent products by any kind of an organization, whether corporate or private.

Mr. HOSKINS: The laws of Ohio do regulate the fraudulent sale of all products that are sold under false pretenses by the criminal law, but it would be an utterly impracticable proposition to require a private individual, before he undertook to dispose of his own private property, to file information before a board as to his private property.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: We should be given power to inquire at least.

Mr. NYE: Does not this say over the sale of stocks of foreign corporations?

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. NYE: The very thing that the gentleman is asking for.

Mr. HOSKINS: No; the gentleman was asking about a provision requiring the application of this to private individuals. We have tried in this to assume control over the organization of corporations, the sale of stocks and bonds by any private corporation organized in the state, and foreign corporations that undertake to sell their securities in the state, or anybody else who undertakes to sell them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: These blue-sky laws provide that an individual may not transfer his holdings of stock in any corporation in Kansas until the corporation has complied with the laws of Kansas by registering with the proper board and have a permit for the dealing in that kind of stock. Is that correct?

Mr. HOSKINS: I am not acquainted with the details of the operation of those blue-sky laws.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If I own stock in a mining company, or in any other wild-cat business incorporated in Kansas or any other state, would I as an individual be permitted to dispose of that to the citizens of Ohio and not be subject to the provisions of the proposal?

Mr. HOSKINS: This provision does not undertake, and I do not think the constitution should, to provide the details under which that stock should be transferred, but if this proposal is adopted the legislature may provide a rule and a law under which you could make those transfers.

Regulation of Corporations and Sale of Personal Property.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The legislature must do it?

Mr. HOSKINS: The legislature must do it. Now, if there are no further questions —

Mr. TAGGART: Would it not add strength to this proposal if, in line 10 after the words "foreign corporations" you would use "joint-stock companies or partnerships"?

Mr. HOSKINS: We discussed that question, and the judgment of the committee was that if we undertook to supervise the sale of stocks and bonds of both domestic and foreign corporations we at least ought not to supervise the sale of property that belonged to partnerships. If ten men together form a partnership what they own is their private property, and they have a right to dispose of that according to the laws of trade so long as they do not violate the criminal laws. Of course we are not seeking here to lay down any criminal rules, because our statutes take care of the violation of criminal laws and we think we ought not to undertake the supervision of that which belongs to a private individual in his private capacity as we should if this applied to partnerships.

Mr. TAGGART: I especially refer to foreign corporations and foreign joint-stock companies, or foreign partnerships. Has the committee discussed the question of the state having the right to supervise and regulate the sale of securities of foreign corporations and foreign joint-stock companies? The Adams Express Company, you know, is not a corporation.

Mr. HOSKINS: That is probably correct.

Mr. TAGGART: Would it not strengthen that proposal to add, "foreign joint-stock companies and foreign partnerships"?

Mr. HOSKINS: I will say to the Convention I do not know that that would be objectionable as applied to joint-stock companies, but I do believe it would be objectionable when it relates to partnerships. It might be so far-reaching that it would seriously hamper the transactions of private business, and I would say further that we never have, so far as I know, suffered in the state of Ohio from the sale of worthless securities issued by any private partnership or joint-stock company. In fact, I have never been able in my own mind to define what a joint-stock company is. Do you understand what it is?

Mr. TAGGART: It is a joint-stock company and not a corporation.

Mr. STOKES: I am going to assist in expediting the work of this Convention by making my remarks exceedingly brief. The gentleman from Auglaize has very fully explained the matter.

That part of the proposal relating to classification of corporations comes from some other proposals and also from amendments offered by the committee. My original proposal referred more to what is known as the blue-sky laws.

Every member of this Convention is conversant with conditions that have made necessary some provision for regulating the sale of stocks of industrial companies and providing penalties for violation therefor.

I have received a letter from the bank commissioner of Kansas, where they have a law in force covering the sale of stocks, in which he says that out of six hundred applications for license to sell certain securities he was able to approve only fifty-two, showing that over ninety per cent of the industrial companies are unworthy of the confidence of the investing public. The great benefit to be derived from this proposal comes from the fact that a place may be established where the necessary information can be obtained by prospective investors, and is open to that class of investors that is not conversant with the financial ways of the stock shark. The victims are numerous everywhere in this state. It is estimated that more than $5,000,000 of worthless stock is sold in Ohio every year. Without further remarks, I wish to indulge the hope that the proposal will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. WINN: What is the purpose of providing for a classification of corporations?

Mr. STOKES: That came through the committee's adoption of some of the other proposals, and it was referred to a subcommittee. Mr. Jones will explain that to you more fully than I can.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I want to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 10 after the word "corporations" insert "and joint-stock companies".

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I have nothing to say except that I have had some observation of fraudulent stock being sold by citizens who did not belong to corporations, as I understand them, and I believe that this state ought to have the right to inquire into conditions as to the purchase and sale of stocks through its individuals or people interested in foreign businesses, whether they be incorporated or private or joint-stock companies. I do not know the law well enough to know whether or not the state has the right to inquire into businesses of a private character, but it seems to me if there is any place where the state would have a right it would be in the fundamental law of the state. I think the extension of this privilege to inquire into joint-stock companies at least would be admissible in the fundamental law of the state.

Mr. WINN: Will you explain what you mean by a joint-stock company?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The gentleman from Auglaize [Mr. Hoskins] said he didn't know what a joint-stock company is. My notion is that a joint-stock company is the same thing as a corporation, but it is not as extensive. It does not seem to be controlled in the same way. I am not certain about that definition. I know that joint-stock companies and corporations are recognized as different things. They might be differentiated in law when the question came to a test, and I want to cover the whole matter.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is there any such thing as a stock company that is not incorporated in the state of Ohio?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I do not know at all, and if this amendment is out of order it can be defeated, but I have understood that there is a difference between corporations and joint-stock companies, and I want to cover them both. I would like to see the same thing applied to partnerships but they say it cannot be done.

Regulation of Corporations and Sale of Personal Property.

Mr. JONES: The trouble with our present constitutional provision, which is sixty years old, in reference to corporations is that it simply provides for the organization of corporations by general laws. The same law that provides for one kind of a corporation must necessarily provide the organization of all corporations. The generality of that provision precludes the legislature from making special provisions with regard to corporations of particular classes. It is desirable, and one instance will suffice out of many which may be cited, to have provision with reference to the classification of corporations. Take the charitable and quasi charitable institutions—for instance, the colleges which wish to receive donations and to hold them upon particular terms—there may be no obligations or stocks or securities in that kind of a corporation. As the matter now stands they are all controlled, however, by one general law. There should be a provision by which separate statutes relating to the organization and business of different kinds of corporations could be enacted, so as to enable them to meet the purposes for which they were organized.

Mr. HALFHILL: What do you say as to there being sufficient authority under the present constitution to pass the laws contemplated in this proposal?

Mr. JONES: I do not think the authority exists.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it not a fact that the state of Kansas conferred that authority on the superintendent of banking and that he issues licenses?

Mr. JONES: That is simply with reference to the sale of foreign securities in the state of Kansas. I have said that the power exists with reference to the sale of foreign securities in the state of Ohio to regulate their sale, but under this general provision of our present constitution I do not think the power exists now either to classify corporations or to exert that power over their organization and the issue and sale of their securities which it is desirable to have. The thing which in the last sixty years has caused all of this complaint of which we hear so much about trusts and monopolies and the control of prices, is due to the lack of control over corporations. That sort of a thing never could have grown up but for the power that existed to put capital together under the form of corporations. We have been going on in Ohio as in every other state with absolutely no attempt practically to control or supervise corporations. We have not undertaken to limit them in any way as to their size or the amount of securities they may issue, or to control them in their operations in any respect.

The remedy for the trouble that has given rise to all this complaint is to invest legislatures with absolute power, in every respect that is deemed desirable by the people, to control corporations. As has been suggested, they are the creatures of law. They are, therefore, subject, and ought to be subject, to such control as the wisdom of the people dictates, and there ought not to be any restrictions over the exercise of all the power deemed desirable in reference to them.

I do not believe there is any need of including joint-stock companies, although I do not see that it could do any harm. A joint-stock company is simply a partnership. It is nothing but a partnership, and the only thing that distinguishes it from the ordinary partnership is that the interests of the partners is evidenced by certificates, called ordinarily certificates of stock. So that all the rules that apply to ordinary partnerships apply to joint-stock companies, and in dealing with their property and in holding and enjoying property they exercise the same rights, and no others, that the individual exercises. They have no special privileges, exemptions or special rights, but are subject to the same liabilities and rules which control the conduct of individuals and ordinary partnerships.

Mr. EBY: As a member of the committee, I did not sign the report on this proposal by Mr. Stokes, and I shall have to take issue in a few words with the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. JONES] in saying that the present constitution does not confer upon the general assembly the power to deal with corporations. I think the present constitution gives almost the widest latitude to the general assembly to deal with corporations. I am entirely in favor of that portion of the proposal which relates to the sale of securities and stocks of foreign corporations, and I indicated to the committee my intention of offering at the proper time, and at the first opportunity, an amendment cutting out the first part and including the latter part, and I wish to offer that amendment as a substitute at the present time.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause in Proposal No. 72 and insert the following: "The general assembly shall by law provide for the regulation and supervision of the sale of stocks or bonds or securities of all domestic and foreign corporations."

Mr. EBY: I think the other part of the constitution relating to corporations is full, and that past general assemblies have made laws regulating them, but we have been lax when it comes to the sale of securities by corporations, especially foreign corporations. I think my amendment covers all that and does not provide for anything further.

Mr. HALFHILL: Why do you use the word "shall" in your amendment? Could not you confer the same power by saying "may"?

Mr. EBY: That is only a question of grammar. I thought "shall" was mandatory.

Mr. HALFHILL: No doubt it is, but inasmuch as it applies to every corporation, good, bad and indifferent, large and small, and there are many small private concerns, why do you force the passage of a law on them?

Mr. EBY: The legislature will make a general law, and it will apply to this. I do not think it is aimed at good home corporations. It is only to protect against these corporations that are foisting worthless stocks on the people, and it should be made as mandatory as possible.

Mr. KING: It seems to me, Mr. President and Gentlemen, that the report of the committee ought to be adopted substantially as it made it. I certainly could not favor this amendment which strikes at a very important part of the report. How far the general assembly can go in undertaking to deal particularly in its legislation with peculiar corporations has never yet been determined. At the time of the adoption of the present constitution there was not in operation in Ohio, and probably had never been heard of by any of the makers of the constitution, the institution known as the telephone, and a telephone company today is organized under the same law as was organized the corner bakery, if it is a corporation. They cannot go to work for that particular kind of transportation which the telephone company deals in and provide any different character of organization for it. It may be they do not want to, but if the power were there I take it that the legislative ingenuity would undoubtedly determine some different system. Very probably our successors will meet in constitutional convention and may have to deal with corporations formed for the purpose of handling an aerial transportation. And so along the line, as inventions develop and new ideas come forward, new propositions, involving new principles of law, will be presented, and even old ones are constantly being presented.

Now, so far as the rights of individual injury to persons and property are concerned, the courts have been able to get along with those questions, new as they are, but the legislature has never been able to deal with their organization and management practically along the lines intended for that particular service. There was not any sense in 1851, and there is vastly less sense today, that we should tie up the legislative hands by saying that all corporations shall be exactly so long and so short, that they shall fit in the same kind of a box and be exactly alike. The legislators have undertaken ingeniously, and probably constitutionally, although in hundreds of cases that question has never been tested, to go as far as they could upon some branch path, but also preserving their action, so that they might dodge back and answer any constitutional objection that might be made to their legislation. I think they ought to have the power to classify different kinds of corporations, and to legislate for each according to its peculiar qualities. I hope this amendment will not prevail, and I move that it be laid on the table.

The motion to table was carried.

Mr. KNIGHT: In order to somewhat relieve the committee on Phraseology, I beg to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

In the first line of the title, strike out the figure "8" and insert the figure "2".

Mr. KNIGHT: It reads section 8 in the title and section 2 in the body. Obviously it should be section 2 both places.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The vote is upon the amendment offered by the delegate from Highland to insert the words "and joint-stock companies" after the word "corporations", in line 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The question is now on the passage of the proposal.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted — yeas 104, nays none, as follows:

So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 72 — Mr. Stokes. To submit an amendment to article XIII, section 2, of the constitution. — Relative to investment companies.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 2. Corporations may be formed under general laws; but all such laws may, from time to time, be altered or repealed.

Corporations may be classified and there may be conferred upon proper boards, commissions or officers, such supervisory and regulatory powers over their organization, business and issue and sale of stock and securities, and over the business and sale of the stock and securities of foreign corporations and joint stock companies in this state, as may be prescribed by law.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. HOSKINS: I would like to call attention to the fact that Proposal No. 72, on which we have just voted, and Proposal No. 174, that we adopted last week, to a certain extent cover the same proposition, and I move that the committee on Phraseology be authorized and instructed, if possible, to combine Proposal No. 72 and Proposal No. 174 in one proposal, so that we shall not have two sections bearing on the same subject.

Mr. ELSON: It seems to me that that motion is not in the best form. I do not think the gentleman means the two proposals shall be combined in one. It seems to me best that the motion should be that Proposal No. 72 should be combined with Proposal No. 174, except the portion that belongs to the bill of rights, and that that should be placed in the bill of rights. Is that the idea?

Regulation of Corporations and Sale of Personal Property—Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Mr. HOSKINS: Yes.

Mr. ELSON: I am not sure whether your motion will cover it.

Mr. HOSKINS: We can try to do it. I want to make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer would ask that the motion be reduced in writing, because I am of opinion that instructions to committees should be given when we are on a proposal. I have been overruled on that twice, but I still think I am right.

Mr. WATSON: As I understand when Proposal No. 174 passed the other day, it was thought that that could not be separated from the bill of rights and secure the end sought. That is a question to be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The chair will put the question, and let the member reduce the amendment to writing later. The motion is to instruct the committee on Phraseology to combine these two proposals if possible.

Mr. KING: I move as a substitute that they be instructed to report these proposals back at the same time, and let the Convention do the adjusting.

Mr. NYE: I wish the gentleman would change the motion, if he will. The first part of Proposal No. 174 is under section 1 of the bill of rights. There has been a part added to it, and I wish he would fix it so that it is only the amendment to Proposal No. 174 that he asks to combine.

Mr. HOSKINS: The motion that Judge King made is that they report back at once.

Mr. NYE: I am on that committee, and I don't want to take responsibility that does not belong to us.

Mr. HOSKINS: I accept that amendment of Judge King.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Then the motion is that the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology be instructed to report both of these back at the same time.

Mr. PECK: There is no conflict between these sections at all. One of them authorizes the general assembly to regulate the sales of personal property of all kinds, including stocks and bonds, and the other authorizes them to make special regulations as to stocks and bonds. One covers the whole subject, and one part of the same subject, and there is no necessity of worrying about either one.

Mr. KNIGHT: It was not because of any alleged conflict, but it was in the hope that the two could be so combined as to require the submission of only one amendment if the amendments are submitted separately.

Mr. STEVENS: We always get into trouble when we do anything foolish.

Mr. PECK: We do.

Mr. STEVENS: I hope the amendment will prevail. This calico patch has been a thorn in my side ever since it was passed.

Mr. PECK: Because you never understood it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am in favor of Judge King's amendment.

The motion of the delegate from Auglaize [Mr. Hoskins] as amended by the acceptance of the amendment of the delegate from Erie [Mr. King] was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 313.

Mr. LEETE: As the matter contained in Proposal No. 313 has been combined in Proposal No. 64, which has been passed, I now move you that this proposal be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was carried.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is Proposal No. 34—Mr. Thomas, which the secretary will read.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. THOMAS: Gentlemen: You will note that the title to the proposal will have to be changed and I understand Brother Knight has the change already prepared. Labor for more than twenty years, as well as the manufacturers who have had to compete with prison-made goods, have made efforts in Ohio to abolish contract prison labor. About twenty years ago a law was passed abolishing it, so far as the Ohio penitentiary and reformatory were concerned, but the legislature refused to make any appropriations that year or the succeeding year to carry out the method of reform provided in the bill. That made it necessary to repeal the law so some form of employment could be had for prisoners in those institutions.

In 1906 we got passed what is known as the Wertz bill, providing for the abolition of contract prison labor so far as the Ohio penitentiary and reformatory were concerned, but it still permits the contracting of prison labor in many of the workhouses and other penal institutions of the state, as the Wertz law applies to those two institutions only. If manufacturers who have had to compete with this class of labor could come in here and tell you their story, I think you would find many of them have nearly been put out of business by the competition of prison-made goods. Those engaged in the woodenware industry were practically driven out of the business in Ohio for many years on account of that competition. The Wertz bill provides that the prisoners may be used in the manufacture of goods for the use of the state, in preparing material for good roads and providing for the raising of the necessary products for their own use, or for other institutions of the state. Since the adoption of the Wertz bill four hundred acres of the Morgan farm have been taken over by the penitentiary, and last year several hundred bushels of potatoes and other products were raised for the use of the penitentiary. This year the whole of the farm was practically taken over for cultivation by the prisoners of products for the use of that and other institutions. Down in Mt. Vernon, where we have the tuberculosis sanitarium, the prisoners have been used to build the roads from the institution to the public roads and back of the insane asylum you will find the prisoners used in quarrying material to help build good roads for the state. Under the Wertz bill the counties in the vicinity of the quarry are allowed to purchase this material at cost. As we are all in this Convention very much in favor of good roads, and as that is one of the subjects that we have disposed of, it means that this form of labor can be used successfully in aiding the state to get good roads. You will note that in this proposal, besides abolishing the contracting or selling of prison labor, it also provides for the prevention and sale of prison-made goods unless such goods are conspicuously marked "prison made." There is no use of Ohio abolishing, contracting or selling prison labor if we are going to permit every other state in the Union that is selling its prison labor to contractors to come in here freely with its prison-made goods and dispose of them without the knowledge of the citizens as to what they are buying. We have a test case on in Toledo now on the question, and it is dragging on and it is hard to tell when it will be disposed of. Now we ask the Convention to insert a provision in the constitution that no prison-made goods can be sold in Ohio, but that is prevented by the interstate law. It is my opinion that at least ninety per cent of the citizens of Ohio would not buy prison-made goods knowingly, and it is a fact that those prison-made goods come in free competition in our stores and other places of sale with the goods manufactured in Ohio. That makes it necessary that we should have some means whereby our citizens should be able to determine what they are buying.

Mr. WINN: Is the prime object of this proposal to prevent competition between prison-made goods and goods not prison-made?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes.

Mr. WINN: Do you regard it as justifiable to put these prisoners out on a farm raising corn and potatoes in competition with the free farmers?

Mr. THOMAS: So long as they are raising it for their own use. The farmer has the same right to stand his share of competition as have any other class of citizens.

Mr. WINN: Suppose in the raising of the crops the prisoners should raise some amount in excess of the amount necessary for the state. What would become of that excess?

Mr. THOMAS: They need only raise the amount necessary for their own use. If they raise an excess it can be turned over to other charitable institutions of the state.

Mr. WINN: I understand that all the penal institutions can be engaged in the same business at once?

Mr. THOMAS: Farming?

Mr. WINN: Some sort of labor. The proposition as I understand it is that those prisoners can be taken out to a quarry and put to getting out stone and breaking it up and preparing for building roads in competition with other laboring men engaged in that same business.

Mr. THOMAS: Yes.

Mr. WINN: The whole purpose is to prevent the employment of prison labor in manufacturing institutions in competition with similar manufacturing institutions where free labor is employed?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes, for profit. Whatever profit comes from the prison labor should go direct to the people themselves. There are sufficient charitable institutions in the state at the present time that have to be supported by taxation that could get the benefit of this prison labor in the raising of the necessary products for their use as they are getting in Cleveland at the present time through the use of our prison farm. They do not come into competition in the sense that they are in the open market with other people for the sale of their goods. Their work goes directly for the benefit of the state. I want to cite an article in LaFollette's magazine along this line. This article from LaFollette has a copy of the prospectus put out by the American Fibre Reed Company of which Leslie M. Shaw is the head.

LaFollette's magazine of March 2 has an interesting article relating to the American Fibre Reed Co., one of the largest of these prison contractors.

In part it says:

We have received a copy of a recent prospectus of the American Fibre Reed Company, enumerating the advantages under which it operates, announcing its plans for increased output, and offering $200,000 of its preferred stock at par to the public.

Mr. Shaw's prospectus is impressive. It says: "The American Fibre Reed Company manufactures fibre and reed furniture with prison labor. Its factories are located inside prison walls and it has, at the present time, 8,000 prisoners under contract in Maine, Illinois and Kentucky. (Prison contracts are usually made for eight years and generally continue indefinitely). This company pays for its labor 52 cents per man per day; its competitors who employ free labor pay an average wage of about $2 per day.

"There are no strikes or labor troubles in prison. This company is supplied free of rent with factory buildings, storage warehouses and ground inside the prison walls and with free heat, light and power. To acquire such facilities as this company has obtained free with its contracts would necessitate an additional investment of approximately $1,000,000. Having to make no investment for factory buildings, storage warehouses, heat, light or power, the company's funds are kept actively engaged in liquid assets such as raw materials, finished goods and accounts receivable. These are ideal conditions for profitable manufacturing.

"Dividends of 7 per cent on the preferred and 10 per cent on the common stock are strongly assured; in fact, the company expects its net earnings to be double these dividend requirements.

"The company's experience and organization enables it to obtain these contracts and advantages in preference to other manufacturers of fiber and reed furniture who have not had prison experience.

"The demand for fiber and reed furniture having grown so rapidly, the company has decided to double its output. This should give it control of about 65 per cent of the fiber and 50 per cent of the reed business in the United States."

This is the editor's comment on the matter:

Meanwhile the movement against contract prison labor is gaining headway. The states are beginning to awaken to the evils and injustice of exploiting prisoners for private profit. Legislation of the last year shows definite tendencies toward the state's assumption of its responsibilities for its own use of the prisoners in agriculture, mining, and manufacturing for the state, on state lands, in state mines and as operatives in state factories. Twenty-one states have passed laws designed to protect imprisoned men and women from being used as cheap labor to pile up dividends for favored manufacturers. Not one state legislated to give new powers of leasing or contracting for the labor of prisoners and one only, Idaho, extended the field of its present leases.

A new special committee on manufacture in prisons and reformatories was created at the recent annual meeting of the National Consumers' League. The chairman is Julian Leavitt, author of a series of studies of prison labor now appearing in the American Magazine.

The National Consumers' League is made up of ladies and gentlemen, who are not among the physical workers, but are engaged in social reform work. They appointed a chairman and this is his comment on the subject:

There has been for a number of years much complaint by manufacturers who use the label of the Consumer's League (particularly makers of silk petticoats) that they suffer under the cut-throat competition of contractors who use the labor of men, women and girls and boys detained in prison and reformatories, whose labor is sold to the contractors at a price with which free labor cannot compete. Manufacturers co-operating with the Consumers' League point out that men and boys who are trained for the needle trades in these institutions find no employment when they are set at large, except in the case of a trivial number of cutters, and that the reformatory aim in their imprisonment is thus wholly defeated. It is the object of the new special committee to obtain and make public information upon the relation of the prisons and reformatories, primarily to the trades in which the label of the Consumers' League is used.

Now, without taking up the time of the Convention further to discuss the matter, I want to call your attention to the latter part of the proposal which provides, "Where the prisoner has a dependent family his earnings may be paid for their support." Under the old contract system in use in the penitentiary, if prisoners worked overtime, or if there were some premium put upon extra effort upon their part to get out a larger output, then they were paid small earnings which could be saved up for their own use, or sent to their families. A prisoner's family, unless it is self-supporting, becomes an object of charity, and I feel and the labor movement feels that where we are taking the earnings of a prisoner for the benefit of the state at large there is no reason why the prisoner's family should be allowed to starve or become objects of charity.

Mr. WINN: Under the provisions of this proposal could the state buy coal lands and put the convicts to work mining coal for the benefit of the state, or rather for the use of the state?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes.

Mr. STOKES: Could the state under this proposal use the prisoners to work on the public roads?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes, I think so. You will notice it reads:

All persons confined in any penal institution in the state, so far as may be consistent with discipline and the public interest, shall be employed in some beneficial industry for the use of the state or its political subdivisions.

That would permit the legislature, I think—

Mr. PETTIT: Can not you get all you are asking for from the legislature at the present time without anything in the constitution?

Mr. THOMAS: It is possible we may do it, but I think it is necessary to make it a constitutional provision so that the legislature may follow it out as it should have done years ago. Six years ago the Wertz bill was passed, and every year since then the contractors and interests back of them have prevented the necessary appropriation to carry the provision of the Wertz bill into effect, and they have come to the legislature persistently trying to get that law repealed. Last year I think there was a commission appointed by the legislature to make an investigation of the subject and to make recommendations along the lines suggested here.

Mr. PECK: I understood you to say a while ago that this provision of yours would be valueless unless we excluded this prison-made stuff from other states.

Mr. THOMAS: I said there was no use from a competitive standpoint of abolishing the making of prison-made goods in Ohio if every other state is allowed to bring its goods in here and sell them.

Mr. PECK: Have you investigated the question of whether it is in the power of the state of Ohio to exclude such goods from the state under the constitution of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS: It cannot as I understand it.

Mr. PECK: I doubt it very much.

Mr. THOMAS: I do not believe I quite heard you. Just repeat that question.

Mr. PECK: I asked you whether you had investigated the question of whether the state of Ohio can exclude prison-made goods from being sold in Ohio? I very much doubt that it can. The constitution of the United States guarantees for the citizens of each state all the rights of every other state, and they can come and bring their property with them under these decisions.

Mr. THOMAS: I have stated the matter in just the same manner as you have—that this state can not prevent the sale of prison-made goods here, but we can determine in this proposal that any such goods that come in here shall be conspicuously marked "prison made" and then our citizens can decide whether they want to buy them or not.

Mr. PECK: That would be difficult of enforcement and you may run against the interstate commerce law on that.

Mr. MOORE: Do you not think that we could require them to brand their goods "prison made" to designate their quality, the same as the quality of any other article of commerce?

Mr. THOMAS: I do not see why a provision of this kind would not be perfectly in accordance with the interstate laws. At least I have asked some of the attorneys in the Convention and they inform me that they believe that provision could be put into effect without any fear of interference of any interstate commerce laws.

Mr. HURSH: I will confess that possibly I have not been paying as close attention to all the proposals as I should because this amended proposal never reached my attention until it came up for discussion a few minutes ago. You will pardon my relating a little conversation I had the other evening. I assure you it will be interesting to the Convention. This proposal so fits into the conversation, it appeals to me as one of the things to go forward. I will, however, go back a little. Last Friday evening I was talking with an eminent physician, a very humane man, who has a ranch in Colorado about twelve or fourteen miles from Denver. He said when the present administration of the state of Colorado came in—probably some of you have read this in some of the magazine articles, and I am not prepared on it, and perhaps will give it to you in a desultory way—a college professor went to Governor Shafroth and said, "I want to be put in charge of the prisons of Colorado." He had no pull, but he insisted and finally he got the place. What did he do? He went to the prisons of Colorado and said to the inmates, "I am going to take the guards away from you. I am going to put you on your honor. Simply because you men have been condemned to prison you are not going to be condemned for all these years to be criminals, and I am going to make men of you. I am going to give you a chance." What did he do? They are building state roads there and one of these state roads was built right through the doctor's ranch, just back of his house, and a gang of these men came along there and worked. This superintendent of a Colorado prison takes those men without a single guard and without anybody to watch them, just takes them and puts them on their own honor, under bosses from their own prison, and assigns them to work. They are making the public highways of Colorado. That is not all. They had in that bunch of men who worked there through the doctor's ranch three life prisoners, men who were in prison for murder. One of them was a Kentuckian who had graduated from Harvard University, but who in a moment of passion had killed a man hardly knowing why he did it. He said, "I am aware I should suffer this retribution." But this was not all. This superintendent every two days comes out with a bunch of letters which he distributes among the prisoners and which different men over the state write to the prisoners saying, "I am willing to take you just as soon as you get free." This humane professor is working a way by which these men, even life prisoners, want to be reformed and have some hope.

You know it is supposed in our state that when a man is confined in a prison for a few years he is never fit for society, that he is beyond redemption, but it has been demonstrated there by actual test that it is possible to restrain these men by putting them upon their own honor. I could relate further conversation, but I want to give just one incident to show how far these men are trusted. The doctor had a daughter six years old. There was only an orchard between his house and the place where the men were working and he said to one of the men who had charge of the gang, "Will it be safe to allow my daughter out upon the premises or upon the highway?" And he answered, "Perfectly safe, absolutely so," and every day that gang of men, supposed to be vicious, is working down on that road and the little girl goes down on that road and at dinner time one of the men carries her home as he would his own child, showing how far behind the times we are in regard to the treatment of prisoners.

Here is a provision by which we can utilize the prisoners of the state and redeem some of them; here is a chance to put hope in the heart of a criminal. The day the judge passes sentence upon him he must not be considered an Ishmaelite, with every man's hand against him. In a few years he can be taken out and worked by the state, not in competition, but on work for the state, and be given a chance to reform and be redeemed among men.

Mr. RORICK: I want some information. When these prisoners go out working in the country are they not working in competition with some one else who would do that work if the prisoners didn't do it? I can't understand the difference between working in competition one place and another. If they were not in the penitentiary they would be laboring in competition with somebody, and if they are laboring at all in the penitentiary they are laboring in competition with somebody.

Mr. HURSH: I am not arguing so much upon the point of competition with prison labor. I am simply arguing upon the humane side of the question.

Mr. RORICK: I agree with that.

Mr. WATSON: Is it not a fact that while they were working upon the public highway no private corporation is speculating upon their labor, but the state is getting all of it, whereas when they work under the prison system at present invoked someone is speculating on their labor?

Mr. HURSH: My idea is that the poor benighted men can be taken from prison walls, taken out in the air and given God's sunshine and have better ideas of manhood instilled into them.

Mr. PETTIT: Ought not this same man to have a right to choose some profession if he sees fit?

Mr. HURSH: I think so. I have just taken this opportunity to show you where the state of Ohio can do an immense good and improve conditions over those we had.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I think it is very evident to the members of the Convention from the answers that have been made by Mr. Hursh that he is approaching this question from one side and the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] is approaching it from another.

Mr. THOMAS: I am trying to approach it from all sides.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I am going to approach it from both sides. Singularly it happens that the argument of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] sounds very familiar. I think I noticed an awakening on the part of the member from Defiance [Mr. WINN]. I think it was somewhat familiar to him. I think Mr. Doty also recognized the language as being similar to something we heard here eighteen or twenty years ago.

Mr. DOTY: Oh, no.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Have you forgotten it? Brother Hursh is talking along the line of recovering and restraining the criminals. A beautiful story of how the warden of the Colorado Penitentiary at Canon City has succeeded in trusting to the honor of his prisoners in reforming some of them! I have been there and it is true that under the warden's administration the convicts in the Colorado penitentiary at Canon City have done a large amount of work making highways. They have constructed roads from Canon City up to the Royal Gorge, from which point you can look down on the valley of the Arkansas River and the railroad following the sinuous windings of the river. They have built other roads so that men can take an automobile and go from Canon City in various directions on the most beautiful highways. All of that sounds very nice, but there is one point that I want to call your attention to just there. If those convicts had not built those roads there were plenty of people not confined in the penitentiary that at certain seasons would have been very glad to get that work to do.

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Now the warden of the principal penitentiary in Oregon has proceeded along lines similar to those pursued at Mansfield, Ohio, in the reformatory, where we endeavor to reclaim the men and are not endeavoring to remove competition with free labor. That is the least consideration. The member from Cuyahoga [Mr. THOMAS] has referred to a law enacted six years ago by the legislature, and I want to call your attention to the fact that we have had such a law on the statute books for twenty years. There was such a law when I came to the general assembly in 1894. It provided that after a certain date no more contract labor could ever be permitted in the penitentiary of Ohio, and it remained there for years and years. What was the reason it didn't stay there? The legislature never followed it. The provision was that the prisoner should be working on state account. How would that work? It was my fortune when I came here eighteen years ago, without solicitation on my part, to be made chairman of the prison and prison reform committee of the house. Now I want to remind gentlemen of the financial condition of this country at that time. If there ever was a time when the laboring men were struggling for any employment it was then. They were willing to dig ditches or build roads or anything else because they were being fed in Cincinnati and Cleveland and Columbus in soup houses. They were being fed in Hocking Valley and we had had a statute enacted a year before which provided identically for the condition the member from Cuyahoga proposes to put in this—that is to say, that all goods made in the penitentiary or any workhouse in Ohio should be conspicuously branded "prison made," and in case it could not be branded it should be labeled in such a way that the consumer would know when it reached him it was prison made. Simply a boycott.

Mr. THOMAS: May I ask you a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Not at this time. I did not disturb you. We had that statute in force. We had no appropriation and no money to make an appropriation. It was a condition, not a theory. There were five hundred idle men at the penitentiary, sitting from morning to noon and from noon until night, with nothing to do. Now this is not hearsay with me. I was there and saw it. They admitted me to the penitentiary when I went down there without a question. I saw that many times and simply because there was no market for the goods the state was producing. The same thing is true in part today. They are using antiquated machinery so the production will be small and keep the prisoners busy. A proposition was brought on in the senate and it was passed. The managers of the penitentiary were frantic over the condition. The bill came to this house. It was referred to my committee, and not one man but a dozen men came to me from various counties asking me what we were going to do with that bill. I said we are going to report it out and recommend it for passage. "Yes, but I have a labor union down in my county and I don't like to have it passed." Well, the Harshbarger law was held unconstitutional on a technicality by the circuit court when Judge Shauck was circuit court judge, before he was advanced to the supreme court. So we did not have to repeal it.

Now this proposal designs to put prisoners to work on the state-account plan. They have the state-account plan in Illinois and I took a member of my committee and went over there—of course on a pass. We went to Chicago. I had a letter of introduction to the warden of the Illinois penitentiary at Joliet. We found our way out and presented the letter and we were allowed to examine the Joliet penitentiary which was operated on the state-account plan. We were shown everything that could be seen. They were making substantially the goods they do in the Ohio penitentiary. They showed us every thing, the raw material, the goods advanced a little, then a little more and then finished and ready to be shipped out. Then we came around to the office of the warden for a sort of summing up. I said to him, "How do you manage this business as far as the purchase of stock is concerned?" He said, "We go out in the open market as any manufacturer would." "Do you buy your machinery?" "Yes." "You have convict labor to make your goods?" "Yes." "Where do you sell your goods?" "Anywhere." "Will you inform me how you avoid competition with free labor?" He smiled at both corners of his mouth, and there was a little German secretary there and he answered and said, "I will tell you how we do it, we whip the devil around the stump. We do just as any one else would do, and we sell goods in the same market." The manager, after he had time to collect himself, said, "If there is any profit in this business the state gets it instead of the contractor." That is all the difference. And no labor organization can get anything else out of it except that. I said, "You have some money invested here?" He said, "We have $500,000 of state money invested in stock and goods in various stages of manufacture." Two years later I was there pursuant to the same quest and they then had $1,000,000 of the money of the state of Illinois invested in material and goods in various stages of manufacture and for sale in the department stores in Chicago and at every other place they could sell them.

Now, coming to the proposition advanced by Judge Peck, this committee at my request conducted correspondence with almost every state in the Union where they had a different kind of institution of labor for the convicts in the penitentiaries. We wrote to the South, where they were employed in the mines. We wrote to Texas, where they were employed on the farm. We wrote to North Carolina, where they were employed in the mines and for road construction. Pennsylvania has not been charged with being very much against union labor. The great prison at Philadelphia—

Mr. WATSON: May I inquire whether this is under the five-minute rule or under a two-hour rule.

Mr. THOMAS: I move that the member's time be extended.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The time is not up yet. I am watching that.

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: The great Moyamensing prison in Philadelphia is an immense institution and they have always conducted the business on the solitary plan and with the view of keeping the prisoners engaged with something that resembles employment; in some instances they will have a man working as a shoemaker and he makes the shoe complete. Another makes something else complete. At the Western Penitentiary in Allegheny, they have a policy similar to that pursued in Illinois, except the goods cannot be sold in Pennsylvania. The question was, "Where is your market?" The law provides that the goods shall not be sold in Pennsylvania. They can be sold anywhere else. Judge Peck has suggested you can not interfere with interstate transportation. They can send the goods in here and you can not prohibit them. The culmination of the whole thing is that in no possible way can you employ the inmates of the penitentiary at anything useful or productive without putting them in competition with free labor. I don't care what they produce, whether it is potatoes or brooms. There is not a single department of industry in which you can put men to work where you don't compete with somebody.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have had the pleasure of voting for two or three propositions in the interest of labor. I am sorry I can not add another vote on this, but in the first place it does not contain a single line, letter or syllable that is not purely statutory. Everything that is in it that is not unconstitutional, the general assembly of the state of Ohio can enact. It does undertake in one clause to require something which will certainly be declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of the United States if it is attempted to be enforced, that goods must be labeled; this is an attempt to discriminate by forcing the goods to have a certain label put on before they come into Ohio. Further than that, it is a little difficult to brand potatoes or apples "prison made." And yet they are produced by that kind of labor.

Again, in three places of the proposal the phrase is used which is not known either to the constitution or the laws of Ohio, "prison made." We have no prisons in Ohio. We have a penitentiary, workhouses and reformatories. But the term "prison" is not known to our laws in this state. We have workhouses at Columbus, Cleveland and Cincinnati, and reformatories, which are not in the pure sense of the word penal institutions, so that in that feature the proposal is distinctly wrong.

Mr. MOORE: Is there any general term covering all those places?

Mr. KNIGHT: So far as I know the statutes no state has found it.

Mr. HURSH: In view of the fact that the labor organizations of this state are in favor of this plan of disposing of convict labor, should there be any objection to disposing of the matter in this way?

Mr. KNIGHT: I think so, without raising the question of organized or unorganized labor. I think as a citizen of Ohio I have a right to my opinion about what should be done with convict labor. I think every one of us has a perfect right to his opinion on that point. A little further on, in line 10 of the proposal, there is something that is not altogether clear, at least it is not to my mind. What is meant by a "dependent family?" How far are you going? Every convict in the penitentiary who has a relative of any kind who is in any way dependent upon efforts other than his or her own—is that going to turn the proceeds of the convict's labor to their support? What is the definition of a "dependent family?"

We have reference made to two states, especially to Colorado, where I am glad to believe—the incident was not unknown to me—an attempt is being made to look after the reformation of the prisoners even though it may happen to compete with some of the labor or all of the labor of the rest of us. It is rather an interesting fact that there is not a word or syllable in the constitution of Colorado on this subject, and the state of Colorado and the state of Oregon are doing something that they are both free to do without any provision in their constitution. Those are the states which have been cited for us to follow. There is not a thing in our constitution that prevents our doing everything that is mentioned in this proposal, except the one thing already mentioned as barred by the federal constitution. Therefore I do not favor the adoption of the proposal.

1. Because it is purely legislative.

2. There is a difference in opinion as to the wisdom of it. I do not believe in putting it into the constitution and locking it up there at the present time.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: This proposal, while not identical in words, is identical in principle with what has been several times attempted. There are two principles attempted in Ohio. There are two principles involved in it. The first is the principle of competition with free labor. The second is inhibition against peonage. I wish to suggest to the member from Franklin county that the true test of the merits of any proposal to amend the constitution is not whether or not the thing sought to be done can be done if the amendment is not passed. There is nothing I know of that we now do that we could not do by an act of the legislature if the constitution was silent on the subject. The constitution, however, does attempt to define policy. Just one example: If the constitution did not have the language "The right of trial by jury shall be inviolate," the general assembly could pass a law providing for a trial by jury and we would have it, but we could come along at any time and amend that law and do away with it. But the people have committed the state to that form of trial by a jury and that is part of the fundamental law. So the question is "Shall we make it a part of our state policy that free labor shall not be put in competition with convict labor, and that peonage shall be abolished?"

Mr. KNIGHT: Does the gentleman contend that this removes competition between the so-called convict labor and free labor?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I say it attempts to do so.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not understand the word "attempt."

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: It attempts to do so and in a large measure it can be made successful by proper enactment. A few evenings ago a majority of us, some with some misgivings, voted to authorize a minimum wage. Having made that a part of the state policy, do you propose to have them come along and compete with men who get no wage? What is to become of the manufacturer under such circumstances? I do not believe you can raise wages indefinitely and promiscuously and generally and not raise the cost of living ultimately.

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Do you want the convicts to work at all?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I certainly do.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Does this proposal suggest a way of avoiding competition?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: I think so. I will get to that by and by.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I wish you would develop that.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: If you will be patient a minute I think I can reach it. I am not at all clear that we can go on raising the wages of the people and not ultimately raise the cost of living and perhaps defeat what we are trying to do. Now I voted for that provision the other night, not because the average wage is not all right, but because some wages are altogether too low. Take the roller in a rolling mill who gets $15 per day and compare that wage with the wage of a young woman who works for fifty cents a day in a store. That requires some explanation.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: You have spoken of a girl working in a department store here at fifty cents a day. Does she work there because she wants to? She doesn't work there because she is compelled to.

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: Yes, she does. She is compelled to work there and work for fifty cents a day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: Does she not work there because she would rather work there than be out at domestic work?

Mr. BROWN, of Lucas: No, sir; you have asked me that question and there is my answer. I think it is well enough for the state of Ohio to have an opportunity to say whether it shall commit itself definitely to the policy of not putting the free labor in competition with convict labor.

Now the other proposition is one upon which I lay more stress, and that is the question of whether we shall once and for all declare against peonage in Ohio, the renting of men out to other men. Under our present system we have done it. I have seen the work down at the penitentiary. There is no use of sending a man to the penitentiary if there is no hope of reformation. How can you hope for anything when you turn a man over to another man? A man must be working to be healthy and happy, but he should be under the exclusive control of the state of Ohio every minute. When we passed a proposal the other day doing away with capital punishment did you mean to destroy hate with hate? You can only destroy hate with love.

So I say for all time let us prevent peonage in Ohio.

Mr. HARBARGER: Gentlemen of the Convention: It seems to me there are some phases of the question that we have not touched upon yet. It is not all a question of competition between free labor and prison labor. There is another question that enters into it. It is the inhuman driving of prisoners by contractors for the purpose of getting a profit. The profit is the question with the contractors. That is the great question with them. It seems to me that should enter into the consideration of this matter. Again, this question does not wholly revolve about the penitentiary. It goes to the workhouses of our counties, where contracts for the labor of the inmates are let out. Men tell me who have managed our institutions and workhouses here that it is a disgrace to the community where a man is sentenced for a trivial offense that he is put to such hard work and so much is required of him and the profit does not go to his family or to the city or to the state, but goes to the contractors. I think that is one of the features of the question that should be considered in voting on this matter. I am heartily in favor of this proposition.

Mr. FLUKE: It seems to me that all of the talk on this proposition has been from the viewpoint of the trade union. Now I am a trade unionist myself. I know it makes considerable difference whose ox is gored. I am willing to see all the trade unionists get a fair wage, but I expect, if we let them have their way, about a year from now when I come to town I will see a basket of potatoes in front of some grocery store labeled with great big letters "prison made." Now, I don't want to see that. That comes in direct competition with the business I am in. It would interest me to know what effect prison-made potatoes would have on a union man. I am inclined to think they would give him indigestion. This may be a blessing in disguise after all. I wonder if these prison-made potatoes would cut off the wire worm and that other little pest known as the Colorado beetle. If I am assured that prison-made potatoes will kill him off I will be inclined to support this proposal; otherwise, I will not. The fact that the product of a prison farm is not sent out in open competition doesn't prevent it from being in competition. I have heard it said again and again, and I have come to believe it myself, that it is utterly impossible to work prison labor without coming in competition with free labor somewhere.

Now there is another thing I want to say, and that is on the question by the gentleman from Hardin [Mr. HURSH].

I presume it is necessary to keep these men employed. I think they should be employed out of consideration to them as a humane measure, and if they must be employed some provision should be made and some place found to put them. I will say this: That if everybody else kicks the prisoners off the face of the earth, they can go and raise corn and potatoes; farmers are not afraid of it. The history of most such institutions when they have gone into the agricultural business is that a bushel of their corn or potatoes costs more than the average farmer gets, and we can stand competition, although I hope this proposal will not pass.

Mr. FARRELL: Will the member yield to a question? Do you understand that the adoption of this proposal would permit the product of the prisoner to come in conflict with free labor?

Mr. FLUKE: Certainly.

Mr. FARRELL: I didn't understand that.

Mr. FLUKE: Any product consumed in the state comes into competition with some other product.

Mr. FARRELL: You would not find any prison-made potatoes at a grocery.

Mr. FLUKE: I have had the privilege of getting acquainted with the manager of our twelve hundred-acre farm and they are engaging in agriculture on a large scale.

Mr. FARRELL: That is what this is intended to do, but the product must not be sold out in the market.

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor.

Mr. FLUKE: There are several hundred acres of agricultural land owned by the state at this time and the purpose is to increase and work that to the fullest capacity. It is only a question of a few years when there will be no more market in the state institutions for anything outside; they will have a surplus and that will go on the open market.

Mr. FARRELL: But this prohibits that.

Mr. FLUKE: What will become of it?

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I would like to ask a question right there. If the convict in the workhouses and penitentiaries were fed potatoes and the state did not produce them, would they be bought from the outside?

Mr. FLUKE: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: If they produce enough to fully supply the prisoners, they don't buy any from the outside?

Mr. FLUKE: No.

Mr. WINN: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following: "The contracting or sale of prison labor is hereby prohibited."

Mr. WINN: I have always been opposed to the plan of contracting our criminals as they have been contracted in the past, especially in our penitentiary, and I offer this so the policy of the state may become fixed. It is unlawful now according to statutory provision to make contracts by which prisoners in the Ohio penitentiary are hired out to contractors. That far this proposal is properly written. To that extent we may properly write this proposal in the constitution, and to no further extent. We can very properly declare it to be the policy of this state that hereafter no law shall be enacted permitting those having charge of any penal institution of the state—jail, workhouse, penitentiary, or reformatory—to let out the labor of the inmates by contract so that the profits for their labor shall inure to some contractor. This question of the employment of the prisoners is the hardest question the state has to deal with right now. There are more than fifteen hundred prisoners in the penitentiary and there is employment for very few of them. The remainder of them are in the idle house. I was down there visiting a short time ago and the idle house was full of them; and it is the most serious question with which the state is confronted. For eight months in the year men can not be taken out on the public highways to build roads, nor can they work upon the farm. They must do something or their idleness will mean insanity and disorder, just the opposite of what we have been talking about, which is the reformation of the criminals. My opinion is that this question had better be left to the condition of affairs arising from time to time. It is true that whatever they do will be in competition with free labor. If they go out and build roads it will be in competition with other men who are engaged in building roads or who would be if the employment were offered. If they make brooms they are in competition with other broommakers of the state.

I recall that perhaps eighteen or twenty years ago there was a factory in our penitentiary where men were engaged in making brushes, and there was an institution of the same kind in Toledo and the proprietors of that institution came to the general assembly and persuaded the general assembly, and I believe correctly, to enact a law providing that not exceeding ten per cent. of the output of any particular industry in Ohio should be made by prison labor, and I voted for it. I was opposed to prison labor then, and I am now; but at that time they were making brushes down there and a great many were engaged in that one line of business and they were making enough to overstock the market. There is sure to be some competition. It will always be so. It is bound to be so. There is no such thing as the elimination of competition. There will be competition no matter in what line of work prisoners are employed. It seems to me therefore that if we simply put ourselves on record as saying that hereafter prisoners shall not be let out by contract, we have done all that anybody has asked us to do. It is fair and it is fundamental. That can be properly written in the organic law. Beyond that it is all statutory and I believe it would be injurious to the state to go farther than that, and I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McCLELLAND: I am not surprised at the introduction of this proposal, nor am I surprised at its urgent advocacy by the representatives of labor unions. It is to be expected that such would be the case. It is perfectly natural that every group of individuals should think they are the people and their interests are the great interests of the commonwealth. We can not help that. It is natural that the representatives of organized labor should feel that way and that they should seek to have our support as they have received it on three separate proposals. We have voted almost unanimously for two of them. But there are limits to this. The lawyers feel that they are the people and the farmers of this Convention feel that they are the people, and whatever the occupation men are engaged in they feel that they are the people, that they must have consideration at the hands of the Convention. And so in our legislative bodies, these people who can readily group together and organize usually get what they want. For either they can furnish the talk themselves or they can get talkers to talk for them; and so they can get what they want. And this has come out as a part of the general movement in the state and nation; and this movement is so strong that it is easy to make a mistake, as our labor friends have done here.

Mr. TETLOW: Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCLELLAND: I will not. I am not accustomed to asking questions and I do not want to be interrupted by being asked.

People all over the country are making that mistake. It was made last year by the head of the nation himself in the Canadian reciprocity matter, when he assumed that the labor unions and the manufacturers' unions were all there were in the country and the farmers' unions were not to be reckoned with. So that greater men than we are and greater bodies than this have made these mistakes, and the position of the presidential candidate himself is largely the result of the mistakes made by him in the reciprocity matter, for farmers had to be reckoned with. If the inmates of our penal institutions are to be given labor—and they must be given labor unless we are more cruel than to impose capital punishment—they must be given honest toil to relieve idleness. If they are to live and remain sane we must furnish them occupation. We farmers are willing to accept our share of competition, but if they raise potatoes and wheat for their own use it comes into competition just as much with farm labor as it would with other labor when they make brushes and shovels or forks or anything else, and sell them in the open markets of the world. Any kind of labor comes in competition with labor somewhere and somehow. Something was said a little while ago about preventing the sale of their surplus products in the open market. It is not so stated in the proposal. The goods sold in the open market must bear the stamp "prison made;" that is all. But is it fair at all for us in the present state of the sociological problems and the penal problems to put in the fundamental law of the land such a prohibition which can not be changed for twenty years?

Abolishing Prison Contract Labor—Judge of Court of Common Pleas for Each County.

Mr. STILWELL: The discussion of this proposal has disclosed some faulty phraseology, and perhaps some of the substance of the proposal ought to be modified. I, therefore, move that it be referred back to the committee with the right to report at any time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: I do not know that I have any objection to recommitting it to the committee, but I object to the part of the motion which allows the committee to report at any time.

Mr. STILWELL: I assure the gentleman that I shall not take any unfair advantage. The matter is before the Convention, but it ought not go to a vote. It may be made a special order for 1:30 a week from now—no, I will make it Tuesday, April 30, at 1:30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. DOTY: Can we undertake to say to a committee that it shall or shall not be ready to report?

Mr. STILWELL: We will be ready to report.

Mr. DOTY: I was only objecting to establishing such a precedent. Yesterday another special committee was given the right to report at any time.

Mr. TETLOW: I would ask Mr. Stilwell a question before I vote on this. What are the points at issue in this proposal that are not clear?

Mr. STILWELL: We want it in different shape in order to bring about proper consideration.

Mr. PETTIT: I rise to a point of order. There is a motion before the house.

The VICE PRESIDENT: There is, but it is debatable.

Mr. TETLOW: Personally I do not care whether this proposal goes back to the committee to be redrafted or not, but it seems to me if there is any trouble about the thing it could be done on the floor of the Convention. I favor this proposal and I can not see any fault in it. I think the matter will be cleared up by an amendment on the floor. Let us get through with the proposal and be done with it.

Mr. DOTY: It is only fair and right if this proposal, after the long discussion we have had, is referred back to the committee that they shall have the right to report at any time, because the proposal has been climbing up the calendar and has finally got to discussion today. We have been discussing it and now it is desired to have the committee do some work on it and let it come back at the head of the calendar. I am willing to move to amend to allow this committee to report at any time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Ashtabula: That is where it was at the beginning. The members know what they are working at. That is to give the chairman the right to come back at any time when he sees the coast is clear. He has seductively told that they are going to make some amendments. We want to be here when they come in. We want to scan those amendments. I don't say that in any offensive sense, but we all understand the spirit in which we are approaching this. We put the proposals on the calendar so that they come in order. When we allow any committee to take a bill or proposal off the calendar with leave to report at any time we are giving them an advantage which is not due them and which is prejudicial to the Convention.

Mr. THOMAS: That same thing was done day before yesterday with Judge Dwyer's proposal and I do not see why my proposal has not as much right as Judge Dwyer's. It is only a case of prejudice against the proposal that the member from Ashtabula is raising.

Mr. WINN: I am sorry that the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] made any objection. I think we should treat this proposal as we treated Judge Dwyer's proposal yesterday. I too want to be present when they report it back, and I am going to be here. If the member from Ashtabula [Mr. HARRIS] wants to be present when it is reported back there is a very easy way for him to be present. We are going to clear the calendar. We are going to do all the work, it makes no difference which comes up first. There is merit in this proposal and I hope those having it in charge will work out something that will be satisfactory to every member on the floor. I hope the motion of the member from Cuyahoga [Mr. STILWELL] will prevail.

Mr. STILWELL: I will make that read "at any time" instead of "Tuesday, April 30, at 1:30 o'clock p. m."

The motion was carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT: Proposal No. 304—Mr. Halfhill, is the next business in order and the secretary will read it.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. HALFHILL: Gentlemen of the Convention: Ever since the organization of the state of Ohio we have had a common pleas court, and under the old constitution we had a common pleas court and supreme court. Under the present constitution we have justices of the peace, common pleas court, circuit court and a supreme court. By the action of the Convention here already had, the justice of the peace is no longer a constitutional officer, assuming, of course, that our action is ratified. The circuit court has been changed into the court of appeals, and the jurisdiction both of that court and the supreme court somewhat modified. Now that leaves the common pleas court. There is nothing in this proposal that in any way interferes with or changes the existing jurisdiction of the court of common pleas, because the constitution provides that the court of common pleas shall have such jurisdiction as is conferred by law, and, as we know, that jurisdiction is broad and covers a wide field. We do not know, provided the justices of the peace no longer continue to exist as petty courts, just how much the legislature will leave of that jurisdiction, of whether the legislature will confer all of it upon the court of common pleas. But it is very likely that many petty cases brought before justices of the peace under the $300 limit, confining their jurisdiction, shall eventually be tried out by the court of common pleas, and it is very likely—inasmuch as the court of appeals no longer hear appeal cases de novo, that is to say, tries them anew on the evidence by witnesses produced in that court—and it is fair to assume that the common pleas court will have to try those cases with more care than has been heretofore exercised, and will have to take additional time in so doing, so that a record of the trial in that court where the cases are carefully tried, may be taken by way of review to the circuit court or court of appeals as we have named it. Therefore I say the action already taken by the Convention in adopting the proposal which eliminates the office of the justice of peace and modifies the jurisdiction of the circuit court so that trials will have to be had with more care in the court of common pleas, has, by force of that action, added to the duties of the court of common pleas irrespective of what the legislature may do in the future. The fundamental law as we have changed it, if what we have done is adopted, has already enlarged the duties of the common pleas court.

What is the condition in which we find that court as created under the existing constitution? The constitution of 1851, which probably represents the best that the convention at that time could do, established for the county of Hamilton a single district, not thereafter to be subdivided, and then provided that the residue of the state should be divided up into eight other districts as equitably as might be done. But it seems that before the convention adjourned its work it proceeded to divide up the state and mark out by actual county lines and designate by actual counties what those districts should be. So we have had now and ever since the constitution was adopted nine common pleas judicial districts in the state of Ohio. Now the constitution further provides that any one of those districts may be subdivided, but the subdivision can not pass beyond the numeral three, so there can be no division of any common pleas judicial district into smaller units than an aggregate of three subdivisions. That is awkward. Under the common pleas jurisdiction, therefore, each common pleas judge can only be a judge within the limits of the particular district in which he presides, and he must be elected to office by the votes of those residing within the limits of the subdivision in that district in which he resides.

Now, when it comes to making those subdivisions of common pleas districts, it must be done by the general assembly and it takes a two-thirds vote of that body to establish or change the lines of a subdivision. The consequence is that in framing the subdivisions of each of these common pleas districts there have been all kinds of political logrolling, until you find possibly four or five counties in the district that have been able to band together and get a subdivision made which is not equitable compared with the territory left in the rest of the district, but which nevertheless has been enacted by the general assembly in order to put those four or five counties into a subdivision where they will either always elect a republican lot of judges or a democratic lot of judges, and unfortunately we can not get away from these subdivisions that have been created under that system, and we are not able even to be relieved to any extent by that act of the legislature which requires the election of judges on a nonpartisan ballot. I just mention that in passing, not that it is anything against the judges or against the men elected to office, although they have been elected on a partisan ballot in the past, and under such arrangement one subdivision belongs to one political party and another subdivision to another political party. Nor is that all of the objection. In order to create the condition where that might exist, the general assembly has frequently made inequitable subdivisions of a political judicial district. Now, it was unfortunate that those districts were defined and crystallized in the constitution, because long before this day the inequalities that existed would have been remedied by the general assembly and we would not now have the condition that confronts us, and this proposal that is offered in here would not be necessary. When we start to get away from the existing conditions we have several things to consider.

1. We can not possibly get along without the court of common pleas holding at least two or three terms a year in each county of the state in order to take care of the legal business that arises in that county. Being a court of such general jurisdiction, it is indispensable. So that we were confronted in the first instance by the thought that possibly the probate court, being one of much more limited jurisdiction, might be abolished, and the power of the probate court conferred on the court of common pleas, and then we would have a court of common pleas to take care of all the trial business before a jury and in equity and exercising functions of a probate court as they are exercised under the present constitution. Accordingly I prepared a proposal of this kind and had it referred to the Judiciary committee. I may be pardoned for saying that that proposal was what we might call a skirmisher, to find out what the Judiciary committee thought about it, and I found out in decided terms that some of the members of the committee would never listen to abolishing the probate court and the conferring of its jurisdiction on the common pleas court, because in some parts of the state that court had become dear to the people and in some parts of the state they considered it an indispensable court, just as indispensable as the court of common pleas. Therefore, by instruction of the Judiciary committee, I prepared two other proposals. One of those proposals is the one now before us and the proposal now before us has within it a provision, as you will see upon examination, that if the people of any county desire to abolish their probate court and confer the powers and jurisdiction of that court upon the court of common pleas they may do so, and, after they try it and find it is not to their best interest that such a thing has been done, they can again by popular vote re-establish the probate court. So that we have a probate court in existence all over the state of Ohio just as it is now, if the people in any community want it, and we have a proposal whereby the probate court can be done away with and merged into the common pleas court in any county of Ohio if the people desire to do so.

Judge of Court of Common Pleas for Each County.

Mr. ELSON: I suppose the sole object of combining the two is to save time and expense and it is intended to apply to the small counties.

Mr. HALFHILL: That is quite right. It has a utilitarian side to it that I will discuss later.

Mr. BEATTY, of Wood: For information I want to ask the author of this proposal a question. This provision says, "There shall be established in each county, a probate court, which shall be a court of record, open at all times." That means "always" does it not?

Mr. HALFHILL: That means open at all times when it is legal to transact business. That is the term used in the present constitution, if I remember correctly.

Mr. KERR: Does not that mean that the court shall not be closed, that it shall have continuous terms?

Mr. HALFHILL: I think the terms are continuous. It means that it shall be open at all business times.

Mr. MAUCK: In those counties which now have no court of common pleas, would one be elected this fall if this proposal is ratified?

Mr. HALFHILL: It expressly says that judges of the common pleas court in office and elected thereto prior to January 1, 1913, shall continue to hold their offices.

Mr. MAUCK: An amendment goes into effect as soon as voted upon?

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. MAUCK: Now if this is adopted this fall, will the counties that have none, elect a judge this fall?

Mr. HALFHILL: That will be taken care of in the schedule, and it will be effectively stated so there will be no friction.

We started out with the assumption that we could not get along without a common pleas court in each and every county. I think that is evident. That is to say, we must hold a court in each county to settle personal disputes and differences and define and protect property rights, because that is a part of our civilization. We must maintain a court in each and every county, but in holding that court we are at the same time at a disadvantage, because we do not have a judge in each and every county; so we thought we could make the central proposal with two objects in view or possibly more.

2. We would wipe out these awkward judicial districts, which ought never to have been in the constitution, by saying the county shall be the unit, the judge shall be elected within the county, the judge shall reside within the county and each county shall have a judge. So we have accomplished that much. We have unshackled the judges so that their authority, if they are assigned thereto, extends to any part of the state of Ohio. I believe after considering what is done in other states, that that is of itself a very beneficial thing.

Mr. WINN: If this amendment is agreed to it makes the judges of the common pleas court county officers.

Mr. HALFHILL: I think not.

Mr. WINN: Do you see any objection to changing section 1 of your proposal so that it would provide that each county of the state shall constitute a common pleas district and one resident judge, and such additional resident judges, etc., shall be elected? The old constitution provides the state shall be divided into a certain number of common pleas districts.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes.

Mr. WINN: Would it not be advisable to provide here that each county in the state shall constitute a common pleas district instead of saying that we should elect one judge in each county?

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir; I think not, because the county is a political subdivision that antedates the constitution, and it is entirely possible that the legislature may want to change the common pleas judicial district. It is entirely possible when the general assembly comes to consider the re-establishing of the districts for the common pleas court that it will make ten districts, and possibly, as population and property increase, twelve districts; and the general assembly may find it a very good arrangement to make a common pleas district co-ordinate with the limits of the circuit court or court of appeals districts and to have a chief justice of the common pleas court elected in that district, etc. So we did not think it was wise to use the word "district" in the constitution because we provide in substance that they shall be elected in a certain limit, to-wit, a county, and that makes it a district.

Mr. WINN: Did you consider carefully as to whether or not this will make the judges county officers?

Mr. HALFHILL: I think it would be impossible that they might be made county officers when it defines them as state officers elected in a county.

Mr. WINN: So is the county treasurer.

Mr. HALFHILL: Yes, but this goes further. This extends the jurisdiction of these officers throughout the state of Ohio. It puts them under the supervision, until the legislature otherwise declares, of the chief justice of the supreme court. It ties up the entire judicial system, one part with the other, so that it seems to me impossible that it should be construed into anything else than a state office and all common pleas judges will be constitutional officers.

Mr. RILEY: Have you figured how many judges you will have under this arrangement?

Mr. HALFHILL: I am coming to that. To look a little further into the economic part of it, the legislature of Ohio has established the salaries of the common pleas judges as follows, in section 2251 General Code of Ohio:

Judges of the common pleas and superior courts, each $3,000.

Then follows section 2252:

In addition to the salary allowed by the preceding section, each judge of the court of common pleas and of the superior court shall receive an annual salary equal to sixteen dollars for each one thousand population of the county in which he resided when elected or appointed, as ascertained by the federal census next preceding his assuming the duties of such office, if in a separate judicial subdivision. Such additional salary shall be paid quarterly from the treasury of the county upon the warrant of the county auditor. If he resides in a judicial subdivision comprising more than one county, such additional salary shall be paid from the treasuries of the several counties of the subdivision in proportion to such population thereof upon the warrants of the auditors of such counties. In no case shall such additional salary be less than one thousand dollars or more than three thousand dollars.

Judge of Court of Common Pleas for Each County.

The time of the delegate here expired and on motion it was extended to allow him to finish his remarks.

Mr. HALFHILL: So that by the limit of this statute the common pleas judges can not be paid less than $4,000 and his salary can not exceed $6,000. When you come to look at that feature of it, and when you reckon that with this proposal you can, if you so desire, in the small counties combine two courts, you will see that we have perhaps something here proposed to the people of the state that will not only help greatly in the administration of justice, but will save a considerable amount of money to each county, if it desires to save it, because there are only twenty-two counties in the state that do not have a resident common pleas judge; but those twenty-two counties are frequently part and parcel of an awkward subdivision where by virtue of the situation the people of an entire subdivision are delayed in their matters before the court and it has worked excessive hardships, so that when you take justice right to the home, to every man's door, by saying the court of common pleas shall be within his county and open practically all the year, you have conferred a considerable boon. That on a basis of a salary of $4,000 a year would only amount to $88,000. The state of Ohio would be paying for those twenty-two judges to take care of and properly administer justice right at the door of every man; and, as has been said, justice delayed is justice denied.

The condition that exists in some of our counties is not to the credit of the state of Ohio, and it is impossible to escape that condition because of the frequent changes the judges have to make from one county to another. You may realize in a small way the disadvantages when you know that sometimes a judge is presiding over a court and before half of the business is ended he must pick up and go to some other county. Then he comes back the next time and begins all over again, and that in a small way describes what the judge has to contend with in leaving a docket unfinished and never getting through, going from one place to another, leaving unfinished work behind. All of those delays will be done away with if we have some one in each county ready to transact business all the time.

The probate judge by statute gets as a salary $100 for each one thousand inhabitants for the first fifteen thousand and then he gets $65 per thousand up to and including the next fifteen thousand and $55 per thousand up to and including the third fifteen thousand, so that in a county of forty-five thousand population the probate judge himself gets the sum of $3,400, and in addition to that all of the clerk hire of that court is awarded and paid by the county commissioners out of the county treasury. So you will readily see that in a county of forty thousand or forty-five thousand population with the salary of the probate judge $3,400 and the addition of the salaries of the clerks and deputies the amount will soon aggregate $5,000. You could in any county of the state, if desirable, and if the two judges were not necessary, combine those two courts by merging the probate into the common pleas court. And remember that this salary paid to the probate judge is paid out of the pockets of the people living in the county. Everybody prosecuting business in the probate court where they probate a will or distribute an estate pays a tax in the form of fees which is later transferred to the county treasury and then paid back in the way of salary, so that all of these fees come out of the pockets of the residents of these counties.

Three thousand dollars of the salaries of the judge of the common pleas is already paid by the state because he is a state officer, and the people of the county would not have a great additional amount to pay. If there were forty thousand people in the county they would only have $640 to pay, based on the existing statute, in order to have the services of a common pleas court and a probate court, if you combine the two.

Mr. REDINGTON: Is it not true that some common pleas judges are drawing their salaries based on the population of the district of which they are part?

Mr. HALFHILL: There was a circuit court case involving that decided in the eastern part of the state some time ago which changed the rule. That case is now in the supreme court, and in my judgment will be reversed.

Mr. REDINGTON: Would not that work a hardship in the small counties, if the small county would have to pay the judge's salary based on the district?

Mr. HALFHILL: It would make the conditions harder on the small counties. Now these twenty-two judges that would be created would have authority to go to any county where they might be needed. For instance, in my county there is a great deal of the time when we ought to have two judges, but we have only one and he is there only part of the time. There are many counties in the northern part of the state, where there are great factories and great industrial establishments, to which the judge could come from some other county for a few weeks and help out in a way that would be very satisfactory.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: There was a suggestion made to me by the judge of one of the courts in the state to the effect that that particular provision would work a hardship on the judges in that there was no provision made for paying the expenses of travel of the judge in going to the different parts of the state. He would also be subjected to extraordinary charges for living expenses.

Mr. HALFHILL: The judge was misinformed on that point, because there is a provision in the present law allowing expenses to the extent of $150.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: That would not amount to much.

Mr. HALFHILL: One hundred and fifty dollars would pay for several weeks' expenses and he would only be called out a few weeks at a time in any one year and he would probably be sent close to his district. The chief justice would attend to that and he would not send a judge clear across the state if it could be avoided.

There is another provision here that you do not want to lose sight of. How many of you gentlemen in this Convention who are not members of the legal profession know those members of the bar in an adjoining county that are qualified to be a judge of a court?

Judge of Court of Common Pleas for Each County.

Mr. DOTY: I know lots of them.

Mr. HALFHILL: You who are not members of the legal profession, or professional politicians, would not know who is qualified to be a common pleas judge, and there will be an advantage in this, that when you get the election down to your own county each individual will very likely have a much more potent influence in selecting a good man for the office of judge than you would if that particular man resided in some one of two or three other counties constituting a subdivision.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: The laity may not know the fact, but the lawyers no doubt do know the fact that same counties have not a man in it fit to be a judge of the court. What condition would you be in then?

Mr. HALFHILL: It would be a good idea to propagate a few lawyers there. I know of no such conditions existing anywhere in Ohio.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I do.

Mr. STILWELL: In what county? Not in yours?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Oh, no.

Mr. HALFHILL: They are not in your congressional district, are they?

So when you come to select this judge and come to vote on a nonpartisan ballot you will eventually get more satisfactory judges in those counties where the county is not now of itself a subdivision; and this is something that intimately interests and touches all the people of the state of Ohio.

I think it is necessary to supplement the attempt that has been made to reform the judicial system of Ohio by adopting this proposal, and I hope it will receive the hearty approval of the Convention. I thank you for your undivided and earnest attention.

Mr. PECK: This matter was very thoroughly considered by the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights. It was before us a long time. I think it was perhaps more thoroughly discussed than anything we had before us, but it was not out of any difficulty about the first proposition as to the one judge of the court of common pleas for each county. That was one thing that every member of the committee was agreed upon and there was absolutely no opposition to it. The difficulty grew out of the proposition to combine the probate court and the common pleas court. There was a strong party in favor of the abolition of the probate court and the consolidation of the power of that court with the court of the common pleas and there was a still stronger party opposed to that proposition. Finally it was settled by the agreement embodied in the proposal to the effect that any county might have that sort of an arrangement if it voted for it. That is the present arrangement by which the people of the county may consolidate the two courts by a vote if they wish to get rid of one of them.

Now the idea of one judge of the court of common pleas to each county struck every one very favorably. The members from counties other than the one from which I come knew more about it than I did. Personally, I did not come here with much information on the subject, because you notice by reading the constitution of 1851 the county of Hamilton was favored in that matter as it was provided that the county of Hamilton shall constitute a district by itself. We have always had our judges to ourselves and never had any trouble. The average lawyer in Hamilton county does not know there is any such thing as subdivisions or common pleas districts, and it is only when they meet with the common pleas judges on some formal matter that it occurs to any of us that there is such a thing as a common pleas division. We have had no trouble. It will continue the same if each county has its own judges.

There was great complaint, and many members of the Convention came to me and complained about the situation of the common pleas court in their counties and out of them. They say, "We are districted up with this, that and the other county and we can not get a judge when we want one. Our cases are put off from month to month and year to year. The judge comes once in a while. He is always in a hurry and about the time we get fairly going off he goes and we don't see him for another six months. There is a great deal of trouble and our dockets are all behind and there is a great delay in the administration of justice." So they all got the idea that each county should have the court of common pleas, and it is a correct idea. As I understood it, the principal reason for districting in 1851 was an economic one. The state of Ohio at that time was comparatively poor. You can see from other things in the constitution how extremely economical the convention was, and a number of small counties at that time really had no need for a court of common pleas for themselves, but now there are very few counties in the state that ought not to have a separate court of common pleas, and they will grow up to it in a few years. With the increase of population and business of the state the time is very near when there will be no county in Ohio that will not need a common pleas court, and I do not believe there are any counties in Ohio that can not furnish a man fitted for the position. I don't take any stock in that statement.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If you would go among the laymen a little you might get some information.

Mr. PECK: I have seen lawyers from a good many parts of the state and I do not believe there is any one here who will admit there is any county in his district that hasn't a lawyer fit to be judge of the common pleas court. I do not think you will get anybody to rise on the floor of this Convention and admit it. I do not know of any such county and I have not heard of one. The statement was a surprise, but if there should be such counties they can take a layman until they can grow a lawyer, as suggested by the member from Allen. The truth of the matter is there ought to be a court of common pleas in each county, and the slight difference in the matter of expense ought not to cut any figure in consideration with the great gain that is made in the convenience of the people. These courts are the creatures of the people. The court of common pleas has always been the court of the people of Ohio, as its name indicates. It has great general jurisdiction, legal and equitable, civil and criminal.

Mr. DWYER: And this gives the common pleas court jurisdiction all over the state.

Mr. PECK: Jurisdiction is given in every county. They can hold a court in any county of the state when the chief justice sends them there. The chief justice will say, "Mr. Judge, go over into such a county and hold court," and the judge goes over there and proceeds to hold the court. It is a system that ought to work well. Of course the proof of the pudding is in the eating, but so far as can be foreseen by anybody—and there were several ex-judges on the committee and we had the advice and assistance of Mr. Halfhill, the proposer of the measure—we believe that this is a valuable reform and a good thing for the state of Ohio, and that it will assist in the speedy administration of justice, which is one of the reasons why I insisted upon the adoption of Proposal No. 184, providing for a reform of the supreme court and the institution of a court of appeals.

Judge of Court of Common Pleas for Each County.

This is supplementary to that, and it ought to be carried out. This is a court in which a great many more of the people are directly interested than are interested either in the supreme court or the court of appeals. It is the court of the people and the one to which they ordinarily resort whenever legal remedies are required.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: It requires a good deal of temerity for a layman to speak on a legal subject, but I have had a great deal of interest in this proposal and have considered it and followed it carefully through all its forms. I have concluded it is a good thing if we can afford it. It is a matter of $88,000 to the state. It provides a court in every county and it gives the people of the county the privilege of having only one court, of merging the common pleas court and the probate court into one court. The opposition to the abolition of the probate court is because of the relations of the probate judge with his clientele or constituency and because of the personal, intimate, fraternal and paternal interest that the probate court has been giving in matters of expediency and advice to the patrons of the court. The common pleas judge could not do those things, because the matters might be afterwards brought before him in the court of common pleas and he would be disqualified from sitting in the case, or he might be compelled to nullify his own advice as probate judge because his advice would be incompatible with the law as he afterwards found and it would be contradictory of the constitution. I find, however, after these things have been discussed, and from interviews with a number of people, that there are a great many in different counties of the state who are strongly in favor of abolishing the probate court. In those counties under this proposal that thing can be done in accordance with the wishes of the people and in the interest of economy. I think before this proposal would be in effect very long there would be enough counties that would deem it advisable to abolish one of the courts, and have only the common pleas court, to make up for the added expense we have provided for in this proposal.

Some time ago, in a most extreme emergency, I was justified in getting out an injunction, as everybody recognized and fortunately we had a judge in the town. I secured this injunction, which was of vast importance to me and to others, as it was a case in which we had rights that were important. If the judge had been in Madison county, which is in the judicial district where I live, I would have had to secure a hearing in Madison county; the necessity for an injunction would have been past, and the damage the injunction prevented would have taken place long before we could have done anything. I have talked with a number of gentlemen on this floor who are similarly situated and they are asking for relief. I believe we can give it to them, and I am perfectly confident there is not a man on the floor, lawyer or layman, who does not know it is a good thing. I think the counties that do not need two courts will soon have only one. We will thus save the state a great deal of money and furnish a court to every man to which the people can go in an emergency. I am in favor of the measure and I think everybody should vote for it.

Mr. OKEY: I move the previous question.

Proposal No. 304—Mr. Halfhill. To submit an amendment to the constitution.—Relative to amending sections 1, 3, 12, and 15, or article IV, so that each county will elect at least one judge of the court of common pleas.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 1. That section 3, article IV, be amended to read as follows:

One resident judge of the court of common pleas, and such additional resident judge or judges as may be provided by law, shall be elected in each county of the state by the electors of such county; and as many courts or sessions of the court of common pleas as are necessary, may be held at the same time in any county.

Any judge of such a court of common pleas may temporarily preside and hold court in any county; and until the general assembly shall make adequate provision therefor, the chief justice of the supreme court of the state shall pass upon the disqualification or disability of any judge of the court of common pleas and assign some other judge for such place, or assign any such judge to another county to hold court therein.

SECTION 2. But the general assembly may provide by law to submit to the electors of any county the question of combining the court of common pleas and probate court in such county and provide that such courts shall be combined in any county where a majority of the electors at such election shall so vote. And provision may also be made for similar submission to the electors of the question of the separation of such courts in each county where the same may have been combined and for such separation when a majority of such electors shall so vote.

SECTION 3. That section 12, of article IV, be amended to read as follows:

The judges of the courts of common pleas shall, while in office reside in the county for which they are elected; and their term of office shall be for six (6) years.

SECTION 4. That section 15, of article IV, be amended to read as follows:

The general assembly may increase or diminish the number of judges of the supreme court, may increase beyond one or diminish to one the number of judges of the court of common pleas in any county, or may establish other courts, whenever two-thirds of the members elected to each house shall concur therein; but no such change, addition or diminution shall vacate the office of any judge; and any existing court heretofore created by the general assembly shall continue its existence until otherwise provided by law. The judges of the courts of common pleas in office, or elected thereto prior to January first, 1913, shall continue to hold their offices for the term for which they were elected.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

Mr. DOTY: There are two proposals on the calendar which have not been referred, and I move that the rules be suspended and the two proposals be referred to the proper committees.

The motion was carried.

Proposal No. 332 — Mr. Dunlap. To the committee on Equal Suffrage and Elective Franchise.

Proposal No. 333 — Mr. Peck. To the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

By unanimous consent the following proposal was introduced and read the first time:

Proposal No. 334 — Mr. Jones. To submit an amendment to article II of the constitution. — Relative to the creation of a system for the registration and guaranteeing of land titles and to simplify and facilitate the transfer of real estate.

By unanimous consent Mr. Stilwell offered the following resolution:

Resolution No. 109:

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That the Honorable William H. Lewis, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, be invited to address the Convention Tuesday morning, April 30, at 9:30 o'clock.

Mr. STILWELL: I move that the rules be suspended and that we consider the resolution at once.

DELEGATES: No.

Mr. STILWELL: I suggest that the gentleman is in the city at this time —

Mr. PECK: Well, we don't want him.

Mr. STILWELL: —and the hour set will not disturb the Convention.

The motion to suspend the rules was lost.

Mr. FACKLER: I ask unanimous consent to submit a report of the Short Ballot committee.

Consent was given and Mr. Fackler submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Short Ballot, to which was referred Proposal No. 16 — Mr. Elson, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendment and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out all of line 9 after the words "Term of office" and all of line 10 up to the period — and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The governor, lieutenant governor and auditor of state, shall hold their offices for four years, beginning with the officials elected in 1914. The auditor of state elected in 1912 shall hold his office for two years only."

Mr. HOSKINS: Where does that report go?

The SECRETARY: It is up for consideration now.

The VICE PRESIDENT: This is a report from a select committee to which this was sent.

Mr. HOSKINS: Why doesn't it take its place at the foot of the calendar?

Mr. DOTY: Is not this the situation? The Convention referred the proposal to the committee and the committee reports back, recommending an amendment. Is not the amendment before the Convention now? If we adopt the amendment and it amends the proposal then it goes on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT: The presiding officer understands that we were considering the second reading of the proposal. It was referred back to the committee and this committee now reports it back with an amendment. It will be placed on the calendar, but the question now is on agreeing to the committee's report.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

Reports of Standing Committees.

Mr. DOTY: Inasmuch as this particular proposal has been engrossed and read the second time, it does not come within our rule and I do not know exactly where it goes. My own idea would be that it goes to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. HOSKINS: I move that the proposal be placed at the foot of the calendar.

Mr. DOTY: For tomorrow? That means about two weeks.

The motion was carried.

Mr. PECK: I have a little bunch of things here that my committee worked on yesterday, which I would like to present.

Consent was given and Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 25 — Mr. Bowdle, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. Doty moved that further consideration of the proposal be postponed until tomorrow and that it be placed on the calendar for that day.

The motion was carried.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 3 — Mr. Thomas, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Peck submitted the following report:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 156 — Mr. Davio, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DOTY: It appears that the author of Proposal No. 15 [Mr. RILEY] the other day moved under the rules to take that proposal from the committee, and therefore the committee did not have it to report out. So if there is no objection I move that it be recommitted to the committee so it can come out in regular order.

The motion was carried.

Mr. PECK: Now I bring the report out as follows:

The standing committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights, to which was referred Proposal No. 15 — Mr. Riley, having had the same under consideration, reports it back with the following amendments, and recommends its passage when so amended:

Strike out the words "and such" at the end of line 9 together with all of lines 10 and 11 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "and the number of persons to constitute such grand jury and the concurrence of what number thereof shall be necessary to find such indictment shall be determined by the general assembly."

In line 16 strike out the words "or district".

In line 17 strike out the parenthetical mark "(".

In line 22 strike out the parenthetical mark ")".

In line 24 change the first comma to a semi-colon and insert immediately thereafter the words "but his failure to testify may be considered by the court and jury and the same may be made the subject of comment by counsel."

In line 24 strike out the word "or" and in lieu thereof insert as follows: "No person shall".

In line 24 change the semi-colon to a period and strike out all of the proposal thereafter.

The report was agreed to. The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time in its regular order.

On motion of Mr. Peck the proposal as amended was ordered printed.

insert the following: "The business of buying, selling or handling foodstuffs shall not be subjected to any license or other charge by any municipality."

The proposal was ordered to be engrossed and read the second time.

Leave of absence for the remainder of the week was granted to Mr. Rorick.

Leave of absence for today was granted to Mr. Walker.

Mr. Doty moved that the Convention adjourn until 9 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

Mr. Hoskins moved to amend the motion by striking out the figure "9" and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "10".

The motion to amend was lost.

The original motion was carried.

SIXTY-THIRD DAY

Mr. Earnhart and Mr. Malin voted in the negative. So the proposal passed as follows:

Proposal No. 241 — Mr. Dwyer. To submit an amendment to article II of the constitution.—Relating to impeachment of officials.

Resolved, by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors to read as follows:

SECTION 24a. Laws shall be passed providing for the prompt removal from office, upon complaint and hearing, of all officers, including state officers, judges and members of the general assembly, for any misconduct involving moral turpitude or for other cause provided by law; and this method of removal shall be in addition to impeachment or other method of removal provided.

Under the rules the proposal was referred to the committee on Arrangement and Phraseology.

The PRESIDENT: The next order of business is reading of Proposal No. 325 — Mr. Anderson.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. MARSHALL: With the consent of the Convention, I rise to a question of personal privilege for just a moment. I have a statement that I would like to read to the Convention. I shall occupy only a few moments.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MARSHALL: I want to make a statement.

Mr. DOTY: I object to the statement.

The PRESIDENT: The member will state the matter about which he wishes to be heard.

Mr. MARSHALL: I want to say that when I was a boy going to school —

Mr. DOTY: I renew my point of order.

Mr. MARSHALL: I want to say something about the banquet next Wednesday.

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. MARSHALL: I was going to say —

The PRESIDENT: The member is out of order. The gentleman from Mahoning is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON: Mr. President: This proposal, Proposal No. 325, I regard as of great importance. The need of such a change has been discussed for many years. For years in our part of the state, at different times, the need of just such a change as this proposes to make has been recognized by both the bench and the bar, and it was at the urgent request of Judge Robinson, one of the best men who ever rendered a decision, and of other judges in our part of the state, that I introduced this proposal. As it was originally introduced it read "All acts of the general assembly in derogation of the common law shall be liberally construed." Judge Peck, the chairman of the committee, suggested the language, which I think is better than mine, "Statutes in derogation of the common law shall not be strictly construed." One is affirmatively stated, and the other is negatively stated, and I think Judge Peck's is better. "Derogation," in short, means "repeal." I wish to explain to those not members of the bar that the common law largely consists of customs that have come down through the ages. A custom, when it becomes crystallized thus into a law, has the force of precedent "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." If within the memory of any man something other than the custom existed, then it is not a law, or if there is even a legend when it did not exist, it is not a custom. Not only the customs whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, but judge-made law, about which I spoke some days ago, constitutes the common law. What I mean by judge-made law is the laying down of a certain proposition years and years ago, which was added to by another judge and then by another, until it comes up to us with its accumulated additions. It seems that some of the lawyers have not paid much attention to what constitutes judge-made law. In fact, it seems the first they ever heard of it was on the floor of this Convention. That which I have said in criticism of judge-made law is very mild indeed when you compare it with what President Taft and other men of national reputation have said in reference to it.

When the common law, which is the custom of ages, or the judge-made law, which is part of the common law, becomes a hardship, or fails to properly give the whole remedy that should be given, or for any reason there ought to be a change, you can have relief only through the legislature, because no judge-made law was ever repealed by other judge-made law. In other words, if you want to do away with judge-made law where it works an injustice or fails to give the proper remedy, you have to go into the lawmaking body and have a statute passed.

Now the rule of construction made by the judges is that when you try to remedy the ills of the common law by statutory enactment the construction then put upon that statute shall be strictly against giving the remedy. It always seemed to me a foolish proposition that when you have to go into the legislative body to get the change made the construction shall be that you did not intend to make any change.

Mr. LAMPSON: The point that occurs to me is that if authority by way of a constitutional mandate is given to a court not to construe a statute strictly, would not that operate as a mandate to the court to make judge-made law?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I am afraid I have stated it awkwardly. The desire apparently to still keep judge-made law when, for the purpose of getting away from the ills of judge-made law you go into the general assembly and get laws passed, leads the judges to construe the legislative enactment strictly. In other words they say to the people who had this passed and to the legislature, "You shall not have a remedy under it, but we will keep the judge-made law."

Mr. LAMPSON: Construing a statute strictly would be in accordance with its meaning?

Mr. ANDERSON: You are forgetting the wording of this proposal. This only applies to statutes in derogation of the common law, where you repeal the common law by statutory enactment. That is the scope of this proposal.

Mr. NORRIS: Do you define the common law as what you call judge-made law?

Mr. ANDERSON: That is part of it.

Mr. NORRIS: What is the remainder of it?

Mr. ANDERSON: Customs whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

Mr. NORRIS: What is your definition of judge-made law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you really want a definition?

Mr. NORRIS: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: It is law which the judges have taken it upon themselves to make, law that is not found in the statutes. It is different from statutory or legislative law.

Mr. NORRIS: Are you not in your proposal endeavoring to establish a different rule from that which has always prevailed in Ohio concerning this?

Mr. ANDERSON: What are you going to read from?

Mr. NORRIS: Cooley's "Constitutional Limitations." A gentleman happened to have the book, and I just picked it up, and I will read the definition of the common law:

Common law consists of those maxims of freedom, order, enterprise and thrift, which have prevailed in the conduct of public affairs, the management of private affairs, the regulation of domestic institutions, and the acquisition, control and transfer of property, from time immemorial.

Is not that a definition of the common law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; I gave it—whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. But that is only a part of the common law. That is the common law that comes to us from the ages, the part that is based on custom and custom alone. If there were a legend as to when that was not the common law, then it does not crystallize into law. It must be the kind of custom whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and by reason of the fact that it is so old—I am not criticising it on account of its age—but by reason of the fact that it is so old and that we have made so much progress and that there are so many things now that were not in existence or dreamed of at the time it became the common law, sometimes it is necessary to go into the legislature to have the common law changed. Now, when you do go into the legislature to have it changed this proposal, when it becomes a part of the constitution, says that you must not construe those legislative provisions strictly.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: This proposal prohibits a strict construction being placed upon the statutes in derogation of the common law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Statutes repealing the common law.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: And it says they shall not be strictly construed. That prohibits any court from construing a statute in conformity with this law.

Mr. ANDERSON: No; certainly not.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: If it is not to be strictly construed, how is it to be construed? Is it to be construed according to the whim of the man construing it in any gradation of strictness. There is no limit how it can be construed.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will you not permit me to ask you a question: How do you define the difference between liberal and strict construction? What kind of statutes are construed strictly?

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I do not know.

Mr. ANDERSON: I thought you didn't. Now I want to answer your question so that you may understand. Statutes are construed strictly or liberally. It has been found that certain common law defenses in certain kinds of cases have become obnoxious. So congress proceeded to do away with the common law rule by statutory enactment, to be able to give full relief. The supreme court of the United States had to change the rule of construction, because if it had followed the construction of the Ohio supreme court, the strict construction of the statutes repealing the common law, there would have been no relief. They decided those statutes were remedial, and therefore should not be strictly construed.

Construction of Statutes in Derogation of the Common Law.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: This absolutely prohibits construction according to its terms. It says it shall not be construed according to its terms.

Mr. ANDERSON: That does not mean that to a lawyer.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: It makes no difference whether you are a lawyer or not; it is a question of the meaning of the term.

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; it is not a question of the meaning of a term. Please remember the controlling part of that sentence is "the common law." If you will all the time have that in view when you are discussing this you will know what is aimed at.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: You admit you are giving more power than now exists?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; taking power away.

Mr. REDINGTON: Prefacing my remarks by the statement that I am asking for information only: Our legislature has codified some of the common law. For instance, as I understand, our legislature has codified the law in regard to notes and bills, and about warehousemen, consignors and consignees, fixing the liability of a maker of a note, the drawer of a bill and the indorser of commercial paper, etc. The query in my mind is what effect will this constitutional provision have upon such statutes when you say that the court must not strictly construe those statutes?

Mr. ANDERSON: Are the statutes you refer to in derogation or repeal of the common law? They have nothing to do with the common law at all.

Mr. REDINGTON: I assume when they have codified—

Mr. ANDERSON: The statutes you refer to have nothing to do with the common law at all.

Mr. REDINGTON: And they have codified others—

Mr. ANDERSON: But this has nothing to do with codification.

Mr. REDINGTON: The subject of commercial paper is a subject in the common law.

Mr. ANDERSON: This proposal only refers to cases where the common law does not give the proper remedy or there is hardship under it. Then you go into the law-making body and repeal the common law by a statutory enactment. That is the only thing to which this proposal applies.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: I will ask you if under this proposal the criminal lawyer would not reap a considerable advantage?

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: In other words, is it not to the interest of the criminal lawyer—

Mr. ANDERSON: I wish you would suggest that to the gentleman from Medina.

Mr. KING: I want to ask you whether the statute creating a crime or offense wholly unknown, previous to the passage of the statute, or wholly unknown in the common law, is a statute in derogation of the common law?

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not believe it is, but you are asking a difficult question. If it is not known to the common law it could not be in derogation to that, if it didn't exist before.

Mr. FACKLER: Do you think the negotiable instrument code is not in derogation of the common law, and does it not set aside the law commercial with reference to commercial papers?

Mr. ANDERSON: It does, but not in the instance he cited. In the codification of it?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON: Does this have any reference to codification?

Mr. FACKLER: Yes; the law in many instances in our country is different from statutory law.

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, and they have statutory law because the common law did not give the proper relief. Now, I do not care to take up further time—

Mr. HALFHILL: I understand your proposition to be that you would apply to remedial statutes the same rule of construction?

Mr. ANDERSON: No; I said that in the instances I stated, where laws were passed because under the common law hardships were had, under the common law the judge-made defenses of assumption of risks, contributory negligence, fellow servants, etc., were so obnoxious that congress, so far as they could legislate in reference to interstate commerce, wanted to do away with such defenses, and consequently congress passed certain laws. Now the judges in some of the lower courts attempted to apply the rule of strict construction to these safety-appliance statutes and really nullified them, and I gave you many instances where that very thing was done in Ohio. Then the supreme court of the United States, wishing that those safety-appliance laws should prevail, called them remedial statutes, and said they should not be construed strictly.

Mr. DWYER: Remedial statutes are not strictly construed.

Mr. ANDERSON: No, sir; and the supreme court had to put these in the class of remedial statutes to keep from construing them strictly.

Mr. HALFHILL: Is it not possible for them to construe them broadly enough to cut off the common law?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes, and that was done, but even with the doing of it, after congress, in section 8 of the appliance law, stated that the defense of assumption of risk should not be set up by the master, that very thing was done.

Mr. PECK: I have never been satisfied with this and I want to offer a few words.

Mr. KRAMER: This proposal sounds well, but I would like to know what the supreme court would do when one of these matters came to it?

Mr. ANDERSON: That is rather a difficult question. The effect depends largely on who constitute the supreme court.

Mr. KRAMER: That is what I think.

Mr. ANDERSON: But we should do what we can toward relief by causing a proper construction to be made of statutes passed for the one purpose of correcting the hardships which exist under the common law.

Mr. KRAMER: I didn't hear the answer to Mr. Lamson's question. If the courts are not construing the statute strictly, according to its meaning, does it not give the courts more power than they have now?

Mr. ANDERSON: Are you not getting interpretation and construction mixed?

Construction of Statutes in Derogation of the Common Law.

Mr. KRAMER: I don't know.

Mr. ANDERSON: I think that is what Mr. Lampson had in mind, interpretation and not construction. This applies to construction and not to interpretation.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM: Commercial paper has been referred to, and the code, which is an interpretation or rule of construction. There are well-known rules governing commercial paper, and ought not statutes which change well-known rules receive a strict construction?

Mr. ANDERSON: They should receive a strict interpretation, but there is a difference between interpretation and construction. This applies to the general rule of construction and not interpretation.

Mr. DOTY: I desire to offer an amendment to this proposal.

The amendment was read as follows:

Strike out lines 4 and 5, and insert "No court of this state shall exercise any power not conferred by the constitution or by law."

Mr. DOTY: Of course I cannot enter upon a discussion of any legal matter without fear and trembling, but after all we laymen have been learning a good deal of law this year, and quite a little this morning. We had one class over there under a professor, and we had a de novo class over here under a doctor, and therefore it is impossible for any of us who have any degree of intelligence not to have absorbed some law.

Mr. BROWN, of Highland: Which law do you refer to, statutory law or common law?

Mr. DOTY: I do not think it is particularly necessary to point out which law—just law.

Mr. PECK: Any old kind.

Mr. DOTY: I read Blackstone once years ago. That was sometime back, but I was a reporter in police courts, justices courts and other courts, and I have absorbed some legal knowledge there. I have also attended several sessions of the general assembly, and this session, so far, of this Constitutional Convention, and I know I have absorbed in various ways, not very deep into the skin, but a large, though perhaps inexact, knowledge of the law.

Mr. PECK: I rise to a point of order. The amendment proposed is not germane to the proposal amended. It has nothing to do with that subject.

Mr. DOTY: May I be heard on that point of order? I have five minutes on the point of order.

The PRESIDENT: The president will rule the point of order not well taken.

Mr. DOTY: That knocks me out of five minutes. The member who has introduced this proposal has made some remarks here at various times in derogation—I believe that would be a good word—of the supreme court making law. As near as I can make out, this proposal says the court can make some more law. I may be wrong. If I am, that is the fourth mistake I ever made in my life. It looks to me as though that is what he is up to. That is what I want to stop. I want to stop the judges from making any more law. I think if that amendment that I have offered is made part of the fundamental law of the state of Ohio, it will have a tendency to prevent the judges from making any more law, and I therefore hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. NORRIS: I want to compliment the gentleman.

I don't know anything about the amendment, but he struck the keynote in his speech.

Mr. DOTY: It was purely inadvertent on my part, if I did, Judge.

Mr. NORRIS: This proposal simply opens the door for judge-made law.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have been hoping that this Convention would not reach the silly stage before hot weather, but in this proposal we have the most concrete evidence that we have reached the silly stage already. Most of us have heard before the phrase "judge-made law." We had two hours of it some days ago. We had it rehearsed and boiled down on a question of personal privilege. It fell down, flickered out, and we had hoped expired the other evening. Now we have it again before us.

It seems to me that the proposal itself is not worthy of the consideration of this Convention at the rate of $300 an hour. I have noted that though the report of the committee recommended the adoption of this proposal with the amendment as presented, still the chairman of the committee does not sign it, and I have come to have a good deal of confidence in the judgment of the chairman of the committee on Judiciary and Bill of Rights.

Mr. ANDERSON: Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. KNIGHT: No, sir; I have never asked the gentleman a question while he was speaking, and I prefer not to yield.

I object to amending the constitution of the state of Ohio to help the private practice of attorneys. It seems to me that this proposal has that principal object in view, that it will be especially beneficial to the private practice of attorneys in damage suits.

The common law of England, which underlies the law of this country, is good. It is the growth of custom, and custom which all of us, whether we know it or not, follow in our every-day business and in nearly all of the transactions of life. It does not need a lawyer to know many of the things which are the common law. Hardly a day passes in the life of a single one of us that we are not doing things that we have a right to do because that right has come down to us from time immemorial in the common law. It has been almost if not the invariable practice in all the states of this country that statutes enacted by the legislature undertaking to modify customs, which customs have crystallized into the best kind of law, shall be strictly construed, and just as little of these customs removed without our knowing it as is possible. This proposal undertakes to reverse the course of procedure which it is vital to us to have retained. Every law which seeks to change the common law ought to be strictly construed. Further, this proposal is a direct mandate to the courts to construe statutes—I apologize for having to use the phrase judge-made law—to authorize judge-made law of the worst kind, worse than we have ever had. It seems to me the proposal is one that can well be dispensed with, and I therefore move that the proposal and pending amendment be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PECK: I assented to this proposal, and perhaps suggested the wording with some hesitation in the committee. I did not then and do not now feel certain about the entire propriety of it, but I have seen some curious results worked out of statutory law by judges from the application of that rule. I have seen statutes beneficial nullified by a strict construction of that rule. The statutes were strictly construed until they were all frittered away. I do not believe in that sort of construction, and I have not much to do with what the gentleman terms damage suits. My practice has not been in that line, and I was not thinking of that class of cases when I assented to that proposal. I was thinking of it in a general way. When the general assembly passes a law it should be given effect. I think we are all agreed to that, and it should not be frittered away by a series of constructions, and I propose to add at the end of the present proposal as it now stands these words by way of amendment: "But the same shall be fairly and liberally construed to effect the object of the statute." I do not suppose I can do that under the motion to indefinitely postpone, but if I do have opportunity to offer that amendment, I shall offer it.

Construction of Statutes in Derogation of the Common Law.

Mr. HALFHILL: I would like, before the vote is taken, to have the proposal read with the Doty amendment.

The SECRETARY: The amendment of Mr. Doty strikes out all the original proposal and the proposal would then read:

Resolved by the Constitutional Convention of the state of Ohio, That a proposal to amend the constitution shall be submitted to the electors, to read as follows: "No court in this state shall exercise any power not conferred by the constitution or by law."

Mr. HALFHILL: I confess it does strike the original proposal all out. It is a finishing stroke, delivered with swiftness and dispatch at the center of the target. But as to the main proposal or any amendment that may be offered thereto, permit me to say I can conceive how a proposal like that may be introduced here in entire good faith, but it is revolutionary to an extent that we hardly can comprehend the amount of revolution that would be comprised in those few words. The common law is the great fountain of learning that we draw from, both the courts and the legislature, and we must remember that it is a great body of law. The common law has judicial records going back for seven hundred years in England, and there are reported cases back for six hundred years. Of course, for the first three hundred years it is in barbarous law—French or Latin—but for the last three hundred years we have reports in our own tongue, and in all of those the great body of our rights and privileges as citizens are well defined. Now when our ancestors as colonists came here and established for themselves the several colonial governments they were secured in all of those rights and privileges by virtue of being English subjects, and we have succeeded to them, and what I want to point out is that they are perhaps greater in their scope and extent than all the legislative acts of all the states of the federal union. In fact, we can scarcely afford to cast aside the common law as it is defined, or else we will lose our bearings when we enact statutes and bring them before the courts for construction and interpretation. It was said by the proponent [Mr. ANDERSON] that the common law is not applied strictly, or that the rule of construction is not applied strictly, to remedial statutes, and that is true.

But we have two classes of legislative enactments. One class deals with remedies. Sometimes they call that adjective law. Then we have another class that deals with rights and privileges, and that is substantive law. All of the adjective law, all of the remedies and rules of evidence, never came within the common law rule of construction at any time, and therefore this proposal could not apply; and when it comes to the substantive law of rights and privileges, we all know what the rights and privileges are, and we can know by the decisions of the courts defining these rights and privileges whenever an innovation is made upon them by the legislature. Then and at all times we have a definite base line to start from as a rule of construction and anything else would be chaos.

Permit me to read the rule of construction given in Sutherland:

Such statutes as take away a common law right, remove or add to common law disabilities, confer privileges, or provide for proceedings unknown to the common law, or in derogation of the common law, are strictly construed.

Those are simply the statutes that deal with substantive rights, privileges and disabilities affecting the rights of persons, and the rights of property, and in no way at all referring to court procedure or remedial law. We have now a definite rule of construction, and I submit the proposition as suggested here is wrong in this, that it removes a definite starting place, to-wit, the common law, and you do not have a definite ending place, to-wit, strict construction on statutes governing rights and privileges, and then you have no stake set, no point at which the judge may stop, and instead of the law becoming a fixed rule of action, with a definite starting place and a definite stopping place, you would have the law administered according to the idea of the particular judge who is construing that particular statute.

Mr. DOTY: A point of order. The gentleman's time has expired.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman has thirty seconds still.

Mr. HALFHILL: I can answer the gentleman from Mahoning, who I see has risen.

Mr. ANDERSON: Is not this the fact, that you go into the legislature to get relief because the common law does not give the remedy or this relief?

Mr. HALFHILL: Undoubtedly so.

Mr. ANDERSON: Then should not that remedy or correction which the lawmaking body gives be construed so as to carry out the real object of the law?

Mr. HALFHILL: No. The legislature should clearly define its own remedy, and then the court will construe it according to the expressed language, which ought to plainly set forth the object of the law.

Mr. FESS: It appearing that everybody has spoken that wants to, and desiring to bring this matter to a vote, I move that the whole matter be tabled.

The motion was seconded.

The PRESIDENT: All those in favor will say aye, and the contrary no. The motion is carried.

Mr. ANDERSON: We didn't have an opportunity to vote on the motion to table. I move that the motion to table be reconsidered.

Construction of Statutes in Derogation of the Common Law.

Mr. DOTY: I rise to a point of order. It is against our rules to reconsider a motion to table.

Mr. ANDERSON: I move that it be taken from the table then. I know as little about parliamentary proceedings as Mr. Doty does about law. My object is to have a ye and nay vote on the proposition.

Mr. FESS: I make a point of order that the gentleman cannot make a motion to take from the table unless he suspends the rules.

The PRESIDENT: The point is well taken.

Mr. DOTY: You can make that Monday night.

The PRESIDENT: The next business is amended Proposal No. 240, which will now be read.

The proposal was read the second time.

Mr. ANDERSON: Gentlemen of the Convention: This may seem to be helping the practice of some lawyers—

Mr. DOTY: Not mine.

Mr. ANDERSON: I do not know how it may appeal to those who are so well qualified in the law by reason of associating with some law professor in some college. I presume that all that is needed to be expert in all branches of the law is to have some experience like that.

Now, I have had some experience—I suppose I have had more experience where the individual is on one side and the corporation on the other than most here. I have made that a life study. I did not take it up intentionally in the first place, but I drifted into it, and I have made it a study and I ought to be more familiar with its hardships than those who have conducted the practice of law generally. The proposal you have just voted down would not in any way aid a damage lawyer, the professors to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HOSKINS: May I ask you a question?

Mr. ANDERSON: You may not. I will not yield to you. You will never yield when I want to ask a question.

I say that all of those statutes passed to assist the individual are liberally construed because they are remedial statutes. The professor did not know that. I ask this particular professor to consult his fellow professor at the noon hour.

Now the limitation of recovery, by legislative enactment in Ohio, is $10,000 in case of death, where no widow and minor children are left. Where minor children and a widow are left, dependent upon the husband and father killed, the legislative limitation in Ohio is $12,000. Let me give you the rule of law. This is by the supreme court of Ohio, and it has not been overruled by a university professor. I read from 55th Ohio State, page 517:

In arriving at the total amount of damages in such cases (death cases) the jury should consider the pecuniary injury to each separate beneficiary, not found guilty of contributory negligence, but the verdict should be for a gross sum, not exceeding $10,000.

Let me illustrate. Say that Mr. Donahey while coming to this Convention is killed by a head-on collision or by a derailment. His widow and his children would be entitled to recover. I understand that Mr. Donahey has been blessed with eight children. So he would leave a wife and eight children. In arriving at the amount of damage in such cases the jury must consider the pecuniary injury to each separate beneficiary. In other words, the jury in trying that case would be told by the trial judge, "You must take into consideration the money loss to the widow, and the money loss to each one of her eight children, and then return a gross sum not exceeding $12,000." In other words, the jury would take the amount of money that Mr. Donahey is earning in his business—not what he is making at the Convention here—and they would consider that, and they would consider his expectation of life, and they would consider the money lost to the wife and to each of the eight children, but they couldn't go above the $12,000. Now any of you can see that that amount could not be right.

Different states have put this into their constitution. Utah (1895):

Art. XVI, Sec. 5. The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated, and the amount recoverable shall not be subject to any statutory limitation.

Kentucky (1890):

Sec. 54. The general assembly shall have no power to limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to person or property.

Oklahoma (1907):

Art. XXIII, Sec. 7. The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated, and the amount recoverable shall not be subject to any statutory limitation.

To you who are not attorneys, and are not connected with any institution where law is taught, I wish to explain that at common law the right of recovery for wrongful death did not exist. That right can only be created by statute. Consequently, it says "the right of action shall not be abrogated."

Certainly if Pennsylvania, where there are so many industrial plants, where there are so many men employed on railroads, where there are so many men killed each year, can have this section in their constitution, Ohio could not go very far wrong by following Pennsylvania's example.

Pennsylvania (1873):

Art. III, Sec. 21. No act of the general assembly shall limit the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to persons or property; and, in case of death from injuries, the right of action shall survive, and the general assembly shall prescribe for whose benefit such actions shall be prosecuted. No act shall prescribe any limitations of time within which suits may be brought against the corporations for injuries to persons or property, or for other causes different from those fixed by general laws regulating actions against natural persons, and such acts now existing are void.

Now the great state of New York has thousands and thousands of men employed on railroads and in industries.

Construction of Statutes in Derogation of the Common Law—Mechanics' and Builders' Liens.

New York (1894):

Art. I, Sec. 18. The right of action now existing to recover damages for injuries resulting in death, shall never be abrogated; and the amount recoverable shall not be subject to any statutory limitation.

Mr. DWYER: You have reference to compensatory damages?

Mr. ANDERSON: Yes; the same as discussed in the committee.

Mr. FACKLER: I would like to know how you can reconcile Proposal No. 240, beginning with "The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall not be abrogated", with Proposal No. 24, which we have already passed.

Mr. ANDERSON: What is Proposal No. 24?

Mr. FACKLER: That provides that the state may provide compulsory workmen's compensation and employers' liability laws, and limit the right of recovery.

Mr. ANDERSON: The mere reading of it covers it. I am very much in favor of workmen's compensation laws.

Mr. FACKLER: If any injury results in death, the workmen's compensation act limits the amount of the recovery, takes away the very thing that this provides for.

Mr. ANDERSON: Add to this, then, "provided that nothing herein shall in any way affect the authority of the general assembly to enact a workmen's compensation law," and we can fix it in two minutes.

Now it may be said that the corporations, or those causing the death, would not be properly protected, but they are protected, first in the trial court by a motion for a new trial, which goes to the learned judge, and the judge can cut down a verdict to any sum he thinks proper. Not only that, but if the common pleas judge fails to cut down the amount given by the jury then the circuit court or the court of appeals has the absolute right to cut down the amount, provided the learned judges believe it to be too large.

Mr. CROSSER: Is it not a fact that that amendment is not at all necessary, for the workmen's compensation law would not be affected?

Mr. ANDERSON: I don't think it is necessary. Let me read you from 22 O. S., page 446:

Where the damages assessed by a jury are excessive, but not in a degree to necessarily imply the influence of passion or prejudice in their finding, the court, in the exercise of sound discretion, may make the remittitur of the excess the condition of refusing to grant a new trial.

In the first place, our statutory law provides if the trial judge believes that the amount given by the jury was induced by prejudice or passion then he can give a new trial, or even if he does not believe that the verdict was induced by prejudice or passion he can still cut it down and can say to the plaintiff in the case, "If you do not accept this amount that I suggest then I will grant a new trial," and the supreme court, in 22 O. S., says the court has that power. Now I do not want to take up too much of your time. As I say, Kentucky, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania and New York have like constitutional provisions, they have had them for a number of years, and they have not worked any hardship there. I believe it is a proper measure for us to adopt here.

Mr. KING: This proposal simply provides for something that can be enacted under the constitution today, and I therefore move to lay it on the table.

The PRESIDENT: The question is on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON: The yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT: All those in favor of the motion say aye, and the contrary no.

Mr. ANDERSON: The yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT: Not now.

Mr. ANDERSON: I demand the yeas and nays. I want the vote recorded.

The PRESIDENT: The motion is carried.

Mr. WINN: May I ask the president if he heard the demand for the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDENT: The rules require that the demand shall be seconded.

DELEGATES: We seconded it.

Mr. WINN: It was seconded.

Mr. ANDERSON: You gave no chance. I don't care much about this, but I want to know what we may expect in the future. There is a right involved here, and I say I was right under parliamentary law and under the rules of this Convention.

The PRESIDENT: The gentleman is out of order. Proposal No. 166 is the next thing in order, by Mr. Stilwell.

The proposal was read for the second time.

Mr. STILWELL: It is my hope that it will not require a great deal of the time of the Convention to dispose of this proposal. The judiciary committee has thoroughly discussed it, and it is my recollection that it was approved without any objection. It is made necessary because of the fact that the mechanics' lien law in Ohio was declared unconstitutional.

Mr. HOSKINS: Before you take your seat I want you to explain why we cannot have this now.

Mr. STILWELL: There was a legal controversy over the former mechanics' lien law, and it was declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of Ohio. The circuit court of appeals of the United States differed from this opinion of the supreme court of Ohio. However, that is of no effect in this state. I want to quote from the language of the circuit court, Judge Lurton delivering the opinion, referring to the mechanics' lien law. I am not going to read the full decision, but only parts here and there that are applicable:

With every disposition to come to an agreement with the views of the supreme court of Ohio, in the interest of harmony of decision, we are nevertheless compelled to express our inability to assent to the conclusions of that learned and impartial tribunal as to the validity of the legislation under which complainant's rights are claimed. The decision of that court was not placed upon any merely local or peculiar provision of the constitution of Ohio. The ground upon which they placed their objection to the law was that it was an unreasonable and oppressive restraint upon the owner's liberty of contract.

This restraint upon an owner's liberty of contract, the learned court said, was prohibited by those declarations of the Ohio bill of rights which declare that among the inalienable rights of man is "the right of enjoying and defending property, and seeking and obtaining happiness."

Mechanics' and Builders' Liens.

The "rights" supposed to be violated are rights deemed fundamental under all forms of popular and constitutional government, and like declarations are to be found in all or most of our state constitutions. The question is therefore one of general law, having as much reference to the constitution of any other state as to that of Ohio.

In all or nearly all of the states there are statutes intended to give liens to those who contribute labor or materials to the enhancement or improvement of the land or buildings of an owner. These statutes vary in their character and purpose. Originally, they were chiefly acts giving a lien to persons having direct contractual relations with the owner. Such statutes did not protect those who contributed to the improvement through dealings with the contractor, and were soon followed by statutes extending the lien to persons not contractually connected with the owner, but who furnished labor or materials for the building through contracts with the principal contractor.

Referring now to the statute in Ohio, the court says:

But the validity of such statutes need not be rested upon mere authority. They find sanction in the dictates of natural justice, and most often administer an equity which has recognition under every system of law. That principle is that every one who, by his labor and materials has added to the property of another, thereby acquires a right to compensation. This strong natural justice has given rise to a variety of liens recognized by the common law. Thus, without any agreement the common law gave to one who, by his labor or expense, has made, preserved, enlarged, or repaired a chattel, a lien thereon for his security, which he may, however, lose if he surrenders possession.

Concluding their decision, Judge Lurton says:

The right of him who, by his labor and materials, had contributed to the betterment of another's estate, was an imperfect right, because it had not been done at the instance of the owner, though presumably with his knowledge and at the instance of his contractor. At the common law neither the owner nor his building was chargeable, there being no contractual relation. The statute recognizes the equity of such contributors, and has turned the imperfect into a perfect right, by prescribing the consequences of a building contract, and giving a remedy to all who, at the instance of the contractor, shall contribute to the performance of his contract with the owner. That legislation which is sanctioned by the dictates of natural justice can only be avoided by pointing out some specific provision in the organic law which has been violated by its enactment. Neither upon reason nor authority are we able to come to an agreement with the Ohio court. In the exercise of our independent constitutional jurisdiction, we must declare our conscientious judgment to be that the Ohio statute was not void.

Now just a word from the supreme court of the United States giving its approval to the decision of the United States circuit court of appeals:

The circuit court of appeals expressed its earnest desire, in the interest of harmony of decision, to come to an agreement with the state court, but its sense of duty compelled it to sustain the constitutional validity of the statute upon which the plaintiffs based their claim. Upon a careful consideration of the objections urged to the statute, and after an extended review of the authorities, the circuit court of appeals held that the statute did not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, nor unreasonably interfere with his liberty of contract; that the restraints put upon the owner by the provisions in favor of subcontractors and those who furnished materials to be used by the contractor in execution of his contract with the owner, were neither arbitrary nor oppressive; that such provisions were no more onerous than required by the necessity of protecting those who actually do the work or furnish the material by which the owner is benefited; dictates of natural justice, and, as must be conclusively presumed as was known to the owner when he contracted for the building of his house, its requirements could only be avoided by pointing out some specific part of the organic law which has been violated by its enactment.

We are constrained to withhold our assent to the views expressed by the supreme court of Ohio, and to express our concurrence with the circuit court of appeals. The great weight of authority in this country as to the meaning and scope of constitutional provisions substantially like those to be found in the constitution of Ohio is, in our opinion, against the conclusion reached by the learned state court. Exercising an independent judgment on the subject, we are obliged to so declare.

I simply want to call your attention to the fact that this proposal only permits of legislation of a character that has been suggested, and it is made necessary because of the fact that the supreme court of Ohio has previously held certain phases of the mechanics' lien law unconstitutional. I doubt if there is a delegate in the Convention who does not fully appreciate the injury that is done to material men and mechanics by reason of their inability to collect for material or labor because of unscrupulous and oftentimes dishonest contractors. I am not assuming to say what kind of a law would be passed under this provision of the constitution, but I am assuming that such a statute would be passed as would require of all dishonest men to do the thing that all honest men do now.

The losses that have been sustained in the state of Ohio since this law was declared unconstitutional would mount into the millions in the last eight or ten years, and the losses are altogether to those who as contractors or subcontractors have either been lacking in ability in the particular line of business they were engaged in, or because they had deliberately set out to defeat justice or to defeat the material men or the laborers.

Mr. BOWDLE: If you will answer a question it may save me from making a speech. Why is it you leave out the word subcontractor? In other words, why are you not willing that the subcontractor should have a lien?

Mr. STILWELL: My idea is that ninety-five per cent of the damage done is done by subcontractors, and yet under this provision it is my understanding that if the legislature so desires, the subcontractors may be included, but the evil largely exists in the subcontractors.

Mr. ELSON: Do we understand by this proposal that the owner is responsible for the pay of every laborer who does a day's or an hour's work under any contractor in building, or one who furnishes any material, however small—that the owner is ultimately responsible for the pay?

Mr. STILWELL: That is one of the points I want to mention again. I have that faith in every delegate here that I do not believe there is a man in this Convention who would build a home today and not see, without the law requiring him to do it, that the material and the labor that went into his house were paid for before he paid the contractor. It is only requiring men of a different calibre from what the Convention is composed of to do the same thing.

Mr. ELSON: The contractor may have men in his employ who are only employed a small portion of the time, on part of the building. They may be employed elsewhere a good deal of the time. Would it not be making things complicated to require the owner to be responsible for each part of that man's time?

Mr. STILWELL: It had no such result when the law which was declared unconstitutional was in effect previous to its being declared unconstitutional by the court. I do not think it would have that result.

Mr. ELSON: I want to support this measure, but I want to thoroughly understand it.

Mr. STILWELL: It would require from the owner a little more care in the selection of the character of men who do his work.

Mr. LAMPSON: Does the gentleman know whether or not there was experienced any trouble or difficulty on the part of the owners of buildings before the lien law was declared unconstitutional?

Mr. STILWELL: No, sir; there was little or no trouble, and it was a great blow to all involved when the law was declared unconstitutional.

Mr. KRAMER: I was just wondering whether it would not work a hardship on the contractor. Would it not make it almost necessary for the man who had the house built to retain all of the money for the building of the house until the length of time had elapsed in which the material men would have a right to perfect their lien? We have four months now in which a contractor can file a lien. If the legislature would give the material men four months in which to protect his lien upon the property or building, would it not be necessary for the owner of the property to withhold the payment for the building until that whole time elapsed, and would not that work a hardship on the contractor?

Mr. STILWELL: He could be protected by a bond.

Mr. KRAMER: Yes; that would be a provision for protection.

Mr. STILWELL: That is a simple matter and of little cost.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would the giving of the bond be adequate protection to the contractor in this, that unpaid material might turn up afterwards and he would have no remedy except by a suit on the bond?

Mr. STILWELL: That is true.

Mr. HOSKINS: Would you have any objection to inserting in this proposal the word "subcontractor," as suggested by Mr. Bowdle?

Mr. STILWELL: Only that, as I have stated, the trouble is largely caused by the subcontractors, and you are including in the proposal the very men that we are seeking to protect ourselves against.

Mr. HOSKINS: Is not the subcontractor often one of the most important parts of a large contract? There are a number of them, and they are entitled to as much protection as the material men. I hope the delegates will recognize that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I have no objection to this except to that part which guarantees one class of men doing business in the state of Ohio. It offends the moral sense so thoroughly that it is only necessary to read it to be against it. Why should the legislature guarantee the credit of men selling material any more than it guarantees the credit of farmers who send their corn to a commission merchant, or the merchant who sells boots and shoes or any other article of merchandise? It is incredible that this proposition should be considered for a moment. I say there is a wide gulf separating the merchant or the farmer or the material man and the laboring man, who ought to get the fullest possible protection that the laws can devise for him.

Mr. STOKES: What protection would the laboring man have against the man putting up a building and collecting the money and getting out?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I say I am absolutely willing to give the laboring man the lien.

Mr. STOKES: Well, is not the material man's claim just as important?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is so ridiculous I hate to have to reply to it. Is not the farmer who produces corn or raises chickens, or the merchant, just as important as the man whose time is employed in delivering material? What difference is there in principle?

Mr. STOKES: If you ask that as a question, there is this difference in the construction of a building, that it may take three, six or nine months from the time the material is furnished, and the man may be responsible at first and not at the end.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If he has common sense enough to be in business he should know with whom he is dealing and to whom he is selling, and when he extends the credit it is purely at his option.

Mr. STILWELL: Are you insisting that the mechanics' lien laws, heretofore passed in this state and in every state in the Union for the last one hundred years, are ridiculous?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: I do not know what those mechanics' lien laws are. I say if any of the lien laws provide protection for poor credit in favor of the material men as against farmers and merchants, then I say it is unjust, immoral and highly ridiculous. I offer an amendment:

Mechanics' and Builders' Liens.

The amendment was read as follows:

In line 4 insert the word "and" after the word "artisans."

In line 5, strike out "and material men."

In line 6, strike out "or furnished material."

Mr. NYE: Gentlemen of the Convention: I am in full accord with this proposal to the extent that it is proposed here, and I am opposed to the amendment as presented by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS]. If there is any one class of people that need protection it is the class of people that furnish labor and material to put up a building on property or real estate that cannot be removed. Take other kinds of property, and if it is personal property possession can be held, but the man who owns land and hires someone to build a building upon it retains possession of the property, and he holds it there for all time, and the man who furnishes the labor and material ought to be protected and have some kind of protection for that labor and material furnished to make the property more valuable.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: How many times ought the owner of real estate be under obligation to pay for the house that he has built?

Mr. NYE: Only once, but he ought to make his contract in such a way that that one payment shall pay the parties that furnished the material and furnished the labor. It is within his power in making his contract, whether he makes it with the contractor or with the subcontractor, to make it in such shape that he is absolutely protected, and he can withhold his money until the party who furnishes the material and labor shall receive his pay.

Mr. OKEY: Do you think under the terms of this proposal a subcontractor could be protected?

Mr. NYE: I am of the opinion that he might be protected even under this.

Mr. OKEY: That is a point.

Mr. NYE: But if it is not broad enough to cover him, if he furnished material or labor, it is possible it might be made broader.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: If a farmer ships five hundred bushels of wheat to a commission house in Cleveland on Tuesday and it reaches there on Wednesday, and the commission house sells and delivers the five hundred bushels of wheat on Thursday, how can the farmer get possession of his personal property on Friday when the commission man has failed?

Mr. NYE: He can provide in his contract, if he desires, that the wheat or corn shall not be delivered until he receives his pay for it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Would not that prevent the transaction of all business.

Mr. NYE: No. That is entirely different from constructing a building. Here is a building being constructed that will take a year or two to build. The man owns the land, and he hires the contractor, and he can provide in his contract that the material and the labor shall be paid for before he entirely pays the contractor. He has abundant means to protect himself, and he should do it so that the laborer, the artisan, the mechanic and the material man get their pay.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Is not the mere fact that it takes from sixteen to eighteen months to put up a building of any size a great deal more protection to the material man, who has all of the time the building is in progress of construction to go to the head contractor, and, if he fails, to go to the owner and get his money? Is not that immeasurably greater protection than the farmer or merchant has whose goods, being personal property, leave his possession?

Mr. NYE: This Proposal No. 166 provides that laws may be passed to protect all of these men. Just what the details of those laws will be I cannot say, but the very thing you speak of can be provided for. I am of opinion that it ought to be provided for, and that the mechanic and artisan and laborer should receive their pay for the material or for the additional value that they put upon that property.

Mr. FOX: I was solicited by three different material men in Mercer county to work for this proposal, saying that the laws, as they are now, were entirely inadequate to protect material men. I would like to see the proposal pass without amendment. The trouble with the amendment of the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. HARRIS] is that he wants to protect some and not the others. His proposal seems to carry the plan to only protect one set of people. And his reference to the farmer and the grain has no application at all. We all know that the farmer doesn't sell his grain that way. He brings it to a warehouse and he gets his money before he leaves.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: Is it not a fact that the farmer can protect himself when he ships his grain to Pittsburgh or Cleveland by drawing with bill of lading attached?

Mr. FOX: Certainly.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: And is it not a fact if contractors and material men are not protected it would discourage enterprises and business undertakings?

Mr. FOX: It certainly would.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The gentleman from Stark [Mr. HARTER] just asked you if the farmer could not protect himself by attaching the bill of lading to his shipments?

Mr. FOX: Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That is really selling for cash?

Mr. FOX: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Could not the material men protect themselves by selling for cash all the time?

Mr. FOX: Not all the time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: But suppose a fellow comes to you and says, "I want to buy this lumber. I will have this house put up in thirty days and I will settle for it?"

Mr. FOX: If I think he is good I will extend him credit, and if I don't I will not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Suppose you think he is good and he is not good.

Mr. FOX: I lose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: We don't protect you there. In this proposal you are simply protecting against credit.

Mr. FOX: The way I understand it, this protects everybody. How should they be protected?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: The same as you protect yourself with people coming to your store. Those you think are good you extend credit to, and those you do not, you do not.

Mr. FOX: And a lot that we credit and think are good, when the time comes around, don't pay.

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: Then it is your bad judgment in extending credit.

Mr. FACKLER: Is it not a fact that merchandise sold for the purpose of erecting a building becomes part of the real estate and cannot be taken off as other personal property can?

Mr. HARRIS, of Hamilton: That has just the opposite effect from what you intend. The very fact that the merchandise sold is material in process of construction for six to eighteen months, where the owner of the material can go to the head contractor and to the owner and say, "This man is not paid, and I will hold back some of the material if he is not paid," which the farmer cannot do, because his personal property disappears in a day—every fragment of it is gone. And why should you protect that man who can protect himself when you don't protect the farmer?

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: Is it not a fact that bread-stuff is always sold for cash?

Mr. FOX: Yes.

Mr. HARTER, of Stark: And lumber and building material is always sold on time?

Mr. FOX: Generally so. And I do not see why there should be any discrimination in this proposal, and I would like to see it adopted, but without the amendment.

Mr. ROCKEL: I think we are wasting a great deal of time discussing the question of the policy of the law. That is entirely in the hands of the legislature. Almost all the states of this Union have passed just such laws as this would authorize our legislature to pass. They have made it different in its application. In some states they have required the contractor to file a statement with the owner of the property as to all material men and all subcontractors and matters of that character. In other states they provide different details. It would be entirely unnecessary to have this amendment at all in the present constitution were it not for that peculiar view that our supreme court took of our present constitution. That is all there is to it. We might have all these details of what is in the laws of various other states carried out under the present constitution but for the decision of the supreme court of Ohio which prevents it. And I think if that question comes before our supreme court they will reverse that decision, but it stands now as a bulwark in opposition to everybody.

Mr. JONES: I understood you to say that this proposal simply authorized the enactment of such a character of mechanics' lien law?

Mr. ROCKEL: So I understand.

Mr. JONES: Is it not in effect the enactment of a lien law itself, in that it provides that material men and workmen of every class shall have a lien upon the property, real and personal, upon which they bestow work or materials? Does it not create a lien in favor of all workmen and material men under all circumstances, dependent only upon the fact that their material shall go into the property?

Mr. ROCKEL: Sometimes it is well to go back. Laws may be passed to secure mechanics—

Mr. JONES: I beg your pardon. I was misled by the original proposal instead of the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS: May it not be that some of the members have turned to the original proposal instead of the substitute proposal? My friend Jones did and I did.

Mr. ROCKEL: We might discuss the policies that Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, has brought up, but that is a matter for the legislature. But let me say it has been thought wise to carry out a law that would protect the people who put money into a particular piece of property. That is all this does. You advance money for a man to build a house, and you really build the house. Why should you not have a right on that property to get your money back?

Mr. PECK: You would not have any money if you just advanced the money?

Mr. ROCKEL: Not at present. I mean your material or labor or whatever it is that goes in and increases the other man's property. As I said, we might go into the details of this matter. All the other states have something of this character—Illinois, Indiana, and almost all the other states. Therefore I move that the amendment of Mr. Harris, of Hamilton, be laid on the table.

The motion was carried.

Mr. HOSKINS: I offer an amendment.

The amendment was read as follows:

After the word "laborers" in line 4, insert a comma and the word "subcontractors."

Mr. STILWELL: We agree to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALFHILL: This proposal has a word in the forefront of it that limits its scope and effect and overcomes to an extent some things that have been here urged against its adoption. Laws may be passed which shall secure to certain men "their just dues"—note the word "just." Can anybody object to that as the policy of the state of Ohio? Here is the working of the constitution for a good many years in the state of Ohio. We have had a mechanics' lien law, and that law of course extended to a good many other things than buildings—the erection of bridges, derricks, as well as a host of public works. That law created a right in one who was a direct contractor with the owner to assert a lien on the premises or the thing constructed, and the law left out of consideration altogether for many years all of the rights of one who furnished material to go into that structure or one who furnished labor on that structure, and today we have not any way whatever to protect under the law as it now stands any subcontractor, any material man or any laborer except to the extent of such fund as would remain in the hands of the owner after he got through settling with the original contractor, so that all the lien now that the laborer, material man or subcontractor can assert is a lien on the fund, and that means the residue of the fund after the original contractor and the owner have their settlement. Into that settlement many things creep. Oftentimes the owner of the building finds that the contractor has not lived up to the specifications, that the contractor has not done what he agreed to do. Sometimes he discharges Mechanics' and Builders' Liens.

the contractor, and takes that fund for the purpose of carrying out and completing the contract, according to his own interpretations, and perhaps correctly, of the terms and stipulations of the contract, and he may use up that fund in adjusting the rights between himself and the original contractor. That is the condition of the law as it is now.

Mr. LAMPSON: Is the owner in any event compelled to pay more than his contract price?

Mr. HALFHILL: Can he now, do you mean?

Mr. LAMPSON: Yes.

Mr. HALFHILL: I apprehend that just laws would not confiscate anything and that the legislature will pass laws only to secure men their just dues.

Mr. LAMPSON: Suppose the contractor has a contract to build a building for $10,000, but the material and labor put into the building amount to $12,000. Would the owner be compelled to pay that excess?

Mr. HALFHILL: No, sir, and it is my belief that no law could be passed which would make him do it. No law can be passed which will impair the validity or obligation of a contract. It would be impossible for any state to pass any law in violation of that provision of the federal constitution. But at least the owner may always protect himself by taking a bond from the contractor.

Mr. JONES: Is not that just the very purpose of this amendment to the constitution? Our supreme court held under the present constitution that it would be an impairment of the rights of contract to impose the obligation on the owner of the property, and to require him to pay for material which he did not agree to pay for, although that amount may be in excess of what he agreed to pay.

Mr. HALFHILL: No; I don't understand that that was it at all.

Mr. JONES: Would not—

Mr. HALFHILL: I don't care to enter into any further argument on that point. I have only fifteen minutes.

So the situation that confronted everybody in the early nineties was the situation I now describe. At that time I was consulted and was instrumental in helping frame the law passed by the legislature, which appears in volume 91, page 136, of the laws of the state of Ohio. Permit me to read you that. This is the law that was declared unconstitutional:

Sec. 3193. Any subcontractor, material man, laborer or mechanic, who has performed labor or furnished materials or machinery, or who is about to perform labor or furnish material or machinery for the construction, improvement or repair of any turnpike road improvement or other public improvement provided for in a contract between any board or officer and a principal contractor, and under a contract between any such subcontractor, material man, laborer or mechanic and a principal contractor or subcontractor, may, at the time of beginning to perform such labor or furnish such material or machinery, or at any time thereafter, not to exceed ninety days from the completion of such labor or delivery of such machinery or material, file with the board or officer, or the authorized clerk or agent thereof, a sworn and itemized statement of the amount and value of such labor performed and to be performed, material or machinery furnished, containing a description of any promissory note or notes that may have been given by the principal contractor or subcontractor on account of said labor, machinery or material, or any part thereof, with all credits and set-offs thereon.

The same sort of statute that applies there to these public boards was passed to apply to the individual landowner, and that is the language that the supreme court in the case of Palmer and Crawford vs. Tingle, 55 Ohio State, declared to be unconstitutional. I quote from the syllabus:

1. The inalienable right of enjoying liberty and acquiring property, guaranteed by the first section of the bill of rights of the constitution, embraces the right to be free in the enjoyment of our faculties, subject only to such restraints as are necessary for the common welfare.

2. Liberty to acquire property by contract, can be restrained by the general assembly only so far as such restraint is for the common welfare and equal protection and benefit of the people, and such restraining statute must be of such a character that a court may see that it is for such general welfare, protection and benefit. The judgment of the general assembly in such cases is not conclusive.

3. While a valid statute regulating contracts is, by its own force, read into, and made a part of such contracts, it is otherwise as to invalid statutes.

4. The act of April 13, 1894, 91 O. L. 135, in so far as it gives a lien on the property of the owner to subcontractors, laborers and those who furnish machinery, material or tile to the contractor, is unconstitutional and void. All to whom the contractor becomes indebted in the performance of his contract, are bound by the terms of the contract between him and the owner.

That was the construction the supreme court of Ohio gave to our bill of rights, and, as has been read here by the gentleman from Cuyahoga, the supreme court of the United States found that it was not necessarily a correct construction. The supreme court of the United States said that was going to the extreme limit of protecting the rights of property, and, as has been said here in debate, it might be if such a case came again before our own supreme court that the court might construe this kind of a statute differently from the way it did in 55 O. S. We want to make it easy for the court to get away from that decision, and we want to pass this proposal; and I submit this is only a proposal in line with common honesty, because it is within the power of every owner of property to make a contract whereby he can protect himself against the faults and shortcomings of his contractors, and whereby he will see to it that the material that goes into his house and covers his head, or the labor that goes into the structure and helps to complete it, is properly paid for. That is only just and right. And if any of you had had the experience that any ordinary attorney has in trying to protect the rights of his clients when called upon by laborers and material men, and had found how very far short of protecting those rights he can come under existing laws, you would be in favor of this change, because it is only in favor of justice, right and common honesty.

Mr. ANDERSON: Do you mean that if this proposal is adopted it will correct the decision of the supreme court in 55 O. S.?

Mr. HALFHILL: I mean that if this proposal is adopted it will be entirely competent for the legislature to pass a law similar to the laws that I read here, which the supreme court of Ohio has declared unconstitutional.

Mr. ANDERSON: It was declared unconstitutional because of the federal constitution, was it not?

Mr. HALFHILL: Oh, no. Not on that account, but that it seemed in conflict with the provisions of the Ohio bill of rights. The supreme court of the United States decided expressly that it was not in conflict with the bill of rights of Ohio in the case involving the construction of the Southern Hotel here in Columbus, which was read in debate by the gentleman from Cuyahoga [Mr. STILWELL].

Mr. BOWDLE: The gentleman and Mr. Stilwell have made my speech, and I move the previous question. The main question was ordered.
